Cumberland, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, DUKE OF (1721-65), was the third son of George II and Queen Caroline. He adopted a military career, and in 1743 was wounded at the battle of Dettingen. In 1745 he objected to his projected marriage with a deformed Dutch princess, and sent to the dying Lord Orford (Walpole) for advice. Orford recommended him to agree, on condition of receiving an ample establishment, which would at once cause the king to drop the project. The plan was successful. In the same year he was appointed commander-in-chief of the allies in Flanders. He fought with distinguished gallantry at the glorious defeat of Fontenoy. He was then recalled to oppose the advance of the Young Pretender through England, and made Lichfield his head-quarters. He was outmanœuvred by the insurgents, however, and the Scots got between him and London. On their retreat from Derby he started in pursuit, but was defeated in a skirmish at Clifton, and allowed the Highlanders to retire unmolested.

After the defeat at Falkirk, he was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland, and arrived at Holyrood on January 30, 1746. He utterly defeated Charles Edward at Culloden (q.v.) April 16. The defeated Highlanders were treated with great brutality, many of them being put to death in cold blood, and the country was systematically harried. By these cruelties the duke gained the title of "the Butcher." The thanks of parliament, and a pension of £25,000 a year, were voted him. In 1747 he again commanded in Flanders, but was defeated at the battle of Lauffeld (q.v.). Shortly afterwards he transmitted to the French overtures of peace. In 1757 he was sent to command the army in Hanover. He was worsted in July at the battle of Hastenbeck (q.v.), and, his disorganized army being surrounded by the enemy, he was compelled to sign a convention at Kloster-Seven (q.v.). "Here," said George II, when he received him, "is my son, who has ruined me and disgraced himself." The duke promptly resigned his military appointments. For the remainder of his life he lived in seclusion, his chief friend being Henry Fox (q.v.). In 1765 George III, wishing to rid himself of Grenville and Bedford, applied to his uncle for help. The latter applied to Pitt, but found that statesman, influenced by Temple, inclined to proposals which could not be accepted. The duke, therefore, turned to Whig houses, and prevailed on them to form a ministry with Rockingham at its head. His death at Windsor was remarkably sudden, although he had previously suffered from a paralytic stroke, and his constitution had been utterly broken.

Cumberland, EARLS OF. [CLIFFORD.]

Cumbria—(1) etymologically, is a more correct form of Cambria, and equivalent to Cumberland, i.e., the land of the Cymry or Welsh; (2) historically, is used first in a wider sense to denote the Brythonic district between the Clyde and the Ribble, and west of the Pennine Range and Ettrick Forest, which retained its native (Cymric) population after the English conquest; secondly, in a narrower sense it is confined to the southern-most portion of that district, the modern Cumberland, the northern portion being called Reged and Strathclyde. But Strathclyde (i.e., valley of the Clyde) is also commonly used as equivalent to Cumbria in the wider sense. The dissolution of the Roman power in Britain seems to have led to a reversion to the primitive divisions of the Britons, but the constant pressure of the enemy forced them, no less than the English themselves, to greater union. Hence, by the sixth century, the larger Cumbria was consolidated by Rhydderch Hael (561) into a single state. It had already been, according to one theory, the main seat of the power of Arthur and the Gwledigau, had sent

Cunedda to Gwynedd, and had produced the Four bards, Taliesin, Aneurin, Merddyn, and Llywarch Hen. If the Goidel still ruled in much of North Wales, it was the largest homogeneous British state. In conjunction with the kings of Scots and North Welsh, Rhydderch, in 573, finally defeated the heathen party at the battle of Ardderyd (Arthuret, near Carlisle). He brought Kentigern back from St. Asaph to found the bishopric of Glasgow. Alcluyd, the modern Dumbarton (fort of the Britons), became at once the northernmost stronghold and capital of the state. Carlisle was the chief fortress of its southern portion. The Cumbrian state became so powerful that it attempted before long to attack the Angles of Northumbria; but the terrible Ethelfrith revenged himself by the conquest of Chester and the massacre of the monks of Bangor Iscoed (613); and as the conquests of Edwin included the two Monas, they could hardly have left out "Strathclyde," as Cumbria was now often called. Whether Cadwallon, the ally of Penda, was or was not a Cumbrian cannot be decided; but his fall, in conjunction with the severance of the communication between Gwynedd and Cumbria, prevented the formation of a single great Welsh state. A long gap in Cumbrian history marks the overlordship of the Northumbrian Bretwaldas. At their fall, kings of the "Strathclyde Wealas" again appear (e.g., their deaths are mentioned in 694 and 722), but they possess only local importance; and the continuance of the Anglian influence in Galloway (q.v.) must have almost cut their state in two. In the ninth century we read of the desolation of Alcluyd by the vikings, who appear to have established a settlement in the region of modern Cumberland, between 890 and 920. A later Welsh legend speaks of a migration from the Vale of Clyde to the Vale of Clwyd. But the false etymology involved in the identification of two words sufficiently refutes this unlikely story. In 945, we are told that Edmund of Wessex conquered Cumberland and bestowed it on Malcolm, King of Scots, in return for allegiance and help against the Danes. This seems to imply merely a conquest and grant of the Norse settlement, since Cumbria in the wider sense of the term was already ruled by a line of Scottish princes. The connexion with England did not cease, for William Rufus, in 1092, annexed the region south of the Solway to England. Its ruler, Dolfin, was an Englishman, so that, before the possible colonization of Rufus, which revived Carlisle, almost in ruins since Danish devastations in the eighth century, the Cymric character of the district had not been entirely kept up. The county of Cumberland and bishopric of Carlisle were now founded; but the northern part still remained in the main an appanage of Scotland, and was bestowed by the Scottish kings on their sons. Yet a twelfth-century charter speaks of the "Walenses" as a separate race, and it is possible that their speech lingered in remote valleys until the Reformation. The last remnant of Cumbrian independence was confined to the Pictish or Goidelic enclave of Galloway, and their amalgamation with the "Scots" into a single homogeneous nation by the common bond of anti-English feeling was the result of the injudicious legalism of Edward I.

The meagre Welsh Chronicles, "Annales Cambriæ" and "Brut y Tywysogion," published in the Rolls Series, and the "Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," edited by Skene. In "Celtic Scotland" Skene collected all that was then known of the early political, ecclesiastical, and social history of Cumbria. The same author's "Four Ancient Books of Wales" collects the remains of the possible Cumbrian bards, and some points of its history are luminously discussed in chap. x of the Introduction. Cunningham, ALEXANDER, 5TH EARL OF GLENCAIRN (d. 1574), taken prisoner at Solway Moss, was one of the "Assured Lords" (q.v.), but, with the others, threw over Henry VIII in 1544. He joined the Protestant alliance against Queen Mary for a time, but was shortly afterwards received back into the royal favour. In 1568 he was named one of the council of regency.

Cunningham, WILLIAM, 9TH EARL OF GLENCAIRN (1610 ?-64), received in 1653 a commission from Charles II to raise troops in his cause in Scotland. After having collected a force of Highlanders, Glencairn was replaced by General Middleton, who, however, shortly afterwards quitted Scotland, giving place to him once more.

Curfew, THE, was introduced into England by William the Conqueror. By this custom a bell was rung in every town at eight o'clock in winter and at sunset in summer, when all fires and lights had to be extinguished. This regulation caused a great clamour in England, although the custom was at that time almost universal throughout Europe; it was a call to prayers, an intimation that it was bed-time, and a means of guarding against fire. According to William of Malmesbury, Henry I allowed candles to be used at court after curfew-bell. The custom of ringing the curfew as an intimation of the approach of night was continued down to the seventeenth century, or even later, though the obligation to extinguish fires had, of course, been long since abandoned.

Curia Regis. This name is used in two senses. It denotes first the place where the king resided, attended by the chief officials of the court and household; and secondly, the supreme central court where the business of government in all its branches was enacted. In this latter sense it has more than one application. Thus it was applied to the assembly of feudal magnates which succeeded under the Normans and Angevins to the Anglo-Saxon witenagemot. In the presence of this body was undertaken every royal measure of national importance, judicial, financial, executive, and legislative, for as yet no distinction between the different functions of government was recognized; and thrice a year, on the great Church festivals, Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, the king wore his crown in a solemn session convened at one of the provincial capitals. But such a body was at once too unwieldy for the prompt dispatch of business and too intermittent to preserve administrative continuity. Its defects were supplied by a sort of inner official council, the nucleus of which was provided in the royal household, and which comprised, besides household officials such as the constable and marshal, the justiciar, chancellor, treasurer, and other great officers of state. Between this group and the larger and more formal assembly there was at first no clear distinction drawn. Both alike were "Curia Regis"; both possessed the same undefined powers of government. They were simply different aspects of the same institution; the Great Council was merely the Curia Regis in full session. With the great growth of business which resulted from the energetic rule of the Normans and Angevins, differentiation became, however, inevitable, and the inner or "efficient" Curia Regis proved to be the source from which have sprung all the administrative institutions of the kingdom. The process of disintegration dates back to the twelfth century, and was first apparent in the financial sphere. To Henry I finance was at once the end and the means of government. Hence it was in his reign that the Curia threw out the first of its many offshoots, the Court of Exchequer (q.v.), which was organized by the great justiciar, Roger le Poer (q.v.), Bishop of Salisbury. The next development was in the realm of justice. All appeals, such cases of first instance as touched either the royal interest or the rights and conduct of the tenants-in-chief, came as a matter of course before the Curia Regis; but its original sphere of action was immensely extended as a result of the expansion of royal justice under Henry I, and more especially Henry II. The latter's legislation brought a vast new body of business before the central courts, while at the same time perfecting the system of judicial circuits which had been foreshadowed in the Norman period. In 1178 the increasing volume and importance of the judicial work induced Henry to set up a committee of five specially selected judges to hear the pleas of the Crown. This has been regarded as marking the origin of the Court of King's Bench (q.v.)—"the judicial committee of the full curia regis"—but it was not before the fourteenth century that the evolution of the court was complete. To article 17 of Magna Carta is ascribed the separation off during the thirteenth century of a third court—that of Common Pleas (q.v.). The final stage in the development of the great courts of common law cannot, however, be said to have been reached before the Edwardian period.

Meanwhile the fecundity of the Curia Regis showed no decline. The great department of the Chancery (q.v.), which, originating as an administrative office concerned primarily with the king's secretarial business, developed in the later Middle Ages into a court of equity under the presidency of the lord chancellor, was itself simply another offshoot from the undifferentiated Curia of the Norman period; while the mediæval "concilium regis" [COUNCILS, CIVIL], the parent in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries of so many subordinate councils and courts, was again in origin merely a specialized aspect of the Curia Regis. From it are descended the privy council of modern times, and its infinitely more important offspring, the cabinet. Thus, in truth, it may be said that the Norman Curia Regis was "the parent of our modern administrative system." [HOUSEHOLD, THE ROYAL.]

Curragh Incident, THE (March 20, 1914), occurred in Ireland during the Home Rule crisis of 1914. General Hubert Gough and many of his officers resigned their commissions on being asked whether they would go to Ulster to oppose the Ulster Unionists if ordered to do so. The resignations were subsequently withdrawn, but the incident had the effect of persuading the Ulster Volunteers (opposed to Home Rule) that the army was with them.

Curran, JOHN PHILPOT (1750-1817), was born of humble parents at Newmarket, county Cork, and in 1775 he was called to the Irish bar. He soon rose to eminence. In 1782 he took silk, and in the following year was returned by a friend for a close borough in Westmeath. He at once took up the popular cause in parliament, and was soon recognized as one of the most brilliant orators in the assembly. In 1785 Fitzgibbon, the attorney-general, challenged him to a duel, on account of some sarcastic words which Curran had uttered about him in parliament. The duel ended without bloodshed, but Fitzgibbon, as Lord Clare, throughout his life did his best to ruin his adversary. In parliament Curran was, in ability at least, if not in position, the leader of the Whig party, and as such he strongly opposed the measures of Pitt's government with regard to Ireland. In 1806 he was appointed master of the rolls. In 1814 he retired on a pension. His health gradually broke down, and in his enfeebled state his mind gave way, and he died of apoplexy at Chelsea on October 14, 1817.

Curzon, GEORGE NATHANIEL, 1ST MARQUIS CURZON OF KEDLESTON (1859-1925), was educated at Eton and Balliol. He was under-secretary for India in 1891-2, and for foreign affairs from 1895 to 1898. In January 1899 he was made viceroy and governor-general of India, being raised to the peerage on his appointment. In 1900 he had to deal with the worst famine which India has experienced under British rule. He caused the formation of a new province, called the North-West Frontier Province (q.v.). On January 1, 1903, he presided at a great durbar at Delhi in honour of the coronation of the first British Emperor of India. His term of office was extended after the Delhi durbar, but he resigned in 1905. He became Marquis Curzon of Kedleston in 1911; leader of the House of Lords in 1916; secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1919. He was British representative at the Lausanne Conference of 1922-3, and strongly opposed the French occupation of the Ruhr inaugurated by M. Poincaré. His death occurred on March 20, 1925.

Biography by Lord Ronaldshay. 3 vols., 1928.

Customs, in the form of a national system of taxation, have no clear history until the thirteenth century. They may possibly have originated in the ill-defined right of the king to purveyance and prisage, or, alternatively, in the royal tolls exacted from merchants in payment for protection. Before the reign of John the Crown was drawing revenue from trade, but upon no uniform plan, the duties being modelled, locally, upon the current port customs of lastage (on exports), scavage (on imports), and the prisage of wines. Under John the national customs received a temporary organization, and a corps of customs officials came into being, with all the apparatus of royal authority to administer the "fifteenth," a tax which was levied on foreign trade. Then, for a time, the customs administration seems to have reverted to its old chaotic state of local levy and seizure in kind.

Edward I is responsible for the organization of the customs on a plan which formed the starting-point for later development. His experience in trade regulation began during his father's lifetime. On de Montfort's death he was entrusted with the supervision of foreign merchants in England, whereupon he made an agreement with them for the collection of "some reasonable portion" on their imports and exports (1266). The first parliamentary confirmation of customs rates was made in 1275, the duty in question being "the ancient custom" (custuma magna et antiqua) on all wools, wool-fells, and hides passing out of the country. This, in spite of a name which suggests antiquity, was evidently a new custom and one which inaugurated the national revision of the Edwardian period. In 1303 there followed the nova custuma, or new custom, which provided a revised and extended system of rates on all aliens' goods, as part of the bargain which was struck with the foreign merchants in the issue of the Carta Mercatoria. The constitutional crises of the reign of Edward II, together with the opposition of native merchants to what they must have regarded as unwarrantable favouritism to foreigners, were responsible for temporary withdrawals of the new authority; but in 1322 the king arbitrarily re-established his father's formula of duties and exemptions. There is little evidence to suggest that the nova custuma was ever confirmed by parliament.

It was perhaps inevitable that the cost of the foreign excursions of Edward III should on the one hand lead to a further extension of the national system and on the other to the exploitation of their economic advantage by the merchants to limit further the Crown's claim to tax as it pleased, a claim already restricted by the Confirmatio Cartarum of 1297. Further groups of customs now acquired definition. A new cloth custom, pannage, was authorized in 1347 by the Great Council, and became merged with part of the nova custuma of 1303 in the Petty Customs. Two forms of parliamentary subsidy on trade were inaugurated, but these had at first only a periodic application. The Ancient Custom of 1275 (which now included the export duties on the aliens' wool and hides originally forming part of the nova custuma) was supplemented by a new parliamentary grant or subsidy on wool. A further subsidy which emerges from these troubled years as a parliamentary grant is that of tunnage and poundage (q.v.), first authorized by a full parliament in 1373 as a successor to a series of more arbitrary levies upon the tun of wine and the pound value of merchandise. From the fourth year of Henry IV, poundage was imposed at the rate of 5 per cent. on the commodities concerned, and this remained thenceforward the standard levy until the end of the seventeenth century. Tunnage should be distinguished from other co-existent wine levies. In addition to tunnage at 2s. to 3s. per tun the king levied butlerage on aliens and prisage on denizens. Henry V was the first to receive tunnage and poundage as a life grant, and the precedent was followed until the accession of Charles I, when this particular group of customs was brought into prominence by his great quarrel with parliament over the fiscal limitations of the prerogative. Between the reign of Edward III and the seventeenth century there was one important addition to the forms of customs revenues, viz., Impositions. In their early form these had been described as "maletotes" (q.v.), and they had been stopped by parliamentary pressure during the first part of the Hundred Years' War. They were not revived in any serious form until the middle of the sixteenth century, when Queen Mary in 1558 put a new custom, or impost, on cloth exported from England. Her successor followed this with further experiments. The practice of "imposing" had a twofold justification, so it was urged. First, the Crown had the prerogative right of altering at will the pressure of customs rates in defence of the native merchant; secondly, it had the right to increase its revenue from a member (e.g., cloth) of any group of commodities when the yield from another member (e.g., wool) was failing. The constitutional battle was fought out in the courts under James I. The famous case of the impost on currants [BATE'S CASE] was tried in the Exchequer Court in 1606, and the decision of the judges went in the king's favour. Thereupon the impositions system was considerably extended, and great freedom was taken by James and his successor in revising the values in the Book of Rates for tunnage and poundage.

The alteration of traditional rates was another source of the constitutional quarrel under the first two Stuarts. The Book of Rates had substituted a table of fixed poundage rates for the earlier unsatisfactory system under which the owners of goods declared their value to the officials. The first Book affecting all ports was probably issued in 1532. From time to time it was revised by the lord treasurer, partly with the laudable intention of avoiding any injustice which should arise from obsolete valuations; partly with the object of keeping the general level of money values on the upward move as the purchasing power of money fell; partly, too, with the intention of increasing the revenue from trade. The early parliaments of Charles I were much exercised by these apparent violations of the law in the fiscal department. The king levied tunnage and poundage without their authorization and in 1628 seized the goods of merchants who disputed his right. In the Long Parliament an act was passed (16 Car. I, c. 8), which declared that tunnage and poundage could only rightfully be levied with parliamentary consent, and with this enactment the parliamentary system of taxation was made watertight. The impositions levied by Charles were retained, but under the legitimization of the Commons' consent. After the Restoration the fixation of rates became part of the province of legislation, and with the victory of parliament the customs ceased to provide material for civil strife. Thereafter the history of the customs is one merely of administrative reform until the period of the Corn Laws and the victory of free trade. The eighteenth-century background of policy is one of rigid protection, the objects of imposing customs being as much the benefit of home industries and the protection of colonial trade as the raising of revenue. Customs manipulation was employed as a supplement to diplomatic and warlike action in the sphere of foreign policy, one of the most famous examples in world history of a discriminating tariff being that inaugurated in the Methuen Treaty with Portugal (1703). Walpole's is the first outstanding name among the statesmen who, from the beginning of the eighteenth century onwards, attempted to simplify the customs system. Pitt, who came under the anti-mercantilist influence of Adam Smith, followed his example and not only simplified but reduced, preparing the way for the great tariff reforms of Huskisson and Peel. At the end of the Napoleonic Wars the old complicated system, which had succeeded the older and still more complicated mediæval system after the Revolution, was still substantially intact. "Taxation had reached its zenith." In 1824 and 1825 the new movement for simplification with an eye to revenue rather than protection was launched by Huskisson. Great reductions were made in the duties on raw materials. In the 'thirties and early 'forties the Corn Laws (q.v.) were the centre of controversy. In 1842 the general tariff was revised with revolutionary suddenness, 750 out of 1,200 articles being made secure from the operation of duty at the same time. In the years that followed the policy was extended, and we may take the legislation of the year 1860 as being the final step in the introduction of free trade and as the practical termination of the history of the complicated customs system of the past. A few duties on food-stuffs and tobacco were retained, but their extra-fiscal effect was neutralized by the imposition of an equal excise on similar commodities produced within the country. In 1907 the net produce of customs duties in the United Kingdom was £32,000,000, and of this tobacco provided one-half, wine and spirits one-fifth. Since the Great War there has been some return to the earlier policy of protecting young and struggling industries, and a new object of protectionist solicitude has been found in the vital "key industries," the protection of which is said to involve far-reaching consequences of the utmost national importance.

Custos Rotulorum is an officer of great antiquity who serves the function of keeper of the records of the sessions of a county. Acts were passed in 37 Henry VIII (1545) and 3 & 4 Ed. VI (1549) defining his position, and the office was finally regulated in 1688 (1 William and Mary, c. 21). He was always a justice of the peace, and of the quorum, and among his duties was the appointment of the clerk of the peace, who was responsible for the clerical work of the sessions. The custos rotulorum is now usually the lord-lieutenant of a county, though the two offices are quite distinct, the one being military, the other civil.

Cutch is a native state of India which forms a peninsula to the south of Sind. The Rao of Cutch entered into an agreement with the East India Company in 1809, and concluded treaties with Great Britain in 1816. Piracy was carried on by the inhabitants, and on this account, and in order to check the misgovernment of the province, the British intervened and deposed the Rao. By a treaty made in 1822 the country became tributary to Great Britain and received a resident appointed by the Bombay government.

Cuthbert, St. (d. 687), was in all probability a native of Northumbria, and born in the district which afterwards became the Lothians. Early in life he became a monk, and afterwards prior, at Melrose, under its first abbot, Eata, one of the disciples of Aidan, and followed him when he was transferred to Ripon. After the Synod of Whitby (664) (q.v.) he appears to have adopted the Roman usage, and when Eata was appointed abbot of Lindisfarne Cuthbert accompanied him as prior, in order that he might establish there the Roman observance. In 676 he determined to adopt a solitary life and retired to a hermitage on the adjacent island of Farne. At the entreaties of Egfrid of Northumbria he quitted his retreat and allowed himself to be consecrated Bishop of Lindisfarne by Archbishop Theodore (685). Before his death he again retired to his seclusion at Farne, where he died, March 20, 687. Cuthbert's life while at Melrose and Lindisfarne was one long missionary effort. He travelled over all northern Northumbria, and converted great numbers from heathenism. Nevertheless it is chiefly as an ascetic that he is remembered. His fame was very great in the north, and many miracles were ascribed to his relics. Throughout the Middle Ages his shrine at Durham was a great centre of pilgrimage, and he continued to be the favourite saint of northern England.

Cuthred, King of Wessex (740-56), was a kinsman of Ethelheard, whom he succeeded. He restored the position of Wessex to what it had been in the days of Ine. In 743, in conjunction with the Mercians, he defeated the Britons. In 750 Cuthred and his people rose against the yoke of the Mercians, and in 752 utterly defeated the Mercian king Ethelbald at Burford, on the borders of Oxfordshire and Gloucestershire. In 755 he once more defeated the Britons of Cornwall; and died in 756 after a victorious career.

Cuttack. The country on the Coromandel coast forming the northern portion of Orissa, and lying eastward of Berar. It was conquered by the Maharrattas in 1751, and taken from them by the British at the outset of the campaign of 1803.

Cutts, JOHN, LORD (1661-1707), served with great gallantry in the wars of William III and Anne. At the battle of the Boyne he led the British regiments that had served under the States General, and was rewarded by the grant of an Irish peerage. He led the forlorn hope at the siege of Namur (1695), and for his utter contempt of danger on that occasion obtained the honourable nickname of "the Salamander." In 1702 he led the storming party against Fort St. Michael, the stronghold of Venloo; and at the battle of Blenheim

(his last battle) he conducted the assault on the village, but was repulsed with terrible loss. In 1705 he was made commander-in-chief, and one of the lord justices of Ireland.

"Letters of John, Lord Cutts," 1886.

Cwichelm (611-36) was the son of Cynegils, King of the West Saxons (q.v.), and for some time shared the throne of his father. Jealous of the power of Edwin of Northumbria, in 626 he sent off one of his servants with a poisoned dagger to murder that king, whose life was saved only by the devotion of his thegn Lilla. Two years later Cwichelm and his father were worsted in a battle near Cirencester by the Mercian king, Penda. In 636 Cwichelm is said to have been baptized at Dorchester-on-Thames by Birinus (q.v.). He died the same year.

Cymbeline (CUNOBELINUS) was a British chief, who made his capital at Camulodunum (Colchester), and who, from the number of coins bearing his name, seems to have been a very powerful prince. In Roman authorities he is called simply Rex Brittonum, as if he were supreme in the whole island. He was ruler of the Catuvellauni, but conquered in addition the Trinobantes of Essex, and, it would seem, the rest of south-eastern Britain, since his money is found over the whole district from Kent to Gloucestershire [COINAGE.] The well-known Caratacus was his son.

Dio Cassius.

Cymry is the native name of the Welsh. [CELTS; BRITONS; WALES.]

Cynegils, King of Wessex (611-43), was the son of Ceolric, and nephew of Ceolwulf, whom he succeeded. His son Cwichelm (q.v.) seems to have been associated with him in the government. In 614 they fought against the Britons at Bampton, and routed them. They appear to have been hard pressed by the Northumbrians and Mercians, under Edwin and Penda respectively. In 628 Penda attacked Cirencester, and a treaty was made there which probably circumscribed the boundaries of Wessex on the north-west. In 635 Cynegils was converted to Christianity by Birinus (q.v.), and was baptized at Dorchester-on-Thames.

Cynewulf, King of Wessex (757-86), succeeded on the deposition of Sigebert, although he apparently did not belong to the direct royal line. He engaged in several hard-fought, though successful, conflicts with the Britons, but at what place and in what year we are not informed. He had a formidable rival in Offa of Mercia, and in 777 the stronghold of Bensington (near Wallingford) was captured by that king. In 784 Cynewulf was murdered at Merton, in Surrey, by Cyneheard, the brother of the former king, Sigebert. This tragedy is very finely related in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," and the story is, as usual, amplified by Henry of Huntingdon.

Cynric (d. 560 ?) was, according to the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," the son of Cerdic (q.v.). He is said to have been recognized as King of the West Saxons, conjointly with his father, in 519, and to have extended his kingdom after his father's death to the west and north, defeating the Britons at Old Sarum. His historicity is, however, extremely doubtful. [WESSEX, KINGDOM OF.]

Cyprus, taken by Richard I of England in 1191, was eventually given by him to the Lusignan family, one of whose last representatives married a Venetian lady, Catherine Cornaro. She, being left sovereign of the island, abdicated in 1489 in favour of the Venetian Republic, from which the Turks took the island in 1571. On June 4, 1878, in view of the Treaty of Berlin (q.v.), an Anglo-Turkish convention provided for its transfer to, and administration by, the British government, the surplus of revenue over expenditure being paid to the Porte, which undertook to introduce reforms into its own administration. The object of the convention was to secure Asiatic Turkey against further Russian aggression, and this Great Britain engaged to do, the convention providing that if Russia ever retired from Batum, Ardahan, and Kars, Britain should also retire from Cyprus. The island remained nominally under Turkish suzerainty until November 5, 1914, when, on the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey, it was annexed to the British crown. The Turkish government recognized the annexation in the Lausanne Treaty of 1923 [LAUSANNE, CONFERENCE OF]. On May 1, 1925, Cyprus was raised to the rank of a colony.

Dacre, LEONARD, OF NAWORTH (d. 1573), "of the crooked back," a powerful gentleman of Northumberland, and the inheritor of the lands of Naworth. Dacre was privy to the Catholic Rebellion of the North in 1569, though he did not take an active part in it, and even sided with the Royalists when he saw all was lost. His arrest was ordered, but could not be carried into execution, owing to the large number of men who assembled at Naworth to protect him. On the first opportunity Dacre escaped into Scotland, and subsequently joined the Duke of Alba's army in the Low Countries.

Dægsastan, or DAWSTON, was the scene of the great victory won by Ethelfrith of Northumbria (603) over Aidan, King of the Scots of Dalriada, who was followed by a large force, including adventurers from Ireland, Welsh from Strathclyde, and supporters of the rival royal house of Northumbria. Ethelfrith gained a signal victory. Dægsastan is probably Dawston in Liddesdale.

Dalriada—Dal-Riada, "the home of the descendants of Riada"—was (1) a district in Ireland, including the northern half of county Antrim, apparently one of the oldest settlements of the Scots among the Picts of Ulster; (2) the name given to the district of Argyllshire, settled by the immigrant Scots from Ireland. [SCOTS.]

Dalry, THE BATTLE OF, was an engagement fought between John of Lorne, a relation of Comyn, and Robert Bruce in 1306. In this engagement the Scottish king distinguished himself by the skill with which he moved back his armoured knights from the swarm of half-naked Highlanders, who made the attack upon ground that was essentially unfavourable for the operations of cavalry.

Dalrymple, SIR HEW WHITEFOORD (1750-1830), obtained an ensign's commission in the 31st Regiment in 1763. After holding various other commands, he was in 1806 appointed governor of Gibraltar, where he remained until August 1808, when he was placed in command of the British army in Portugal. He arrived at head-quarters the day after Wellesley's victory at Vimeiro, and superseded Burrard, who had already superseded Wellesley, and had prevented him from taking full advantage of his victory. At Junot's proposal terms were very soon made by Dalrymple with the French, and embodied in the Convention of Cintra. The news of that convention was received with the loudest indignation in England, and the three commanders were recalled, and put on their trial. Sir Hew was deprived of his command; but his disgrace was of brief duration, and terminated in 1812, when he was restored to the rank of general, while three years later he was made a baronet. In 1818 he was appointed governor of Blackness Castle, which post he seems to have held up to the time of his death. [VIMEIRO; CINTRA, CONVENTION OF.]

Dalrymple, JAMES, 1ST VISCOUNT STAIR (1619-95), had borne arms in his youth, and was subsequently a teacher of philosophy at Glasgow University. He was a member of Cromwell's reformed Court of Session in 1657. After the Restoration he sat in the privy council, became president of the Court of Session, and was knighted by Charles II. On refusing to make a declaration against the Covenant, he was condemned to forfeiture. On passing through London, however, he had an interview with Charles II, and his office and estates were restored to him. In 1676 he became lord president, and boldly opposed the severities which preceded the fall of the Stuarts. He was deprived of office, and felt it advisable to retire to Holland. There he composed his "Institutions of the Law of Scotland," a legal work of great value. He assisted with his counsel and purse the unfortunate enterprise of Argyll in 1685. His estates would probably have been confiscated had not his eldest son taken the Stuart side on political affairs. The proceedings against him for complicity in the Rye House Plot (q.v.) and Argyll's rebellion were dropped in 1687. At the revolution Stair assisted William with his advice. He became president of the Court of Session, and William's trusted agent in Scotland. An attempt was made by the opposition to rid themselves of him and his son by passing a law to the effect that all who had shared in the proceedings under the Stuarts were to be excluded from office, but the royal assent was refused to the bill. William wished to make him lord president of the judicial bench, but the estates claimed the appointment. Next year, however, the opposition was overcome. Dalrymple's attempts to reform the bench do not seem to have been particularly successful. On the fall of Melville the government of Scotland passed entirely into the hands of the Dalrymples. Sir James was raised to the peerage, with the title of Viscount Stair (1691). The massacre of Glencoe (q.v.) has left an indelible stain on his memory, though he played no prominent part in it. In 1695 he died. Stair, as well as his son, was thoroughly unpopular in Scotland.

Memoir by A. Mackay, 1873.

Dalrymple, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF STAIR (1648-1707), son of the preceding, is known in history by the title of the Master of Stair. He took office under James II, and became lord advocate of Scotland. By this means he saved the estates of his father from confiscation. The coldness that ensued between father and son was merely affected. At the revolution he early changed sides. He was one of the Scottish commissioners who were sent to offer the crown to William. On his return he was falsely accused by the opposition of having betrayed the liberties of his country. Shortly afterwards he became lord advocate, and, on the fall of his rival Melville, secretary of state for Scotland (1696). In conjunction with Argyll and Breadalbane, he planned the infamous massacre of Glencoe (q.v.). An inquiry in 1695 clearly traced the design to him, but the Scottish Estates simply censured him in vague terms, and left his treatment to the wisdom of the king. William contented himself with dismissing the Master from office. On the death of his father (1695) he became viscount, and was created Earl Stair in 1703. As one of the commissioners of the Scottish Union he displayed his great legal talents to advantage. In 1707, during the debate on Article 22 he spoke with success, and with considerable earnestness. But the strain on his nerves was too great; he returned home, and died. The defence has been offered for his complicity in the massacre of Glencoe that "If it is to be called malignity, it was no more personal than the desire of a chief of police to bring a band of robbers to justice."

J. M. Graham, "Stair Annals," 1875.

Dalrymple, JOHN, 2ND EARL OF STAIR (1673-1747), son of the foregoing, served under William III in Ireland and the Netherlands, became a lieutenant-colonel in 1701, and was one of Marlborough's officers. He shared his general's disgrace. In 1707 he succeeded to his father's earldom. In 1715 he was sent as ambassador to France. There his friendship with the regent stood the British government in good stead. The fortifications at Mardyck were discontinued owing to his representations. Hearing that ships were being fitted out for the Pretender by the French government, he requested that they might be given up, and the regent went so far as to unload them. It is said that he tried to bring about the assassination of the Pretender before he started for the expedition of 1715. On his return from that fruitless attempt he was dismissed from France on Stair's demand. In 1718 Stair successfully negotiated the quadruple alliance between Great Britain, France, Austria, and Holland. In 1720 he was recalled owing to a dispute with his fellow-countryman, Law, the financier. For twenty years he was kept out of employment. At length (1741) he was sent as ambassador to Holland, in order to induce the States General to take part in the war of the Austrian Succession. As commander of the British army in Flanders (1743) he displayed great incapacity. It was only by extreme good fortune that the army escaped destruction at Dettingen. After the battle jealousy sprang up between him and the German commanders. Disgusted at the rejection of his advice, he sent in his resignation. In 1745 he was reappointed commander-in-chief on the occasion of Prince Charles Edward's invasion, but took no active part in the campaign.

Dalzell, THOMAS, GENERAL (d. 1685), distinguished himself as an officer on the Royalist side in the Parliamentary wars. He was captured at the battle of Worcester, and sent as a prisoner to the Tower, from which, however, he managed to escape to Muscovy, where he served against the Poles and Tartars. After the Restoration, he returned home (1665), and was appointed commander-in-chief of Charles II's forces in Scotland—a post which he held till his death, excepting for the few days when he was superseded by the Duke of Monmouth, whom Dalzell is said to have refused to serve. He defeated the Covenanters at the battle of Pentland Hills (1666), and after this victory he is said by Burnet to have "acted the Muscovite too grossly," threatening to spit and roast all the disaffected. After the battle of Bothwell Bridge (1679), General Dalzell arrived at the royal camp with his commission renewed, and reproached the Duke of Monmouth for his leniency towards the insurgents. He was remarkable for the eccentricity of his appearance, and in London, whither he always went once a year to kiss the king's hand, drew around him a rabble of boys to stare at his huge white beard, which, not having been shaved since the death of Charles I, reached to his waist. He died soon after the accession of James II.

D'Amory, ROGER (d. 1322), married one of the three sisters of Gilbert of Clare, Earl of Gloucester. In 1317, when war broke out between the Earls of Lancaster and Warrenne, Roger joined with the Earl of Pembroke to obtain supremacy in the king's councils. In 1320 Lancaster received his help in his attack upon the Spensers; and his name is included in a list of peers who received pardon for any illegalities they might have committed in bringing the favourites to justice (1321). His quarrel with the younger Spenser was probably due to their joint claims in the Gloucester inheritance: for they had married sisters. Later in the same year, when Edward II took arms, Roger D'Amory was one of the first to feel the effects of the king's recovered strength. His castles were attacked, and before the battle of Boroughbridge he fell mortally wounded into the hands of his enemies at Tutbury.

Danby, THOMAS OSBORNE, EARL OF (1631-1712). [OSBORNE.]

Danegeld was a land-tax. It was assessed on the hide or carucate of land which was occupied or under cultivation, and was invented, it is supposed, by the Anglo-Saxon monarchy at the end of the tenth century, employed as an occasional war expedient under the pressure of the Danish raids and invasions, carried forward by Canute and inherited as a valuable means of revenue by the Conqueror. Our principal evidence is derived from the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" and from the Domesday survey (q.v.). The first mentioned levy of the geld is in the year 991, when it was employed by Ethelred II as a tribute to the Danes to buy off their invasions. Subsequently it was seemingly levied not only directly for this purpose, but also for the hire of mercenaries against invaders, and the maintenance of the naval strength. The amounts specifically mentioned by the "Chronicle" as raised in the pre-Conquest period are so heavy that they have seemed to investigators to have been sufficiently burdensome upon the less wealthy land-holders to account for the depression of large numbers to a position of dependence or semi-servility. These are some of the figures :—

994	.	.	.	.	£16,000
1002	.	.	.	.	£24,000
1007	.	.	.	.	£30,000
1018	.	.	.	.	£82,000

The Confessor raised danegeld, but we have no record of the amounts. He is said to have abandoned it in 1051, perturbed by a dream of the devil chuckling over the revenue produced by the tax. The Conqueror levied the geld at least three times. In 1083 an exceptionally heavy levy was made, at the rate of 6s. on the hide (three times as heavy as the ordinary rate), imposing a tax of at least one-third of the annual value of the land assessed. There were naturally difficulties in the raising of so "exceeding stiff" a geld, and the estimated total was not by any means attained. At this point, we learn from the "Chronicle," the king took deep thought, sought the advice of his wise men and decided to have an investigation made of the assessable land. In 1086, accordingly, the Domesday survey was undertaken and the king's officials placed in possession of information which we may assume led to a more satisfactory administration of the tax. The demesne land of the manorial lords was now in some cases made subject to assessment where before attempt had been made to include only the land of tenants. Waste land still escaped. There was a return in some areas to the older assessments, which had been decreased after 1066 by the generosity or prudence of the Conqueror, and it is to be observed that after the date of Domesday there was an alteration in the method of collection of geld. Previously it had been accounted for by hundreds and collected from individuals, including villein tenants. Afterwards the hundreds are neglected and we find the sheriff of the county collecting the money from tenants-in-chief who are presumably made responsible for the geld of their villeins. Dane-geld continued to be levied at intervals at 2s. on the ploughland until the year following the accession of Henry II, when it was given up as no longer worth collecting, so greatly had its yield decreased as a result of exemptions allowed by his predecessors. It was bringing in not more than £3,500, although it should have yielded £5,200. The donum and the auxilium took its place, and at future intervals taxes conceived on the same principle, but with different names, continued to be raised.

Danelagh (DANELAW, or DENALAGU).

The name given to that part of England where Danish blood, customs, and laws had to a greater or less extent modified, or usurped the place of, the corresponding Anglian features.

Roughly speaking, we may say that the Danish influence gradually lessened as the distance from Yorkshire increased. The extent of Daneland varied at different periods. The great stretch of country that was in later times included under the general name of the Danelagh seems to have been due to three, if not four, different colonizations. First came the settlement in Deira, which, beginning with the conquest of York in 867, was consummated when Halfdan separated from the southern here in 875, and next year divided Deira among his host. The southern part of this province may be considered as the very heart of the settlement, the district where the Danes were most numerous. Here the typical Danish endings thorpe and caster and by occur in the greatest profusion. But the Danes do not appear to have spread into Lancashire in any numbers, and the Norse names in Cumberland and Westmorland are probably due to invasions of another time and family. Nor do the Danes seem to have colonized beyond the Tees. Across this boundary river, with a few exceptions, the tons and the hams are the rule, and it is said that only four bys are to be found north of the last-named river. Beyond its banks are Chester-le-Street and Chesterwood; Stockton and Middleham take the place of Doncaster, Whitby, and Barwick. But even within the more strictly Danish districts of the north, we must not suppose an extirpation of the Anglian inhabitants. These being very near by blood and language to their conquerors, the latter came in merely as new lords, and an entirely fresh state of things was not set up. So Collingham lies close by Netherby and Alverthorpe by Wakefield, and Chester House not very far from North Allerton. The second great Danish colony was that of Lincoln, which seems to have spread down to the borders of Holland (a district distinctly non-Danish in its local nomenclature), and is marked by the same general features as the colony in Deira, only in a less degree. The heart of this settlement seems to have been in the Lindsey uplands. The partition of this part of the country took place probably in 877. The colonization of Lindsey seems to be distinct from that which included Leicester, Nottingham, Derby, and Northampton, and which, in some parts, even extended a few miles beyond Watling Street. In later years this settlement appears in history as embracing Lincoln, and is then known as the "Five Boroughs" (q.v.). The fourth and last important Danish conquest was that of East Anglia and Essex. But here the colonization must have been slight except in the northern and coastal districts. The typical Danish endings are comparatively rare both in Norfolk and Suffolk, and there is only one district that is largely characterized by the by termination: that lying round the mouth of the Yare. Such were the three or four great divisions of the Danish settlements in England, and their farthest extent is marked by the treaty of 886 between Alfred and Guthrum, as up the Thames to the Lea, along the Lea to its source, then to Bedford, and thence up the Ouse to Watling Street. But the whole of this territory can never have been in any strict sense Danish, and the greater part was gradually won back, and incorporated with the West Saxon monarchy. Under Edward the Elder, the greater part of Mercia and Essex was recovered; East Anglia submitted in 916, as did the Danish earldom of Northampton; while in 942 the Five Boroughs were finally won for the West Saxon crown. Meanwhile, the Danish kingdom of the north had been tottering, and was finally deprived of its independence by Edred (954).

There are, unfortunately, very few materials remaining from which to reconstruct the special features even of those divisions of the Danelagh where the Scandinavian influence was strongest. The two great settlements of Deira and Lindsey were divided into ridings, or trithings, and these again sub-divided into wapentakes—a term which corresponds with the hundreds of the south. The court of the trithing was superior to that of the wapentake, and this arrangement has been considered to point to a systematic division of the land, more especially as, in Yorkshire, all three ridings converge towards the town of York. In Domesday, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire appear as divided into wapentakes, but the trithing, as was to be expected, is not to be found in these counties. Northamptonshire and Rutland had both wapentakes and hundreds; while the East Anglian counties had neither trithing nor wapentake. East Anglia was for a time governed by its own Danish king, as was Deira in the north; but there does not appear to have been any such dignity in Lindsey or the Five Boroughs, though each of the five towns had its own army, with its own earl, and the occurrence of twelve lawmen in Lincoln and Stamford may perhaps point to a similar form of government in Leicester and the other two towns. The difference in law between Danish and West Saxon Britain cannot have been very great. The customs of compurgation (q.v.), wer-gild (q.v.), and other pecuniary compositions for the breach of the peace, were common to both races. But while, by Alfred's treaty with Guthrum, English and Danes were in East Anglia reckoned equally dear, in Yorkshire, the wer-gild of the Danish hold was greater than that of the Anglian or Saxon thegn. In the Danelagh there was a large number of small freeholders, and the free peasant class was much more numerous than in Anglo-Saxon England. The Danish districts were not feudalized to any extent before the Norman Conquest. That certain easily recognizable distinctions did separate the laws and customs of the Danelagh from those of Mercia and Wessex is clear from Edgar's declaration that "with the Danes such laws should stand as they best may choose"; or, again, that the Danes shall inflict punishment "according to their law." Canute recognizes the same distinction, which reappears even after the Conquest, till it vanishes away during the wars of Stephen. With Henry II the king's justice was in every land, and the historians of his reign, in using the term, show themselves uncertain what shires belong to this division.

The following are the shires reckoned in the Danelagh at different periods:—Yorkshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Derbyshire, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire. [DANES.]

Danes. The name "Dane" is often loosely employed to describe the Scandinavian freebooters and immigrants (whether from Denmark proper or not), whose incursions and settlements fill a large space in English history from the eighth to the eleventh century. They are alternatively known as "Northmen" or Vikings.

Freeman distinguished three stages of Danish invasion, in which the objects were plunder, settlement, and conquest respectively. (1) The first stage begins with the devastation of Northumbria, in 787. Every year saw fresh swarms of pirates pillaging the coasts, and sometimes penetrating far inland. Not only England, but all northern Europe, was exposed to these inroads, and as the triumphs of Charles the Great had made access to north Germany difficult, it was by sea that they commonly went on their forays. Their object was mainly plunder. Settlement or conquest was impossible. Scandinavia was cut up into so many petty states that the necessary degree of cohesion was hardly yet obtainable for combined efforts. Sated with booty, the sea-kings returned to their native dales and fjords, to sally forth again at the approach of summer. Fierce heathens as yet, they destroyed every Christian shrine and sanctuary, spread universal misery and want, and added a new and terrible danger to the many terrors of early mediæval times. (2) Within a century of the first inroads of the Vikings, a great revolution in Scandinavia began a new era. Great kings arose in the north, who subjected to themselves the wide districts that became known as Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The jarls or petty kinglets who ruled each harad (district or county) of Scandinavia were crushed into dependence on a new centralizing national power. Harold the Fair-haired (Hartagr) in Norway, Gorm the Old in Denmark, raised themselves by sheer personal vigour into the position of kings of the whole land. Eric of Upsala, to a lesser extent, made every district of Sweden and Gottland acknowledge the political and religious supremacy of the protector of the great sanctuary of Upsala. It was the same process which was consolidating England into a single state, and which afterwards became the source of the national idea. But as in England and Germany, the new development proved a deadly foe to the primitive Teutonic polity, which had survived till the eighth century in Scandinavia, just as it had been described by Tacitus in the first century in Germany. All conservative instincts revolted against the degradation of the sovereign jarl to the condition of personal subordination to the new monarch. The best and bravest of the Northmen abandoned their native land, and sought to win by their swords a new home for their old polity. Hence the great Scandinavian migrations of the ninth century. Again the Northmen poured into England, seeking, like the English themselves three centuries earlier, a definite settlement. The second half of the ninth century is the limit of this period; at its close half Britain was Danish. The formidable alliance of Danes and West Welsh, which Egbert crushed at Hengestesdun, perhaps marks the beginning of the change. Under Ethelred I of Wessex the crisis was reached. Between 867 and 869 Northumbria, long distracted by anarchy, accepted as monarch the dependent of the pagan invaders. In 868 Mercia was overrun, and in 870 the martyrdom of the sainted King Edmund attested the completeness of their conquest of East Anglia. In 871 the ruling kingdom of the West Saxons was invaded. A brilliant series of hard-fought battles taught the invader that Wessex was not so easy a prey as the subject states. When Ethelred died in the middle of the contest, his brother Alfred kept up the struggle. He succeeded in clearing his own territory at the expense of the overlordship won by Egbert. But Deira, Northumbria, and East Anglia were regularly occupied and symmetrically divided among the conquerors with the same numerical precision as marks the allotment of Iceland. A fresh invasion of Wessex in 878 reduced Alfred to the lowest pitch of degradation, but his marvellous revival led to the Peace of Chippenham (q.v.), which acknowledged the status quo, and seems to have given the Danes all the land north-east of Watling Street. The later "frith" of Alfred and Guthrum defined more clearly the Anglo-Danish boundary, and gave London and its environs into English hands. Within this Danelagh a new Scandinavia arose; and a new swarm of haradskonungr, like Guthrum of East Anglia, seemed to undo the work of the Pendas and Edwins. North of Deira an English line continued to reign in Bamburgh. While this was going on in England, other settlements were being effected in the north and west. Fresh swarms of Vikings who fled "from the tyranny of Harold Fairhair," colonized the Orkneys, Shetlands, Faroe, Hebrides, and the southern isles as far as Man, and in Sutherland and Caithness effected a settlement on the mainland. Indignant at their desertion, Harold went in person to subdue them to his sway. The boldest sought a remoter home in the hitherto desert Iceland, and thence in Greenland and Vinland (Massachusetts) are said to have established the first European colonies in the New World. Others went to the east coast of Ireland, where such names as Waterford and Wexford perpetuate the memory of the Viking state. Thence they inflicted severe blows on Wales and Strathclyde. The abundance of fords, holms, and garths in the region round Milford Haven testifies that the wandering sea-king found amidst the deep inlets of south-western Dyfed the likeness of the fjords of his northern home. Fainter traces of a possible settlement in Anglesey, clearer ones of an occupation of the lands round Solway Firth, mark the ubiquity of the sea-kings' ravages. Sometimes, as in the Orkneys and Shetlands, and in the extreme north of Scotland, they drove away the old Celtic inhabitants. In others they displayed that capacity for assimilation with the subject race that always marked their descendants. Outside the bounds of Britain, similar colonizing bands won Normandy from the Carolings, and effected smaller settlements on other parts of the Gaulish coast. Eastwards over the Baltic, Rurik and his Vikings founded a dynasty in Russia, whence the waranger carried the terror of the Scandinavian name to the court of the Eastern Cæsars. The Peace of Chippenham began a new period in the relation between English and Danes. For a century we hear little of fresh invasions from beyond sea, but a constant war went on between the Danes in England and the West Saxon monarchs who endeavoured to subdue them. Even the constant devastations of the "black pagans," which laid waste Carlisle, and harried with fearful effects Wales after the death of Howel Dda, were the work mostly of Danish settlers in Ireland, or of colonists among the Brythons themselves. The steps of this new struggle are as follows: Alfred rested content with the acknowledgment of his overlordship and the recognition of Christianity among the Danish settlers. Edward the Elder and his sister Ethelfleda, the "Lady of the Mercians" (q.v.), went a step farther by building a strong line of fortresses along the frontier of the Danelagh, which prevented further invasions of Wessex and West Saxon Mercia, and were starting-points for the subjection of the sons of the Vikings. Athelstan exceeded this by establishing friendly relations with the princes of Scandinavia, by defeating the great confederacy of Danes and Celts at Brunanburh, and by beginning the direct reconquest of the lands ceded at Chippenham. Edred, or Dunstan his minister, completed the process by the conquest of Northumbria and the assumption of imperial titles. Edgar, called first to power by the northern and Danish half of the nation, consolidated the process by renewing the liberal, yet effectual, policy of Dunstan. Under him, the Danes became Englishmen, and the Danelagh a merely legal distinction. The reconquest was thus completed. With Ethelred the Unready everything went wrong, and before long the dangers of the eighth and ninth centuries were revived by fresh plunderings of new Viking hordes from Scandinavia. But the first stage thus renewed soon led to the second coming back, and the kings of the north were now too powerful to brook subjects establishing new Normandies or Icelands at their expense. Hence they resolved to take part in these expeditions of plunder and settlement, and thus Freeman's third stage of political conquest, a stage never attained on the continent, begins. The King of all Denmark now set to work to conquer all England. After many failures, Sweyn succeeded in his attempt and handed down his power to his greater son, Canute, who reigned as legal King of England with the assent of the English people, which, if formal at first, became ultimately as real as any such popular recognitions were, and was only withdrawn when the quarrels and misconduct of Hardicanute and Harold led to the restoration of the West Saxon line in Edward the Confessor.

The really important Danish period of English history now ends; but Viking forages were still not unknown, and expeditions of Danish and Norse princes were continued for nearly a century. In England, the great invasion of the heroic Harold Hardrada (q.v.) in 1066 might, if successful, have placed another Danish dynasty on the throne. All through the Conqueror's reign similar, if fainter, assaults were feared in the nominal interest of the English cause. The extraordinary career of Magnus of Norway among the Western Isles, ending in his war in Anglesey with the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury in 1098, was the last exploit of the Vikings that has any direct relation to English history. Brian Boru's (q.v.) victory of Clontarf (1014) (q.v.) was the death-blow to the Scandinavian states in Ireland. But in Scotland, though Caithness was annexed in 1196, it was not till 1263 that the battle of Largs (q.v.) put an end to their capacity for aggression, and led to the annexation of the Western Islands to Scotland; but they retained their ecclesiastical dependence on Trondhjem till the fifteenth century, when also the Orkneys and their dependencies were practically handed over to James III.

Apart from the general misery and want, these plunderings were too irregular to leave any deeply-seated effects behind them. A retrogression towards barbarism, the decline of learning and culture that attended the sack of the Mercian abbeys, a partial forcing on of the feudalizing tendency as best adapted for defence, is all that can safely be ascribed to them. Little positively can be affirmed of the results of the Danish Conquest, either on the nation generally or on those special districts which became Danish by the Peace of Chippenham. That they had a bracing effect upon the nation can safely be conjectured, but Robertson's argument that "a greater amount of freedom existed in the Danelagh than in Wessex and English Mercia" seems likely to be justified by modern research in Danelagh history. Still, there can be no doubt that the advent of a new race, whose very object in emigration was to preserve their ancient polity unstained by the innovations of Harfagr, did largely tend to strengthen at a time of weakness the traditional institutions of the English, and so in this respect to retard the territorializing tendency. On the other hand, however, the effect of the increased militarism which foreign invasion necessitated was directly feudal. If the Danes put off the unity of England by undoing the work of Offa, Edwin, and Egbert, they made it more certain in the end by the effacement of tribal distinctions, and by the consolidation of what remained English, which directly followed the struggle with them. But it is very improbable that the Danes introduced many definite changes in law or custom. The peculiar usages of the Danelagh may as much be Anglian as Danish. Anyhow, the fact that the Danelagh was a territory, within which all of whatever race acknowledged the "Danish custom," shows that absence of personal law is important in English history. The Danes never dispossessed the Anglian population; their institutions, so far as we know them, were fundamentally the same as the English. As soon as they became Christians they were practically Englishmen, just as the Normans became Frenchmen, only in both cases there was a superior vigour, a survival of the old Viking days. Traces in local nomenclature; the substitution of "by" for "tun"; the "forces," "nesses," "fords," and "holms" of north England; the division into wapentakes and ridings, are clearly Danish; but such effects are purely superficial. The same thing took a new name. The wite, the doom, the ealdorman, the frith, became the lahsit, lah, jarl, and grith. But as the Northman became French in Normandy, so he became Anglian in Mercia and Goidelic in Man—which, though the very centre of Norse power, retains to this day its Celtic speech, while half the place-names of the island keep their original form. Only in the region of government where a thoroughly Norse institution was superimposed on a Celtic polity, to the extinction of the latter, is the Danish influence clearly displayed. In the Hebrides the clans survived the Norse jarls, although the local names betray Norse influence. We may conjecture that the Danish settlement began the series of events that has made South Pembrokeshire an English-speaking district. In Orkney and Shetland, Caithness and Sunderland, alone did the conquest extend so thoroughly as to supersede the old language for one which, under later influences, easily became English. Though great changes followed Canute's domination, it is very hard to say what part of them followed on the introduction of Northern customs and institutions. Even the introduction of housecarls (q.v.) added no new element to English development. No one now believes that Canute's "forest-law" was Danish. Canute's idea of a northern empire could more easily be got from the history of Edgar than from any precedents of anarchic Scandinavia. In fact, England had more influence on Denmark and Norway than these latter had on her. Canute's reign is of the greatest political importance, as producing on a small scale the same tendencies that were afterwards developed to a greater extent by the Norman Conquest. But only very indirectly can Danish influence be said to be a factor in this process. The Northern antiquaries, who refer every point of similarity with their own state to Danish influence on England, ignore how much both have in common, and the assimilative capacity of a barbarous but vigorous race in contact with one of superior, though only slightly superior, civilization. Dangerfield, THOMAS (d. 1685), the inventor of the "Meal-Tub Plot" (q.v.), was a man of profligate life, who had been more than once branded, whipped, and imprisoned for felony. His disclosures implicating the Presbyterian leaders were not believed, and his retraction and subsequent accusation of the Catholics led fortunately to no judicial murders, as in the case of his fellow-informers, Oates and Bedloe. [POPISH PLOT.] On the accession of James II, Dangerfield was convicted of libel in connexion with the Meal-Tub Plot (q.v.), and was put in the pillory and whipped. On his way back to prison he was brutally assaulted by a Roman Catholic lawyer named Francis, and shortly afterwards died.

Darcy, THOMAS, LORD (d. 1537), was a faithful subject of the Crown throughout the reign of Henry VII. During the Cornish outbreak of 1497, being made one of the royal commissioners appointed for a thorough investigation of the various circumstances of the rebellion, he showed his zeal for the king by the merciless severity of his proceedings. Later on, in the same year, Darcy accompanied the Earl of Surrey in his hasty march to the relief of Norham Castle, then closely besieged by the Scots under James IV and Perkin Warbeck; and it was presumably as a reward for his services on this occasion that he was appointed in 1498 to the constabship of Bamburgh Castle and the captaincy of the town of Berwick. In 1505 he became warden of the East and Middle Marches of Scotland. Darcy's suspected sympathy with the insurrection that broke out in Lincolnshire in 1537, and his unmistakable co-operation with the Yorkshire nobles in the popular rising known as the "Pilgrimage of Grace" (q.v.), which immediately succeeded the Lincolnshire revolt, were circumstances which at once singled him out for the vengeance of Thomas Cromwell. A very brief examination was sufficient to prove Darcy's treasonable connexion with the rioters of 1537, and he was accordingly beheaded on June 30 of that year.

Dardanelles, THE PASSAGE OF THE, was accomplished in 1807 by Sir John Duckworth, who thus lent considerable aid to the Russian troops invading Moldavia and Wallachia. A desultory fire was opened on the British ships from both the European and Asiatic sides of the straits, but without much effect. An ultimatum was sent to the Turkish government, which opened negotiations in order to save time. So successful and speedy were their defences that the British admiral determined at last to retrace his steps (March 1, 1807)—a feat which he accomplished under heavy fire. Admiral Duckworth then contented himself with blockading the straits. The expedition, though unsuccessful in its results, was well planned, and calculated, had it succeeded, to have strengthened very materially the resistance offered by Russia to Napoleon.

Dardanelles Expedition, THE (February 1915–January 1916), began as a naval offensive directed towards opening up allied communications with Russia through the Mediterranean and the Black Sea, but was soon extended to involve five military divisions under Sir Ian Hamilton (two British, one Australian, one of New Zealand troops, and one French). The naval attack failed on March 18, and while Sir Ian Hamilton was concentrating his preparations in Egypt the Turks under Marshal Liman von Sanders fortified the straits and organized a defence comprising six divisions. The landing on the Gallipoli Peninsula was effected on the nights of April 23 and 24—the British at Cape Helles, the French at Kum Kale, and the Dominion troops at Anzac Cove—giving the allies two precarious and exposed footholds in the peninsula and one on the mainland. Reinforcements arrived in May, but little advance was made, and five more divisions were sent out in June. July was spent in preparations for an attack. On the night of August 6 the allied offensive opened—simultaneous attacks at Sari Bair (a mountainous region north of Anzac) and Suvla Bay (the northern extremity of the peninsula). Successful resistance was offered by the Turks at Anzac during the four days following, while opportunities were lost at Suvla and the Turks allowed to concentrate their defences. By August 11 neither attack had any chance of success. The Turks held the heights around Suvla, and the Anzac position was badly exposed. After August 21 no serious offensive was undertaken. General Byng succeeded to the command, but no reinforcements could be spared from the West.

Slender hopes, coupled with the trend of the Serbian and Salonika campaigns, led to the discussion of withdrawal as early as September. Lord Kitchener, who went out to visit the Dardanelles area in the autumn, reported that evacuation was the only justifiable course. Instructions to withdraw from Anzac and Suvla were ultimately sent to Sir Charles Monro (the new commander-in-chief) on December 8. But Monro had anticipated them, and his evacuation of the two posts was almost complete by December 18. Orders to withdraw from Helles soon followed, and in adverse weather the last detachments were embarked secretly on the night of January 8, 1916. The failure of the campaign can be ascribed chiefly to the initial naval attack, which warned the Turks and prompted them to fortify the peninsula, and to the allies' inability to provide reinforcements.

Darien Company, THE. After founding the Bank of England in 1694 [BANKING], William Paterson conceived the idea of inaugurating a company in which the Scots should find a field for their enterprise equal to that possessed by the English in the East India Company. The trade with eastern and southern Asia had long been passing round by the Cape, and was virtually in the hands of this great company. Paterson therefore argued that by establishing a colony at Darien the eastern world might more directly exchange its products with the western. In 1695 an act was passed in the Scottish parliament, giving to the newly-formed African Company, whose directors were equally divided between England and Scotland, special and peculiar powers to make settlements and build cities, harbours, and fortifications in Asia, Africa, or America. They were likewise authorized to make alliances with distant powers in these three parts of the world, and to defend themselves if attacked; while to restrain private adventurers, all other Scotsmen were prohibited from trading in the districts occupied by the company. But when the news of this concession reached England the parliament at Westminster was loud in condemning such unwarranted privileges granted to the northern kingdom, and William III was forced to disown his commissioner's act, and withdraw, as King of England, the charter which as King of Scotland he had granted his representative. The result of this outcry was that the English capital was withdrawn from the scheme, and its whole burden thrown on the Scots, who soon subscribed a nominal sum of £400,000, of which, however, it appears that only a little more than half was actually paid up. It was not all at once that Paterson made known the exact spot at which he would fix his great station, and even when the fleet was ready to sail, in 1698, its destination was not precisely known. A few vessels had been procured from Amsterdam and Hamburg, the largest of which would have been one of the smallest in the English navy, and the expedition set sail under the guidance of a council of seven. The cargo laid in seems to have comprised just the things which would not be wanted by the inhabitants of the region to which they were being sent. Huge periwigs, heavy woollen stuffs, and hundreds of English Bibles were scarce likely to meet the needs of the Spaniards or Indians dwelling in a tropical clime. After suffering some privation from lack of provisions, the fleet anchored off the Isthmus of Darien, and taking possession of the country, called it New Caledonia, and at once commenced to dig trenches for their city of New Edinburgh. Negotiations were opened with the natives, and attempts were made to inaugurate the representative government which had been decided upon at home. Meanwhile the site of the new settlement became known in Europe; the Spanish ambassador was loud in his complaints, and preparations were made in the Spanish ports for an expedition against the intruders. But in Scotland the frenzy increased, and in August 1699 four more ships were dispatched to the isthmus, with thirteen hundred men on board. But by the time the new expedition reached its destination the preceding one had disappeared. Unable to toil in the tropical heat, and unaccustomed to tropical foods, the Scottish settlers perished by scores, till at last the survivors, disregarding Paterson's entreaties to be left with a few companions to welcome the reinforcements from home, put off for New York; and four months later the second expedition found the site of New Edinburgh a wilderness. It was in vain that they attempted to reconstruct the colony. Dissensions broke out, and mortality was high; and to crown all, a Spanish squadron anchored off their walls. With great difficulty a negotiation was opened between men of two nations who seem not to have had any acquaintance with each other's language, and by the middle of April the Scottish party had set sail for home, having lost, in little more than four months, nearly a quarter of their number.

Dartmouth, WILLIAM LEGGE, 1ST EARL OF (1672-1750). [LEGGE.]

Dashwood, SIR FRANCIS, created Baron le Despencer (1708-81), the son of Sir Francis Dashwood by Lady Mary Fane, obtained his chief claim to celebrity in early life by his reckless immorality and profaneness. From such scenes as those of his "Franciscan Abbey" at Medmenham, Sir Francis was summoned to become treasurer of the chamber in 1761, in which office Bute found him so convenient a creature that on becoming prime minister he appointed him chancellor of the exchequer. Wilkes well understood the absurdity of the appointment, when he said that "from puzzling all his life at tavern bills he was called by Lord Bute to administer the finances of a kingdom above one hundred millions in debt." To remedy this deficit the new chancellor proposed to levy a tax on cider, which at once produced an outcry so loud that the proposed tax had to be much reduced. Even then it was productive of much hardship, and served only to add to the unpopularity of Bute's administration. Dashwood had at any rate the good sense to perceive his own incompetence. "People," he said, "will point at me in the streets, and say, 'There goes the worst chancellor of the exchequer that ever appeared.'" As a reward for his services he was created Baron le Despencer, and with his elevation to the peerage he retired from the political world (1763).

Daubeney, GILES, LORD (d. 1508), was raised to the peerage in 1486, in recognition of his services during the period of Henry VII's exile. Shortly after receiving this proof of royal favour, he was made deputy governor of Calais, and while acting in that capacity he headed the expedition dispatched from England with secret instructions to lend all possible assistance to the Emperor Maximilian. These orders Daubeney executed with marked success, and compelled the French to raise the siege of Dixmude. By a well-timed attack on their camp he inflicted upon them severe losses, slaying over 8,000 men, and capturing a considerable quantity of military stores. During the Cornish revolt Daubeney was a trusted leader of the king's forces. His energetic attack on the rebels at Deptford Strand precipitated the general engagement at Blackheath (1497), which ended so victoriously for Henry.

David I, KING OF SCOTLAND (s. April 27, 1124; d. May 24, 1153), youngest son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, sister of Edgar the Atheling, succeeded to the crown of Scotland on the death of his brother, Alexander I. Educated at the English court, owing to the marriage of his sister Matilda with Henry I, he became thoroughly imbued with the spirit of feudalism. On his brother Edgar's death (1107) he returned to Scotland as earl of the country south of the Forth and Clyde (Cumbria). David had at this time married Matilda, daughter of the English Earl Waltheof, and in her right held the English honours of Huntingdon and Northampton. On the death of his brother Alexander (1124), he added the territory north of the Forth and Clyde to that which he already ruled, and thus united the whole of Scotland. The result of his early education speedily became apparent in his introduction of feudal institutions and his application of feudal principles throughout almost the whole of Scotland. He reorganized the administrative system on lines parallel to those followed in England, and introduced the Norman institution of the jury or sworn inquest. These innovations, hateful to most of the northern nobles, led, during David's absence in England, to a rebellion, headed by Angus, Earl of Moray, and Malcolm, natural son of Alexander (1130). The insurgents, however, were soon defeated, and their leader slain. Four years later a fresh insurrection was planned, but was defeated by Anglo-Norman aid. In 1136 David, who had, in his capacity of English earl, taken the oath of allegiance to Matilda, entered England at the head of a large army to support his niece against Stephen of Blois, her rival claimant for the English crown. A peace was concluded, but not kept. David persistently ravaged the north of England, and the war was only brought to an end in 1138, when he was defeated at the famous Battle of the Standard (q.v.). Shortly afterwards, in 1139, another peace was made which assigned to David's son Henry the earldom of Northumbria, to be held as a fief of the English Crown. In 1141, after the capture of Stephen at Lincoln, David again joined his niece, narrowly escaping capture at Winchester; and in 1149 he knighted Henry of Anjou at Carlisle. He died at Carlisle in May 1153. David I acquired a very considerable reputation for sanctity. He was the founder of several new abbeys—notably those of Holyrood and Melrose—and was the founder or the reorganizer of several Scottish bishoprics. He introduced into Scotland the new monastic orders, and especially favoured the Cistercians. The burghs of Edinburgh, Berwick, Roxburgh, Stirling, and perhaps Perth, were founded by him.

David II, KING OF SCOTLAND (s. June 9, 1329, d. February 22, 1371), was the son of King Robert Bruce. In accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Northampton, he was married (1328) to the Princess Joanna of England, sister of Edward III. At the time of his father's death (1329) he was only five years of age, and the kingdom was consequently governed by regents. In 1334, on the invasion and triumph of Edward Balliol (q.v.), he fled to France, and did not return till 1341. While in France his hostility to England increased, as well as his friendship for the land that sheltered him, and he was led by these feelings to cross the border in 1346 in support of Philip of France. In Edward's absence the northern barons were hurriedly called to arms, and defeated the invading army at Neville's Cross. David was himself taken prisoner, and was not released till 1357 under the terms of the Treaty of Berwick. For the rest of his reign he was involved in financial difficulties, due partly to his personal extravagance, but mainly to the heavy ransom exacted by the English king. His extortions formed the excuse for a baronial revolt under the leadership of the Earl of Douglas, Robert the Steward, and the Earl of March, who were further alienated as a result of David's imprudent second marriage. In despair the king attempted to come to terms with Edward III, and to secure the remission of the arrears of his ransom in return for the acknowledgment of Edward or one of his sons as heir to the Scottish throne. When, however, he placed the proposal before the Scottish estates in 1364, it was peremptorily rejected. The remainder of his reign was occupied in disputes with his parliament, which showed a "surly resoluteness" in checking the abuses of the royal prerogative. He died in the year 1371.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

David, PRINCE OF NORTH WALES, was the brother of Llewelyn. There was keen rivalry between the two, and on several occasions David rose in revolt against his brother. In 1274 he formed a plot with Gruffudd, son of the lord of Powys, to slay Llewelyn. The plot was betrayed, and David fled to England, where he threw in his lot with Edward I. In 1277 he joined the English king in his expedition against the Welsh; and when Llewelyn surrendered, one of the first conditions of the peace was the reconciliation of the two brothers. But David, although Edward had married him to the daughter of the Earl of Derby, and granted him extensive territories in Wales and England, soon found cause of complaint against his patron. The two brothers united against the stranger. In March 1282 David surprised Hawarden Castle, and the marches were laid waste. After Llewelyn's death, however, David was betrayed to the English by his own countrymen. He was tried at Shrewsbury (September 30, 1283). Earls, barons, judges, knights of the shires, and twenty solemn members were all present on this solemn occasion; but the baronage alone can be considered as the peers of the culprit. He was condemned to death and executed with circumstances of special horror as a traitor and a murderer.

Davis, JOHN (d. 1605), one of the famous explorers of Elizabeth's reign, was born near Dartmouth. He made three voyages in search of a north-west passage to the Pacific. In the first (1585) he coasted round the south of Greenland and Baffin's Land across the strait that now bears his name, and in the third (1587) he reached the entrance of Hudson's Strait. In 1591 he accompanied Thomas Cavendish (q.v.) to the South Seas, continuing his voyage when the rest of the expedition had returned. In later years his services were employed in journeys to the East Indies on behalf of the newly-founded company; and it was on his return from one of these expeditions that he met with his fate—being killed by Japanese pirates off the island of Mintang (near Singapore) in 1605.

Davis, MARY, or MOLL (fl. 1663-9), was a natural daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, and one of Charles II's mistresses. She had by the king one daughter, Mary Tudor, who was married to the Earl of Derwentwater.

Davison, WILLIAM (d. 1608), one of the diplomatists of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was sent in 1575 to the Low Countries to report on the state of affairs; in 1579 he revisited Holland, and four years later was again employed to counteract Scottish influence there. In 1586 he became a principal secretary of state, and was in favour of the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots; it is well known how he was made the scapegoat of the other ministers for his excess of zeal in dispatching the warrant for the execution (1587), after he had procured Elizabeth's signature to it. It will always remain a moot point how far the queen was really ignorant of the nature of the paper she had signed, and of its dispatch, but it is probable that she found it convenient to act as she did towards Davison in order to clear herself as far as possible of the charge of having desired Mary's death; whilst Davison's repeated declarations that the queen herself had ordered the warrant to be sent off did not tend to pacify her resentment. The unfortunate secretary was brought to trial, February 1587, heavily fined and imprisoned, and in spite of the attempts of Essex and Burghley to procure his pardon, was never restored to favour.

Biography by Sir N. H. Nicholas, 1823.

Day, GEORGE, Bishop of Chichester (1501-1556), was educated at Cambridge, and became provost of King's College, 1538. He was a strenuous opponent of the religious changes of the reign of Edward VI, and was accordingly committed to the Fleet (1550) and deprived of his bishopric (which he had held since 1543). Mary restored him, however (1553), and appointed him with Gardiner, Tunstall, and Bonner to purify the episcopal bench.

Deane, HENRY (d. 1503), was Prior of Llanthony, in Monmouthshire, and entering Henry VII's service, was employed in several public offices. When Sir Edward Poynings became lord-deputy of Ireland, Deane was appointed chancellor of Ireland (1494), and did valuable service in aiding Poynings's work of restoring order and regular government in that country. At the time of his Irish chancellorship, Deane was bishop-elect of Bangor, and in 1501, on the death of Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, was appointed to succeed him as primate of all England. Whilst Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Deane was in some degree a patron of Wolsey, whom he made his domestic chaplain. He died February 15, 1503.

Deane, RICHARD (1610-53), son of Edward Deane, of Temple Guyting, Gloucestershire, entered the Parliamentary army at the beginning of the Civil War, and served in the artillery under Essex, until taken prisoner in the unfortunate Cornish campaign of 1644. In the "New Model" (q.v.) he was comptroller of the ordnance, and in 1648 had risen to the rank of adjutant-general. He commanded the right wing of Cromwell's army at Preston, was present also at Worcester, and took part in the subjugation of the Highlands. He was deep in the confidence of Cromwell, sided with the army against the Parliament, and with the Independents against the Presbyterians, took his seat in the court which tried the king, and helped to secure the adhesion of the fleet to the Protectorate. In 1649 he had been appointed one of the three generals at sea, in which capacity he commanded in the Dutch War, and was killed in the battle off the North Foreland, June 2, 1653. He seems to have deserved the character Essex records of him in 1644: "an honest, judicious, and stout man."

Debt, LEGISLATION CONCERNING. Among the Teutonic tribes it does not seem that a contract was concluded by any set form of words or by writing, as was the custom among the Romans: earnest money was paid, or the bargain concluded by the delivery of a straw or some similar token. But in questions of sale it was necessary to have witnesses to the transaction, and in early English law a varying number of upright men were assigned to each hundred and burh, for the purpose of testifying every such negotiation. So a statute of Ethelred I runs: "Let no man either buy or exchange unless he have burh and witness"; while Edgar's law requires thirty-three witnesses for the larger burhs, but only twelve for the hundreds and smaller towns. No one in Anglo-Saxon times was allowed to take the law into his own hands and right himself before bringing his claim before the proper court, and demanding justice four times. We may suppose similar methods of procedure in matters of debt to have continued in the local courts, subject to more or less change, during the reigns of the Norman and early Plantagenet kings; though, as Stubbs has remarked, alterations are slowest in the routine business of the petty courts. There are still extant several writs for debt issued by Henry I, some being addressed to the defendant. Two reigns later the writs for debt found in Glanvil are addressed to the sheriff, who is to refer the case, if necessary, to the king at Westminster. Debt was just beginning to be a question for the king's court. In Glanvil's time the method of deciding questions of debt was unsettled, both compurgation and the duel being allowed. Later on, compurgation won the day. With the reign of Edward I we find a statute upon the question, forbidding anyone to be distrained for debts not due (3 Ed. I). By an act passed in the 21st year of James I, a term of six years is set, within which alone the recovery of debts is legal; while another act under the same king forbids a tradesman's books to be given in evidence for a debt unless the action be brought within a year. An act of George II allowed the debt of the plaintiff to be set off against the debt of the defendant. In Norman times there was considerable difficulty in making lands liable for the debts of a man after his decease; and even in the debtor's lifetime there must have been a similar difficulty, till Edward I, in the Second Statute of Westminster, empowered a creditor who had obtained a judgment in his favour to take a moiety of the debtor's lands, and satisfy himself so far as he could. Imprisonment for debt was practically abolished by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 (1869), and punishments were provided for fraudulent debtors.

Deccan was the name originally applied to the whole peninsula of India south of the Vindhya hills. It was conquered by the Mohammedans in the fourteenth century and formed into a kingdom. Long before the advance of the British into Central India it had been broken up among a variety of princes and feudatories, and the term Deccan came to be technically confined to the dominions of the Nizam (q.v.).

Decianus, CATUS, was procurator in Britain when Boudicca rose in rebellion against the Romans, and his extortion is said to have been one of the chief causes of the revolt. At the siege of Camulodunum, the Roman colonists appealed to Catus for help, since Suetonius Paulinus, the legate, was away in Mona, but he sent only 200 soldiers to their aid. After the fall of Camulodunum, Catus fled to Gaul.

Declaration, THE ROYAL (November 30, 1660). When Charles II was restored, the Irish Royalists naturally hoped for the restoration of their lands; but though, strictly speaking, their hopes were justifiable, it was practically inexpedient, if not impossible, for Charles to destroy existing arrangements. After a commission had sat, and the conflicting claims of the Irish and the Puritans had been argued before it, a document called "The Royal Declaration" was issued. This excepted from all indemnity two classes: those concerned in the Ulster Massacre, and those concerned in regicide. Protestant loyalists and certain favoured persons, such as Clanrickard and Mountgarret, were to be reinstated in their possessions at once; "innocent papists" were also to be restored, but the adventurers and soldiers were to be left undisturbed or compensated. Those who had accepted lands in Connaught were, however, to abide by their bargains; but those who had not done so were to have their cases considered in due time. This declaration formed the basis of the first Act of Settlement (q.v.).

Declaratory Act. (1) In 1766 the Stamp Act of 1765 (q.v.) was repealed and a Declaratory Act substituted for it by the Rockingham ministry, declaring the right of parliament to legislate for the colonies on all matters, including taxation. The bill passed, despite Pitt's opposition. Its effect was to keep alive the American resentment roused by the Stamp Act. (2) In 1788 Pitt brought in a bill to explain the purport of the India Act of 1784. It declared that there was no step which could have been taken by the court of directors before the passing of that bill touching the military and political concerns of India, and the collection, management, and application of the revenues, which the board of control had not a right to take by the provisions of that bill: that, in fact, the whole powers of government had been transferred to the Crown. [INDIA, ADMINISTRATION OF.]

De Donis Conditionalibus (1285) is the title by which the Second Statute of Westminster (q.v.) is generally known. The second clause of this statute is of great importance as bearing upon the relations between lord and vassal. In the thirteenth century "conditional gifts," e.g., gifts of land to a husband and wife, or to an individual man or woman and "the heirs of their bodies," had been becoming increasingly common, their purpose being to restrict the donee's freedom of alienation by expressly providing that the land should descend to a particular class of heirs. The interpretation put upon such gifts by the royal courts tended, however, in many cases to defeat the intentions of the settlors. As soon as an heir was born to the donee (whether or not he survived), the conditions of the grant were held to have been fulfilled, and the donee might alienate the land as he chose, creating in favour of the alienee an estate which would hold good against any subsequent claim on the part of the alienor's issue, and which would endure though such issue became extinct. The object of the statute of 1285 was to prevent donees of conditional gifts from thus depriving both their own issue and the donor or his heirs of their rights in the land. It enacted that henceforward estates should always descend in accordance with the will of the donor as expressed in the charter of gift. Thus the "conditional fee" was converted into the "fee tail," so called because its descent was "cut down" (talliatum) to the heirs of the body of the donee, in the event of whose failure the estate reverted to the donor. The establishment of the system of perpetual entail marks an important stage in the development of the law of real property.

Dee, THE BRIDGE OF (1639), was the scene of an action between the Cavalier party in Aberdeen and the Covenanting forces under Montrose. The Cavaliers had hurriedly run up defences of turf and stone to protect the crooked and narrow passage of the seven-arched bridge, and held out against the enemy's cannon for a whole day (June 17). Next day Montrose, by a feigned attempt to cross the river at a neighbouring ford, drew off a great part of the Cavalier forces, and with his remaining troops forced the bridge, despite the opposition of the fifty Cavaliers still left to defend it.

Deeg, THE BATTLE OF (November 13, 1804), was fought between the British, commanded by General Fraser, and the army of Holkar. The latter was completely routed, and left 87 pieces of cannon on the field. But the victory was purchased by the death of the general, and a loss of 643 killed and wounded. The command devolved on Colonel Monson, who ordered up a battering-train and captured the fortress on November 23.

Deering, FATHER (d. 1534), was a monk of Henry VIII's reign, who was executed May 5, 1534, for the active part he took in the promotion of the conspiracy set on foot under the auspices of the so-called "Holy Maid of Kent."

"De Facto" King, STATUTE OF (1495), was the famous act of Henry VII which declared service to an existing king to be no treason to his successor. It was necessitated partly by the insecurity felt by nobles of all parties in times of constant civil war and rebellion, and partly by Henry's desire to consolidate his power by winning over the remainder of the Yorkists. It provided that every man was bound by his allegiance to serve "the king for the time being," and that no person serving the existing king should be convicted of high treason or, by act of parliament or other process of law, suffer thereafter any forfeiture or imprisonment. The Statute De Facto was the subject of much discussion in 1660 during the trial of the regicides, and again after the Revolution of 1688.

Defender of the Faith (FIDEI DEFENSOR). This title was first conferred on Henry VIII by Pope Leo X, in 1521. Even so early as June 1518, when Luther's doctrines were only just beginning to make a stir in Europe, we find allusions to Henry's book of controversy against the reformer; but it was not till more than three years later, when the king's zeal had received a fresh impulse from the publication of "De Captivitate Babylonica," with its fierce attack upon the seven sacraments of the Roman Church, that the royal author put the finishing touches to his work. Clerk, the English ambassador at Rome, received instructions to present the book to the pope, who read with avidity the opening pages, expressing his pleasure at almost every line by a nod or word of approval. The king, said the pope, had passed the clerks in their own fields. Several copies were, at Leo's request, placed in the hands of some of the principal cardinals; and a little later Leo received the ambassador in a consistory of twenty bishops, approved the book, and next day conferred on its author the title "Fidei Defensor" (October 11, 1521). This title is said to have been intended as a compensation for the title "Rex Christianissimus," which Julius II had declared to be forfeited by the King of France, and had conferred upon the King of England, but which Leo could never be brought to recognize. Henry's defence of the seven sacraments, "Assertio Septem Sacramentorum," was published at London in July 1521, and rapidly passed through many editions; it was translated into German in 1523, and into English a few years later. Luther published a fierce reply within a year, and affected to consider the work so contemptible a treatise that it must have been written by a "parcel of empty-headed sophists," who abused the king's name by prefixing it to a work "stuffed full of their own lies and virulence." When Henry broke with the papacy, Pope Paul III deprived him of the title of "Defender of the Faith," but in 1544 it was confirmed to him by parliament, and has since been used by all his successors on the English throne.

Defenders, THE, were a party in Ireland that owed their origin to a faction fight between Catholics and Protestants on July 4, 1784. The Protestants were called Peep o' Day Boys (q.v.), as they visited the dwellings of the Catholic defenders early in the morning and took away their arms. The great faction fight of these two parties was the battle of Diamond (q.v.). In 1793 the Defenders rose in great numbers, nominally to prevent the enrolment of the militia, and, although pacified in September 1795, were soon in activity again. The name disappears from history after 1798, when the party was merged into that of the United Irishmen. The causes of their existence were to a large extent agrarian.

Defoe, DANIEL (1661-1733), was the son of a London butcher, named Foe—the former himself adopted the French prefix. He was educated in the doctrines of Dissent and Whiggism. As an opponent of the designs of James II, he fought in the rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth, and was fortunate enough to escape. Shortly afterwards he published a pamphlet, warning the Dissenters against the designs of the king. After the Revolution he engaged in trade, and was appointed secretary to the commission for managing the duties on glass. In 1698 his "Essay on Projects" appeared. He also published a treatise on Occasional Conformity, and another in favour of a standing army, "with the consent of parliament"; one against the impending French war, and one "On the Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England." In 1701 his "True-born Englishman" appeared, a satire with the object of reproaching those who abused William as a foreigner. The same year he drew up the "Legion Memorial," an expression of public opinion in favour of William's European designs, elicited by the treatment that the presenters of the Kentish petition received from the Commons. In 1702 he published his famous pamphlet, "The Shortest Way with Dissenters," an ironical performance, written in High Church language, which deceived even the Dissenters themselves. The High Church party brought the work before the notice of the House, and it was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman. Defoe surrendered himself to justice, and was fined, put in the pillory, and imprisoned (1703). From Newgate he issued the Review, a periodical paper, which was the predecessor of the more famous Spectator of Steele. In 1704 he was released by the exertions of Harley, who sought to win him over to the Tory side. Money was sent him by the queen to pay his fine. In 1706 he published a satire on the High Churchmen. He was sent to Scotland to assist the commission for the Union; and his commercial knowledge proved of use to the English government, while at the same time he aided them with his pen. His history of the Union was published in 1709. A satirical piece, entitled "A Seasonable Caution," against the Pretender, which he vindicated in the Review, caused his second imprisonment in Newgate (1711); again Harley procured his freedom. On the accession of George I he was treated with neglect, and exposed to attacks from the Whigs on account of his friendship with Harley. He therefore published "An Appeal to Honour and Justice, though it be to my Worst Enemies," as a vindication of his political career. After this he ceased to write openly on political subjects, though it is probable that he was largely engaged in surreptitious political journalism.

De Grey, THOMAS PHILIP, EARL (1781-1859), was the eldest son of Thomas Robinson, second Lord Grantham. On his father's death, he entered the House of Lords as Lord Grantham, 1786, and, on the death of his maternal aunt, the Countess de Grey, succeeded to the earldom (1833). In 1834-5 he held the office of first lord of the admiralty under Sir Robert Peel. When Peel again took office, in 1841, Earl de Grey was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, until his retirement in 1844.

De Hæretico Comburendo was the title of a statute promulgated in 1401 against the Lollards. It was enacted on the urgent petition of the clergy, a petition couched in more moderate terms being presented at the same time by the Commons. By this statute a heretic convicted before the spiritual court who refused to recant, or relapsed after recantation, was to be handed over to the civil power to be burned. Archbishop Arundel was the prime mover in the matter, and Henry was probably not unwilling to crush the Lollards, who were popularly associated with the party of Richard II and who had massed in large numbers in London, with the probable intention of overawing parliament.

Deira was the name given to the ancient Anglian kingdom stretching from the Tees or the Tyne to the Humber, and extending inland to the borders of the British realm of Strathclyde. Like Kent and some other districts of Britain, it seems to have retained a British name, both for the land and its inhabitants, long after it had been conquered by the Teutonic tribes; for the words Deira and Deiri appear to be both related to the old Welsh Deivr. In all probability, both Deira and its northern neighbour, Bernicia, were, like Mercia, originally colonized by several tribes, each under its own leader. We read in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" that Ida established the kingdom of Bernicia in 547—a phrase which may fairly enough be interpreted as implying that he united into one all the petty settlements existing in his time. The Deiran kingship begins a few years later in 560 with Ella. On his death (588), Ethelric of Bernicia drove out Ella's young son, Edwin, and seized Deira, and his son Ethelfrith succeeded him in 593 in the rule of both kingdoms. Edwin, meanwhile, had taken refuge with Redwald, King of the East Angles, and the two together met, and overthrew Ethelfrith in 617. Edwin in his turn now united Deira and Bernicia; but, as if to show how very imperfectly even the southern part of his realm was knit together, we read of his having to subdue the small British kingdom of Loidis or Elmet, lying within the bounds of his native country, Deira. On the defeat of Edwin by Penda of Mercia at Heathfield (633), the two kingdoms were once more divided; only, however, to be reunited first under Oswald (634-42) and then finally under Oswy (655-71), both sons of Ethelfrith. From this time the separate kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia may be considered as merged in that of Northumbria. The feuds of the rival dynasties remained, however, an incessant source of strife, and were a prime cause of the ultimate fall of the united kingdom in the later ninth century. In 867 York was seized by the Danes, and in the course of the next decade all Deira was conquered and settled by them, although Bernicia maintained an independent existence. The Danish kingdom of York was finally subjugated by Edred in 954, and sank with Bernicia to the status of an earldom. Under Ethelred the two provinces of Deira and Bernicia appear to have been often disjoined, but were once more united by Earl Uhtred in the early eleventh century (1006). Canute, after the murder of Earl Uhtred in 1016, appears to have left Bernicia in the hands of his family, but to have assigned Deira to a Danish earl, Eric. It was not again joined to the northern province until 1042, when Siward, Earl of Deira, assassinated Eadwulf of Bernicia, and annexed that earldom to his own. On Siward's death all Northumbria was given to Tostig (1055); and on his banishment, in 1065, to Morkere. With the Conquest we may look upon the old name of Deira as being politically extinct. Nominally, the great earldom of the north lingered on for a few years under Morkere, Copsi, and Gospatric, but finally disappeared in the time of the great harrying of 1069. This strong act of policy or cruelty may have done much to obliterate the distinction between the two provinces—whether this distinction arose from purely political considerations, or was in later years mainly due to the large infusion of Danish blood that was from 975 undoubtedly present in the more southern district. De la Mare, SIR PETER (fl. 1376), was one of the knights of the shire for Hereford in the Good Parliament (1376) (q.v.), in which he acted as spokesman for the Commons. He was, it has been said, the first to hold "an office indistinguishable in all essentials from that of the later Speaker." Under his guidance the Commons elaborated a comprehensive scheme of reform, which they successfully forced upon the court in the teeth of the opposition of John of Gaunt. When the parliament dispersed, however, De la Mare was imprisoned by Lancaster's order in Nottingham Castle, and was not released till Richard II's accession, although a strong minority in the parliament of January 1377 demanded his liberation.

Delaware, STATE OF. [AMERICAN COLONIES.]

Delgon, THE BATTLE OF, is said to have been fought in 574 between the Scots under Conall, and the Picts, who were victorious, killing Conall's son Duncan. Delgon is in Kintyre.

Delhi was formerly the capital of the Mogul empire, and was annexed by the British on December 4, 1803. The transference of the capital of British India from Calcutta to Delhi was announced at the Coronation Durbar of 1911, and took place in 1912.

Delhi, THE SIEGES OF. (1) September 11, 1803. General Lake (q.v.), with a British force 4,500 strong, discovered Bourquin, Sindhia's general, encamped in a fortified position before Delhi, drawn up with his rear resting on the Jumna, and a formidable train of artillery in front. So situated, the position of the enemy appeared impregnable; and Lake ordered his cavalry, who were advancing in front, to execute a feigned retreat. The enemy, deceived, left their position, and rushed forward. The British infantry advanced steadily amid showers of grape, and after firing one round, charged with the bayonet. The shock was irresistible; the ranks of the enemy broke and fled down to the river.

(2) October 7, 1804. After Colonel Monson's unfortunate expedition into Holkar's territory had been forced back upon Agra, Jaswant Rao made a sudden incursion to the very gates of Delhi. The garrison was so small as not to admit of reliefs, and provisions and sweetmeats were therefore served out to them on the ramparts, but the British resident, Colonel Ochterlony, defended the place for nine days against 20,000 Mahrattas and 100 guns, till at length Holkar, despairing of success, drew off his army.

(3) During the Indian Mutiny. The mutineering sepoy regiments from Meerut appeared before Delhi, and, despite the efforts of Brigadier Graves and Lieutenant Willoughby, captured the town on May 11, 1857. All the Europeans who could do so fled precipitately, and the city of the Great Mogul was soon the centre of the revolt. It became necessary to recapture so important a post, and on June 8 Sir Henry Barnard, after defeating an advance division of the enemy, occupied the Ridge, a rising ground some two miles from the city. Delhi was defended by a series of bastions 16 feet high, connected by long curtains, with here and there a martello tower. Bastions and curtains were alike of solid masonry, 12 feet thick, and the whole was further strengthened by a wide and deep ditch. The besieging army consisted of British troops, Sikhs, Afghans, and Gurkhas, whilst the rebels were 30,000 strong, with ample provisions and ammunition. It was not till June 23 that operations really began with a sally from the city, which was beaten back, after a day's hard fighting. During August and September the British quickened their preparations for the attack. Brigadier Nicholson arrived at the camp with the requisite siege-train, and the heavy artillery came soon after. On September 8 four batteries opened fire on the city, and by the 13th a breach was made. The next morning saw the final assault.

Three columns were led to the walls, while a fourth was held in reserve. For five days the fighting continued in the streets, and no quarter was extended to men with weapons in their hands. At last, on September 20, the gates of the palace were forced; but Bahadur Shah had in the meanwhile escaped to the tomb of Homayun, outside the city. Here he was captured by Captain Hodson, and his two sons shot as they were re-entering the city. This was the turning-point of the revolution, which could no longer threaten any considerable danger when its nominal head, the Great Mogul king, was a prisoner in the hands of the British.

Demesne Lands were the estates which belonged to the Crown, and in early days were one of the main sources of the royal revenue. When these had been held by the Crown since the time of Edward the Confessor, they went by the name of manors of ancient demesne; and each of these manors of ancient demesne was reckoned as a franchise outside the ordinary jurisdiction of hundred or shire. The tenants were almost exempt from external authority, being governed under a system of seigniorial justice exercised by the king outside the ordinary province of common law. They were also exempt from ordinary taxation, but liable to be tallaged arbitrarily by the king. "Once ancient demesne, always ancient demesne"; even if such lands were alienated by the king (a feeling existed that this should not be allowed to happen, for they were peculiarly his own, and "the king should live of his own"), the special privileges remained. Tenants retained their immunities and privileges, and a special form of tenure which was common on ancient demesne and peculiar to it. This was a species of tenure half-way between freedom and villeinage. The tenant's services are similar in character to those of the villen, but unlike the latter he can seek the protection of the manorial court against ejectment by the use of a special writ. In the times of Stephen large grants of the royal property were made for the sake of purchasing adherents to either party; the resumption of these grants was one of the first reforms brought about by Henry II. A similar course of conduct had been pursued by William Marshall in the early days of Henry III, and again by Hubert de Burgh. In later years it became a custom for the kings to impoverish themselves by these imprudent grants, and then appeal to parliament for support. In 1310 the Ordainers forbade the king to make these gifts without their consent. A similar spirit was shown by the parliaments of 1404, 1450, and other years. In the latter half of the fifteenth century the Crown had grown so poor that Fortescue, in his "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," suggests a general resumption of the royal possessions, which he says at one time extended over a fifth part of the kingdom; and he further suggests that for the future the king should only grant estates for life. Several towns (e.g., Northampton) were in royal demesne, and all perhaps are to be considered as so being unless they had a special lord.

Demetæ, THE, were an ancient tribe inhabiting the south-west corner of Wales. According to Rhÿs, they consisted of Goidels, or the earlier Celtic immigrants, largely mixed with the remnants of the earlier pre-Celtic occupants of our island.

Denbigh, BASIL FEILDING, 2ND EARL OF (d. 1674). [FEILDING.]

Denman, THOMAS, LORD (1779-1854), was the son of Thomas Denman, a London physician. After completing his education at Cambridge, he was called to the bar in 1806. Distinguishing himself by the conduct of many cases, notably the defence of Lord Cochrane, he was returned to parliament for Wareham in 1818, and later for Nottingham—a town which he continued to represent till 1832. But his greatest success was obtained when, in company with Lord Brougham, he was selected to defend Queen Caroline in 1820, though before this he had gained great reputation for his exertions on behalf of the Luddites (q.v.), and for the repeal of the Six Acts. In 1832 he was appointed lord chief justice, an office which he discharged with a conscientious love for truth, even if, as was said, with something of the spirit of an advocate. Amongst his many titles to renown must be enumerated his passion for liberty, his exertions against the slave trade, and his ardour for the amelioration of the criminal laws.

Memoir by Sir J. Arnould.

Denmark, RELATIONS WITH. The consolidation of the Danish state by "Gorm the Old," in the ninth century, had a twofold effect on English history. Firstly, it sent the fiercer jarls and chiefs to find new homes of liberty beyond the sea; secondly, it established in the old home of the new conquerors of England a state adequate to cope with the West Saxon monarchy itself. The dealings of England with the Viking invaders are summarized in another article [DANES, THE], but with the conquest of all England by Sweyn (Svend) and Canute (Cnut), a political relation of the most intimate character between the two nations resulted, for England, in important consequences, and for Denmark in little less than the introduction of civilization from English sources. Victorious Denmark was in danger of becoming dependent on conquered England, when the death of Hardicanute, in 1042, severed the two countries. Despite the internal confusions which resulted from the decay of the old Danish dynasty, the successors of Canute did not at once give up all hopes of reconquering his great prize. Among their many abortive attempts may be specially mentioned those of Saint Canute (1080-6), who, both before and after his accession to the Danish throne, strove earnestly to achieve this object. But it is in commercial rather than in political dealings that the relations between Denmark and England were now kept up. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Scandinavian states were economically bound to England by ties as close as those which kept England in dependence on the Netherlands.

The rise of the Hanseatic League drove the English away from the monopoly of Danish trade; but when the Scandinavian kingdoms sought a protector from the overbearing Hansa it was to England that they turned. In 1490 Henry VII concluded a commercial treaty with King Hans, by which the English, in return for paying the Sound dues, were allowed to have great privileges for their merchants including the right of appointing consuls with jurisdiction over offenders of their own nationality. Christian II sought in England assistance against the revolted Swedes, but his close relative, Christian III, demanded all the trading rights of the English as the price of their alliance. The general friendship between Sweden and France led Denmark to an English alliance. James I married a Danish wife, and supported Christian IV in his attack on the empire in 1625. But the establishment of friendly relations between England and France may probably have led to a certain amount of hostility between England and Denmark during the seventeenth century. In 1652 Frederick III powerfully assisted the Dutch in their struggle against the Long Parliament and Cromwell. But the changed relations of England and Holland, and a new intimacy with the great elector, on the whole a friend of England, produced another turn in Danish politics. The hostility which Charles XII of Sweden showed to England at the end of his reign only resulted in England, Hanover, and Denmark uniting to divide a great part of the German territories of Sweden. The close connexion of Denmark with Russia was, before the days of the younger Pitt, a new guarantee of English friendship, which not even the divorce of the English Princess Matilda from Christian VII and the short-lived French policy of Struensee could affect. In 1780, and again in 1801, Denmark joined the Armed Neutrality (q.v.) against Great Britain; but in the former case peace was maintained, while in the latter the bombardment of Copenhagen (q.v.) by Parker and the death of Paul I of Russia ended the dispute. In 1807 Great Britain, fearful lest Napoleon should use the Danish navy against her, sent an expedition to Copenhagen, which effected its object by seizing the Danish fleet at the expense of her friendly relations with Denmark. When peace was made in 1815,

Great Britain retained of her Danish conquests Heligoland. During the nineteenth century the Schleswig-Holstein question was at the root of most of the dealings between Great Britain and Denmark. The Treaty of London, which settled the Danish succession, was largely the result of British intervention. The war against Germany in 1864 was rashly entered into by the Danes, in the belief that Great Britain would help them to retain their hold over the duchies. They were, however, disappointed, and their loss of the much-disputed territories to Prussia largely neutralized the good effect which the marriage of the daughter (Alexandra) of their new king to the Prince of Wales had occasioned.

Deogaom, THE TREATY OF (December 17, 1803), was concluded between the East India Company and the Raja of Berar. Its stipulations were that Cuttack should be ceded to the British; that the lands west of the Wurdah, which had belonged to the Nizam, should be restored to him; that the British should arbitrate on his differences with the Nizam and Peshwa; and that all Europeans of any nation at war with Great Britain should be excluded from Berar.

Deorham, THE BATTLE OF (577), is the name given to the great victory by which Ceawlin of Wessex broke up the territory still held by the Welsh into two parts, by severing the Britons south of the Bristol Channel from those north of that estuary. As a consequence of this victory, Bath, Gloucester, and Cirencester fell into the hands of the West Saxons. Deorham has been identified with Dereham, a village between Bath and Chipping Sodbury.

Deposition, THE RIGHT OF. It is very difficult in early English history to disentangle the true instances of a king's solemn deposition by the act of his witan or his people from those where it may merely have been the result of a domestic intrigue or disorderly rebellion. Of the latter kind Northumbria offers the best example, for out of fifteen kings ruling over this realm in the eighth century, only two seem to have met with a natural death while still in possession of the throne. But of these thirteen unfortunate kings, only three can be claimed as in any way exemplifying Kemble's fifth canon, "that the witan had the power to depose the king if his government was not conducted for the benefit of his people." If we turn to Wessex, the question becomes a little clearer. According to Henry of Huntingdon, Sigeberht was deprived of his kingly office in 755, after the mature deliberation of the nobles and people, and with the consent of the whole nation. This reads like the formal act of a witan, conscious of its own rights, and not fearing to assert them to the full; but it is only fair to add that the authority is a late one and that one version of the "Chronicle" makes the statement in a more personal manner than that just given, and runs: "In this year Cynewulf deprived King Sigeberht of his kingdom." But another text is even more explicit than Henry of Huntingdon in ascribing the action to the witan. More than two centuries and a half later it appears that the crown of England was duly transferred by the English witan from Ethelred to Sweyn. The same inherent right of a people to discard its ruler if he neglects its interests may be seen in the action of the Northumbrians when they deposed Tostig from his earldom—an instance which seems somewhat forcibly to bring out the fact that down to the very latest times some traditions, however faint, of their old independence clung to the great English kingdoms, long after they had been incorporated with the West Saxon monarchy. To sum up the foregoing remarks, it seems evident that the power of deposition was in early English times recognized as being quite within the compass of the rights of that body which undoubtedly had elected the sovereign to the throne; and it is unnecessary to call in examples of similar proceedings from the annals of kindred Teutonic races on the continent.

The same twofold power of election and deposition seems to have been recognized for many hundred years after the Conquest. That which gave had the right to take away also. But by the time of our next instance of the execution of this power, things were wearing a somewhat different aspect. The royal power had been growing for many centuries; a vague feeling of indefeasible right was abroad; the Church lawyers had done much to magnify the power and the sacredness of the kingly office. Accordingly, when Bishop Stratford brought his detailed charges against Edward II before the parliament of 1327, it was considered necessary to secure the king's own consent to his son's election. Again, in 1399 the same problem had to be faced; for even then partisans of Bolingbroke did not seem quite sure of the extent of the rights of parliament. The question was debated whether Richard II should be requested to resign or be deposed, and it was finally determined to make things perfectly legal by adopting both courses. Richard consented to perform his part of this programme, and parliament, after hearing the long catalogue of charges brought against the king, voted that they formed a sufficient ground for his deposition. In these two last instances of deposition we seem to see signs that parliament hesitated as to the extent of its powers, and required the king's resignation before venturing to assert its own authority. The case of Charles I is so exceptional that it hardly comes under view of this article. But by the time of the Revolution of 1688, the doctrine of the king's divine right had been formulated in definite terms, and whether accepted or not, had a strong influence even on the minds of Whigs. Unable to muster up sufficient courage to state boldly its right of deposition, parliament on this occasion took refuge in the theory of abdication, and made the king's act in fleeing from the kingdom equivalent to the verbal resignation which had been extracted from the unwilling lips of Edward II and Richard II.

To sum up, it may be said that the power of deposition was in early English times a practical, if not a theoretical, right, belonging to the witan and the nation; but after the Conquest, men being less and less inclined to break in upon the divinity which to their eyes hedged round a king, while still exercising the old right upon occasion, justified it to themselves by requiring a voluntary renunciation on the part of the king himself of the powers conferred on him at his consecration; and when this could not be obtained, allowed the fact of the king's absence to be translated into an act of abdication.

Derby. The chief town of Derbyshire was originally known by the name of North-worthing, and owes its modern name of Derby, or Deorby, to the Danes, by whom it was held (as one of the Five Boroughs) from 874 to 917, when Ethelfleda (q.v.) recaptured it. Later it was restored to them as one of the Five Boroughs, but again united to the English crown by Edmund. Under Edward the Confessor it was a royal borough. William the Conqueror bestowed it on William Peverel, and Henry I, who seems to have conferred on the town its first charter, granted it to the Earls of Chester. Robert de Ferrers was created Earl of Derby in 1138. In the Civil War of the seventeenth century, though at first Royalist, it was soon taken by the Parliamentarians, and remained in their hands till the end of the war. In later history it is famous as marking the farthest point reached by the Young Pretender in 1745 during his southward march.

See "Victoria County History: Derbyshire."

Derby, EARLDOM OF. Robert de Ferrers, lord of Tutbury, was created Earl of Derby in 1138 for his services at the Battle of the Standard. The earldom continued in his family until Earl Robert (de Ferrers) was deprived, in consequence of his action in the barons' revolt. In 1266 the forfeited honour was bestowed upon Edmund, the second son of Henry III, from whom it descended to his son Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, who was beheaded in 1322. The title was revived, 1337, in favour of Henry Plantagenet, afterwards Duke of Lancaster, and father-in-law of John of Gaunt, whose son Henry, afterwards king, was styled Earl of Derby during his father's lifetime. In 1485 the title was granted to Thomas Stanley, 2nd Lord Stanley, in whose family it still remains. The elder line came to an end with the death of James, 10th earl, 1736, when the title devolved upon Sir Edward Stanley, descendant of a brother of the 2nd earl and the lineal ancestor of the present holder of the title.

Derby, EARLS OF. [STANLEY.]

Derby Dilly, THE. In 1834 Lord Stanley resigned office on the question of secularizing the surplus of the Irish Church revenues, and with Sir James Graham, Lord Ripon, the Duke of Richmond, and some others, formed an intermediate party between the Whigs and the Tories, declining all connexion with either. This unnatural state of isolation deprived the country for a time of the services of some of its ablest statesmen. The clique was derisively known as the "Derby Dilly," from its leader, Lord Stanley, the heir to the earldom of Derby. In 1841, however, this third party came to an end, most of its members joining Sir Robert Peel's government.

Dering, SIR EDWARD (1598-1644), was a gentleman of Kent, created baronet in 1627, and member for the county in the Long Parliament. In the discussions on ecclesiastical questions he distinguished himself by his opposition to Laud's innovations, and was even persuaded to introduce the "Root and Branch" Bill (q.v.), which he afterwards opposed. He also opposed the Grand Remonstrance, and was, in February 1642, sent to the Tower for printing his speeches. At the beginning of the war he raised a regiment for the king, but in 1644 took the Covenant, paid a composition for his estate, and returned home to die (June 22, 1644). Sir Edward published a volume of his speeches without the leave of the House of Commons, and for this reason was expelled the House, and his book was ordered to be burnt by the hangman.

Derwentwater, JAMES, 3RD EARL OF (1689-1716). [RADCLIFFE.]

Desborough (or DISBROWE), JOHN (1608-80), son of James Desborough, of Eltisley, Cambridgeshire, was bred an attorney, and in 1636 married Jane, sister of Oliver Cromwell. In 1642 he became quartermaster in the troop raised by his brother-in-law, served throughout the war, and rose to the rank of major-general. He was nominated one of the commissioners to try the king, but refused to act. During the Protectorate he was in succession commissioner of the navy, member of the Scottish council, major-general in charge of the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall, and one of the admirals of the fleet after Blake's death. He was one of Cromwell's council of state, and appointed a member of his House of Lords, but opposed Cromwell's taking the crown. After Cromwell's death, he joined the Wallingford House party, and helped to overthrow Richard Cromwell and the restored Long Parliament. At the Restoration he was incapacitated from all public employment.

Desmond, EARLS OF. [FITZGERALD.]

Despard, EDWARD MARCUS, COLONEL (1751-1803), was born in Ireland, and was early employed in military service in the West Indies and the Bay of Honduras, where he was made superintendent of the English colony. His conduct in this office seems to have given offence to the settlers, and he was recalled, but could never obtain an official investigation. When the French Revolution broke out, he adopted the new revolutionary principles, and was imprisoned in consequence. On his release he attempted the assassination of George III; for which offence he was tried and executed in February 1803.

Despenser, BARONY OF. The first illustrious member of the family of Despenser was the Hugh who espoused the cause of de Montfort under Henry III, was appointed justiciar of England by the barons, and was killed at the battle of Evesham in 1265. The family name seems to have been taken from the office of dispenser (dispensator) to the Earls of Chester, or possibly the de Lacys, constables of Chester. His son Hugh was summoned to parliament by special writ in 1295, and was created Earl of Winchester in 1322, but in 1326 was declared a traitor, and hanged. The same fate befell his son Hugh "the Younger" a month later; and the honours of both became forfeit. Hugh, however, the son of the latter, appears to have been summoned to parliament from 1338 to 1349, when he died; and his honours devolved upon a nephew, whose son Thomas procured the reversal of the act declaring his ancestors (Edward II's ministers) traitors. Thomas was created Earl of Gloucester 1397, but was degraded 1399, and beheaded by the populace 1400, when his honours became forfeit. His attainder was, however, reversed in 1461, and the barony of Despenser fell into abeyance among the issue of his daughter and eventual heiress, Isabel, until in 1604 it was conceded to Mary Neville, wife of Sir Thomas Fane, in the person of whose son it became united to the earldom of Westmorland. In 1762, and again in 1781, it once more fell into abeyance, but ultimately devolved upon Sir Thomas Stapleton, in whose family it still remains.

Despenser, HENRY LE (d. 1406), was the grandson of Hugh le Despenser the Younger. In 1370 he was made Bishop of Norwich by papal provision, but his career was throughout rather that of a soldier than a churchman. In 1381 he distinguished himself by putting down the revolt in Norfolk, himself participating actively in the fighting. In 1383 he undertook an expedition to Flanders, by which, under the guise of a crusade against the adherents of the anti-pope Clement, he hoped to inflict injury on the French. He captured Gravelines, Dunkirk, and other places, but was eventually obliged to retire after an unsuccessful siege of Ypres, and on his return to England was stripped of his temporalities by the king. He was soon restored to favour, however, and remained a staunch supporter of Richard III's cause until 1401.

Despenser, HUGH LE (d. 1265), was one of the leaders of the baronial opposition to Henry III. In 1258 he was chosen as one of the commissioners on the part of the barons at the Oxford Parliament, and in 1260, and again in 1263, was appointed justiciar by the baronial party. When the war broke out he headed the citizens of London in their attacks on the houses of the royalists. He fought bravely at Lewes (1264), took a prominent part in the government of de Montfort, and fell with Earl Simon in the battle of Evesham (1265). His death is celebrated in one of the political songs of the time, which has been translated as follows:—

"Despenser true, the good Sir Hugh,
Our justice and our friend,
Borne down with wrong amidst the throng,

Biographies of Simon de Montfort.

Despenser, HUGH LE (d. 1326), son of the preceding, and known as "the Younger," married Eleanor de Clare, one of the co-heiresses of the Earl of Gloucester. He was soon involved in quarrels with the husbands of the other co-heiresses, while the favour shown him by the king (with whom he soon came to take the place of Piers Gaveston) arrayed a great part of the baronage against him. A confederacy of marcher lords was formed against him under the leadership of Hereford; and eventually sentence of banishment was pronounced against him in 1321. He was recalled soon after to acquire more possessions, and almost supreme power on the defeat of the Earl of Lancaster at Boroughbridge (1322) (q.v.). The success of the queen and Mortimer in 1326 obliged him to flee to the west, but he was captured, and beheaded at Hereford by Mortimer's orders. The objects of the Despensers seem to have been primarily selfish, and they cared but little for the interests of the king. At the same time, it is evident that they wished to increase the importance of the House of Commons, and use it to counter-balance the baronage. But they entirely failed in their aims: for while they alienated the barons, they did not secure to themselves the affections of the people.

De Tallagio non concedendo, THE STATUTE OF (1297), is the name given to the Latin version of the Confirmatio Cartarum as recorded by Hemmingburgh. It forbids (1) any tallage or aid to be taken by the king without the consent of the bishops, earls, barons, knights, and other freemen of the realm; (2) any prise of corn, leather, or wool, etc., without the owner's consent; (3) the maltote (q.v.). Other clauses confirm the charters and liberties of both clergy and laymen, pardon the great earls and their partisans, whose firmness had secured Edward's consent to this law, and give orders for the publication of the charter. It is now established that the original form of the statute is not the Latin, but the French one, which does not contain the word tallage, and is couched in more general terms. The Latin form represents the demands of the baronage, which they embodied in a petition couched in statute form; and stands in much the same relation to the French form, which became the permanent law of the land, as the Articles of the Barons stand in to the Great Charter of 1215. It was, however, erroneously referred to as a statute in the Petition of Right. The chief points to be noticed in comparing the Confirmatio Cartarum with the De Tallagio are that the former does not contain the word "tallage"; the latter does not reserve the rights of the king; the former renounces only "such manner of aids," etc., while the latter contains no such qualifying words.

Dettingen, THE BATTLE OF (June 27, 1743), was fought during the War of the Austrian Succession. Lord Stair, who was the British commander, wished to drive the French from Germany, and also, if possible, to invade Alsace and Lorraine. The Duc de Noailles, the French commander, marched into Franconia against him. Stair lay idly on the Maine with 40,000 men, awaiting 12,000 subsidized Hanoverians. Noailles scoured the country to the south of the river. Suddenly Stair marched up the river towards Franconia. He passed Hanau, and moved towards Aschaffenberg. About half-way between the two is the village of Dettingen. On reaching the plain of Dettingen, the British found that de Noailles had outmarched them, and thus cut them off from Aschaffenberg. Here they were joined by King George II and the Duke of Cumberland. It was determined to secure, if possible, the retreat to Hanau. But Noailles had sent his nephew, the Duke de Grammont, across the river to occupy Dettingen. Bridges were thrown across the Maine, and Noailles's cannon played on the retreating British. It was determined to cut a way through Grammont's forces. The French commander, however, leaving a strong position behind a ravine, advanced to the attack, thinking he was opposed only by the advanced troops of the British. Led on by King George, the British infantry broke through the enemy. Grammont retired across the Maine; but the retreat became a rout, and 6,000 men were left on the field. George, wishing to extricate himself from his dangerous position, refrained from pursuit, and pushed on for Hanau. Stair, furious that his advice should be disregarded, sent in his resignation, which was accepted.

Noailles withdrew into Alsace, whither he was followed by the king, and negotiations for peace were begun.

Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury (654 or 5—663 or 4), was a West Saxon by birth. His native name is said to have been Frithona, which he changed for his Latin appellation on being elected to the see of Canterbury. He is remarkable as being the first Englishman elevated to the archbishopric. Little is known of his episcopate. Hook represents him as conciliatory towards the British Church, and it is true that Christianity was widely extended in Mercia and Northumbria during his episcopate; but the position of Canterbury seems throughout this period to have been comparatively unimportant.

De Valera, EAMON (b. 1882), Irish politician, was born in New York and educated at Dublin University. He joined the Irish volunteers (1913), took a prominent part in the Easter Rising of 1916, and was sentenced to death upon his surrender. The sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, however, and he was released under the amnesty of June 1917. He was imprisoned a second time for contriving a rising, but escaped from Lincoln Jail in February 1919 and spent some time in the United States. In January 1922 he resigned his presidency of the Irish Republic (held since his release in 1917). He was again imprisoned for a time in 1923 and subsequently became president of Sinn Fein until March 1926, when he resigned.

Devereux, WALTER, 1ST EARL OF ESSEX (b. c. 1540, d. 1576), son of Sir Richard Devereux, succeeded his grandfather as Viscount Hereford (1558); married (1561) Lettice, daughter of Sir Francis Knollys. He distinguished himself by his fidelity during the conspiracy of the Duke of Norfolk and the Rising of the North, and was therefore created Earl of Essex (1572). The following year he undertook, with other noble adventurers, the conquest of Ulster; but owing, it is supposed, to the machinations of Leicester, his expedition was a total failure. In 1574 he was appointed governor of Ulster, with an independent commission, and in 1575 earl marshal of Ireland. He succeeded in effecting no permanent conquest, but signalized himself by the treacherous murder of his guest, Sir Brian O'Neill, and by ordering the massacre of the women and children of the Scots of Antrim on the Island of Rathlin. He died in September 1576.

See W. B. Devereux, "Lives of the Earls of Essex," 1853.

Devereux, ROBERT, 2ND EARL OF ESSEX (1566—1601), eldest son of Walter Devereux, the 1st earl (q.v.), entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1577. On his appearance at court, in the same year, he became at once a favourite with both queen and people. In 1585 he accompanied Leicester to Holland, distinguished himself at Zutphen, and was, in 1588, appointed general of the horse in the army raised to meet the Spanish Armada. In 1591 he commanded the auxiliaries sent to assist Henry IV in Normandy, but his chief military exploit was the capture of Cadiz in 1596, which was followed by an abortive expedition to the Azores next year. Not content with his great position as favourite and his reputation as a soldier, he also aimed at eminence as a statesman, and from 1592 devoted himself to the study of foreign affairs. He headed the party that demanded the vigorous prosecution of the war against Spain, opposed the cautious policy of Burghley, and entered into communication with King James, whom he urged to demand recognition as the queen's heir. On the death of Burghley, however, his son succeeded to his power, and Essex, a few months later, eager for an opportunity of gaining power and credit, obtained the post of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and was charged with the task of suppressing Tyrone's rebellion (March 1599). His conduct in Ireland exposed both his ability and his honesty to injurious suspicions. Instead of at once attacking the main strength of the rebels in Ulster, or consolidating the English power in Leinster, he wasted his time and his army in marching and counter-marching, in gaining little victories, and achieving no substantial success. When he did attack Tyrone, he speedily admitted him to peace, on terms which seemed to be dictated by private ambition rather than by public policy. For this, on his return to England in 1600, he was disgraced, tried by a special commission, dismissed from all his offices, and placed for a time in custody. Believing his punishment to be the work of his enemies in the council, he set on foot a conspiracy to force his way into the queen's presence, and to remove his opponents from the government by arms. But his attempted coup d'état failed, and he was apprehended, tried by the lord high steward's court, sentenced to death for high treason, and executed on February 25, 1601. He affirmed that his design was merely to go with his friends and petition the queen, and to gain their petition to remove from the queen's chamber Raleigh and Cecil, his enemies; that he had never in any way intended to hurt the queen. By the ruling of the court in this case, it was held treason to compel the king by force to change his policy. [C. H. F.]

Devereux, ROBERT, 3RD EARL OF ESSEX (1591-1646), son of the preceding, was educated at Eton, and at Merton College, Oxford. In 1606 he married Frances Howard, from whom he was divorced seven years later, in order that she might marry the Earl of Somerset. He distinguished himself as a soldier, serving in the Palatinate (1620), in Holland (1622-3), in Mansfeld's army (1624), and in the expedition to Cadiz (1625). On the outbreak of the Scottish rebellion he was appointed by Charles I lieutenant-general of the English army. He is described as being then "the most popular man in the kingdom, and the darling of the swordsmen." At the opening of the Long Parliament he sided with the popular party, urged the execution of Strafford, and though holding the office of chamberlain, refused to follow the king to York. He was appointed in July 1642 general of the army raised by the parliament, and commanded at Edgehill (October 23). In the spring of 1643, after capturing Reading, he marched on Oxford, but was prevented by bad weather and sickness amongst his troops from besieging it. In the autumn of the same year he performed his greatest exploit during the war, the relief of Gloucester (September 8), followed by the victory of Newbury (September 20). In June, next year, he marched into the west of England to relieve Lyme, leaving Waller the task of pursuing the king. After relieving Lyme, and taking some of the royal fortresses in Devon and Dorset, he proceeded into Cornwall. There he found himself, contrary to his expectations, unsupported by the country, and distressed for provisions, whilst the king, who had defeated Waller, prevented his retreat, drove him farther west, and speedily reduced his army to extremities. The cavalry broke through the king's lines, and came safe away; Essex himself escaped by sea; but the infantry were forced to surrender (September 1644). Nevertheless, the parliament appointed him to command the new army which was being collected. Illness, however, prevented him being present at the second battle of Newbury, and on April 2, 1645, he laid down his commission in anticipation of the Self-Denying Ordinance. As a general, he exhibited great irresolution, and too often allowed his judgment as a soldier to be overruled by political considerations. Clarendon charges him with pride and ambition, but admits his honesty and praises his fidelity. [C. H. F.]

Devizes. The town of Devizes appears in English history for the first time when Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, built his great castle here, during the reign of Henry I. It was surrendered to Stephen by Roger's son Nigel, Bishop of Ely, under threat of death. A few years later it was held by Fitz-Hubert on behalf of the Empress Maud. The castle was demolished by Cromwell during the Civil War.

Devon and Devonshire, PEERAGE OF. The 1st Earl of Devon was Baldwin de Redvers or Reviers, who received the grant of the earldom from the Empress Maud, probably in 1141. His descendants bore the title until the failure of the eldest line, on the death of Isabel de Redvers, wife of William de Forz,

Earl of Aumâle, in 1293. The earldom was, however, successfully claimed in 1335 by a cousin of the late countess, Hugh de Courtenay, lord of Okehampton, and it remained in his family until the attainder of Thomas Courtenay, the 6th earl, in 1461. In 1469 Humphrey Stafford, Baron of Southwick, was created Earl of Devon; but he was beheaded in the course of the same year, and the patent of his creation was annulled by a statute of 1485, when the earldom of Devon (or Devonshire, as it was alternatively called) was restored to the Courtenays in the person of Edward, great-nephew of the 3rd earl. Edward's grandson, Henry Courtenay, was created Marquis of Exeter in 1525, but on his attainder, in 1539, his honours became forfeit. His son Edward was restored to the earldom; but he died without issue in 1556. Thereafter for nearly three centuries the title was considered extinct, and was twice conferred on entirely different families. In 1603 an earldom of Devon was created in favour of Charles Blount, 8th Baron Mountjoy, in whose person it became extinct in 1606. In 1618 William Cavendish, Baron Cavendish of Hardwick, was created Earl of Devonshire. His great-grandson William, the 4th earl, was created Duke of Devonshire and Marquis of Hartington in 1694 for his services in connexion with the Revolution of 1688-9; and these honours still remain with his heirs. In 1831, however, a claim to the earldom of Devon was advanced on behalf of William Courtenay, Viscount Courtenay of Powderham, heir male of the last earl of the Courtenay family; and the claim was allowed by the House of Lords on the ground that, as regards the Courtenays, the peerage had merely been dormant since 1556. The title of Earl of Devon remains, therefore, at the present day with William's descendants. [COURTENAY; BLOUNT; CAVENDISH.]

Devorgoil, or DEVORGUILLA, was the daughter of Alan of Galloway and of Margaret, eldest daughter of David of Huntingdon. She married John de Baliol, lord of Barnard's Castle, in Durham. Upon the death of Alan (1234), the husbands of his three daughters divided his territory amongst them. It was Devorgoil who, after she had become a widow, completed the foundation and endowment of Balliol College, Oxford, which had been begun by her husband; and it was her son who was the competitor of Robert Bruce for the Scottish crown in 1290 and who was pronounced the rightful heir by Edward I in 1292.

D'Ewes, SIR SYMONDS (1602-50), was educated at Cambridge. He was knighted by Charles I, and received a baronetcy in 1641. When the Civil War broke out, however, he joined the Parliamentary party. He compiled a "Journal" of all the parliaments (both Lords and Commons) of Queen Elizabeth's reign—a work which was published several years after his death, in 1682, and is of the greatest importance for the domestic events of the last half of the sixteenth century. A new edition was published by Prof. W. Notestein in 1923. His autobiography was published from the MSS. in 1845, by Halliwell.

Deydraz, JOHN (1324), was an impostor, who claimed to be the true son of Edward I, asserting that he had been changed in his cradle. The unpopularity of Edward II led some people to give credence to his story, but his followers were few, and he was quickly seized and executed.

Dhoondia Waugh was an Afghan chief who took service with Tippoo Sahib. On the final capture of Seringapatam, 1799, he escaped, and commenced a career of plunder on his own account, but was pursued by Colonel Wellesley, defeated, and killed September 10, 1799.

"Dialogus de Scaccario" is the title of a work compiled in the twelfth century by Richard Fitz-Nigel (q.v.), at one time treasurer of the exchequer, and Bishop of London from 1189 to 1198. This treatise is divided into two books, both of which are cast in the form of a dialogue between a master and a scholar. The first book, in eighteen chapters, describes what the exchequer is: the origin of its name, the duties of its various officers, with their rights and honours, the definition of the various legal terms used in the government of the country, such as hundred, murdrum, danegeld, county, etc., and the business of the treasury. The second book, divided into twenty-eight chapters, treats of summonses, the rendering of accounts into the exchequer, and of the sheriffs and the different branches of the king's revenue. The date of the composition of the "Dialogues" is probably between the years 1177 and 1179. It is a work of great importance, and throws a flood of light upon the administrative system of the Angevin kings. All earlier editions have been superseded by that of Messrs. Hughes, Crump, and Johnson, published by the Clarendon Press in 1902.

Diamond, THE BATTLE OF, was a great faction fight which occurred near a hamlet bearing this name in Armagh, on September 1, 1795, between the Peep-o'-Day Boys (q.v.) and the Defenders (q.v.). The victory remained with the former party, who slew forty-eight of their opponents. It was shortly after this fight that the first Orange Lodge was founded.

Digby, GEORGE, 2ND EARL OF BRISTOL (1612-77), was the eldest son of John, 1st earl (q.v.). He was educated at Oxford, and sat for Dorsetshire in both the Short and the Long Parliaments. He at first joined the opposition, and was one of the managers of Strafford's impeachment, but soon went over to the king, and voted against the Bill of Attainder which the Parliamentary leaders had brought in against Strafford. He received a writ of summons to the House of Lords as Baron Digby, and became one of the king's confidential advisers. He was among the chief promoters of the scheme for the arrest of the Five Members, after the failure of which he was impeached by the Commons and fled to Holland. On his return he was captured and imprisoned at Hull, under the care of Sir John Hotham, who connived at his escape. He joined the king, and took part in most of the important battles of the Civil War, till, quarrelling with Prince Rupert, he threw up his command. At the conclusion of the war, he fled to France, where he distinguished himself in the war of the Fronde; but, having formed a foolish idea of supplanting Mazarin and becoming prime minister of France, he was obliged to escape to the Netherlands. On the Restoration he returned to England, but his flighty and untrustworthy character prevented his being appointed to any office. In 1663 he brought a charge of high treason against Clarendon, which was, however, rejected by the House of Lords. He took no further part in public affairs. He was a man of undoubted ability, and one of the foremost orators of his time, but unstable and headstrong to the last degree.

Biography by Mrs. D. Townshend, 1924.

Digby, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF BRISTOL (1580-1653), born at Coleshill, in Warwickshire, was the youngest son of Sir George Digby, knight, and of Abigail, daughter of Sir A. Hevengham of Norfolk. In March 1606 he was knighted by James I. In 1611, and again in 1614, he went as ambassador to Spain. In 1616 James conferred on him the manor of Sherborne, in Dorset. In 1617 Digby went for the third time to Madrid with the special mission of reviving negotiations, begun during his former embassies, for a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta Maria. On his return in 1618 he was made a peer with the title of Baron Digby of Sherborne. In 1621 Digby went first to Brussels and afterwards to Vienna, in order to prevail on the Emperor Ferdinand to restore the palatinate to James's son-in-law, Frederic. Digby strove to negotiate peace on the basis that the emperor should restore the palatinate, and that Frederic in return should renounce the title of King of Bohemia and abandon the right of private war within the empire. But his efforts were unavailing. If Digby's policy was to succeed, it was necessary that James should be able, in case of need, to draw the sword. James, by his angry dissolution of parliament in 1621, shattered the policy of his ambassador. In 1622 Digby again went to Spain in order to conclude the marriage treaty and obtain the restoration of the palatinate through the influence of Philip IV. He thought that, in return for some modification in the treatment of English Catholics, Spain would support a compromise in Germany. But in this he was mistaken, since the Spaniards were aiming at nothing less than the conversion of the English nation to the Catholic faith. In 1622 he was created Earl of Bristol. The visit of Charles and Buckingham to Spain in 1623 resulted in the breaking off of the negotiation and the recall of Bristol. On his return Bristol was ordered to remain in confinement at his own house, because he refused to admit that he had been at fault or to make apologies to Buckingham. In 1626 he appealed to the House of Lords and brought accusations against the Duke of Buckingham. Charles, to defend his favourite, retaliated by accusing Bristol of high treason. In 1628 Bristol opposed the king's first answer to the Petition of Right. When Strafford was impeached, Bristol sought to save his life while incapacitating him from holding office. On the outbreak of the Civil War he took the king's side. At its close he went to Paris, where he died January 16, 1653.

A few of Bristol's Dispatches are printed in the Appendix to the "Clarendon State Papers," vol. i. For his defence of his conduct in Spain, see the "Camden Miscellany," vol. vi. [B. M. G.]

Digby, SIR KENELM (1603-65), was the elder son of Sir Everard Digby, who was executed for his share in the Gunpowder Plot. In 1628 he undertook a privateering voyage to the Mediterranean, in which he distinguished himself by defeating a Venetian squadron at Scanderon. In 1636 he became a Catholic, and was employed by the queen, three years later, to obtain money from his co-religionists. During the greater part of the Civil War and the Protectorate he lived abroad, occupying himself with the study of natural philosophy. A literary contemporary compared him to Pico della Mirandola for the universality of his knowledge, and a scientific contemporary styled him "the Pliny of his age for lying." "The truth is," says John Evelyn, "Sir Kenelm was an arrant mountebank."

Digges, SIR DUDLEY (1583-1639), was a member of parliament for Tewkesbury in James I's reign, and was occasionally employed by the king on public business: as, for example, on the embassy to Russia in 1618. He was one of the chief managers of Buckingham's impeachment in 1626. He was imprisoned on more than one occasion for his language against the court, and in the parliament of 1628 he strongly advocated the Petition of Right. He subsequently made his peace with the king, and in 1630 had a reversionary grant of the mastership of the rolls. He held that office from 1636 until his death in 1639.

Dilke, SIR CHARLES WENTWORTH (1843-1911), the son of Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. After leaving college, he made a prolonged tour through the United States and the British colonies and India. On his return, he published a volume called "Greater Britain," which attracted much attention. He was elected in 1868 Radical member for Chelsea. In 1872 he moved for an inquiry into the civil list, a step which led him to be popularly credited with Republican views. In 1880 he took office as under-secretary for foreign affairs, and in 1882 became president of the local government board. He retired from public life in 1886, but returned to the House of Commons in 1892. His "Problems of Greater Britain" appeared in 1890. He died on January 26, 1911.

Disarming Acts (IRELAND). By an act of 1695 all Catholics were ordered to deliver up their arms, excepting only those who were protected by the Treaty of Limerick and other Articles, and who were consequently allowed to keep a sword, pistols, and a fowling-piece. All gun-makers were to be Protestants, and to admit only Protestant apprentices. Every justice of the peace might search for arms. The act was not very strictly carried out. In 1730, for instance, a Catholic gentleman was convicted of carrying arms, but it was held that the act applied only to those alive when it was passed. In 1732 Lord Gormanstown and some other gentlemen appeared at Trim Assizes with their swords; they were convicted, but, after an apology, were pardoned on the petition of the grand jury. In 1739 a new Disarming Act was passed, but little observed. In 1793 these acts were repealed, but a new act was passed forbidding any person to keep arms without a licence, and allowing a search for arms to be made.

Discipline, THE BOOK OF (1561), was the name given to a compilation adopted by the Reformers in Scotland as a basis for the reorganization of their Church and its practice. It was drawn up by a committee headed by John Knox. It provided for the establishment of kirk sessions, synods, and general assemblies; recognized as office-bearers, ministers, teachers, elders, deacons, and superintendents; regulated endowments; and prescribed the Book of Common Order for general use in place of the Edwardian Prayer Book. A Second Book of Discipline was issued in 1581, but failed to pass the estates.

"Disinherited," THE, was the name given to the remnant of the baronial party who held out after the battle of Evesham, a general sentence of forfeiture having been issued against all those who had fought on the side of de Montfort. The disinherited lords, headed by the younger Simon de Montfort, occupied Kenilworth and subsequently the Isle of Axholme, amid the marshes of the lower Trent. The former place surrendered at the end of 1266, on the terms embodied in the Dictum de Kenilworth (q.v.); but those who were unwilling to accept these conditions maintained the struggle in the Isle of Ely under the leadership of John d'Egville. Their position was strengthened as a result of Gloucester's revolt, and when eventually they surrendered in July 1267 they were allowed the same terms that the defenders of Kenilworth had obtained.

Disinherited Barons, THE, were the lords who had either been dispossessed of their Scottish estates as a result of the establishment of Robert Bruce on the throne, or had received grants of land in Scotland from Edward I and desired to make those grants effective. It was provided by the Treaty of Northampton, 1328, that certain of these should be restored to their lands and estates, whereof the King of Scots had taken possession. The Scottish regency, on various pretexts, delayed to carry out this article, the result being that the barons resolved to support the claims of Edward Baliol to the throne and to invade Scotland. Chief amongst them were Henry of Beaumont, titular Earl of Buchan, David of Strathbolgie, who called himself Earl of Atholl, and Gilbert de Umfraville, claimant to the earldom of Angus. The Disinherited were successful at Dupplin Moor (q.v.) and Baliol was crowned at Scone in September 1332; but he was unable to maintain himself without English help, the price of which was the recognition of Edward III's overlordship, and the surrender of the whole of Lothian to the English crown. After Halidon Hill (1334) (q.v.) Baliol's supporters began to quarrel amongst themselves over their spoils, and Baliol soon had to quit the kingdom he had partially won.

Dispensing Power, THE. The fact that the dispensing power was abolished because James II employed it to mitigate the rigours of the Test Act has led to the assumption that dispensation and licence against a statute are identical. If we examine the royal administration at a much earlier date (e.g., that of Henry II or John) we shall find that we cannot accept so narrow a conclusion. A dispensation is an act of the executive through which the application of the law in an individual instance is set aside or excluded. Thus it is the genus of which the exemption from office, the special protection of the king's servants, the licence to worship, to trade, to export or to import contrary to statute, and the private franchise, are the several species. It should be distinguished from the pardon which is granted to a criminal after condemnation (though the Crown as late as Charles II pardoned before trial) and not to a free subject. And if it is urged that the pardon is a dispensation of execution, we maintain that it grants much more than that; it is, moreover, granted for crimes which neither king, pope, nor emperor ever dreamed of dispensing with.

Brunner ("Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte") has shown how the early German kings assumed the dispensing power as part of their regalia. Intercourse with their continental kinsmen and the influence of the Church led the Anglo-Saxons to make similar claims (Liebermann, "Gesetze der Anglo-Sachsen," vol. ii, Sub. Privileg, Königsrecht). From the Norman Conquest there is no need to emphasize the prerogative of our kings who, aided by extremely able officials (the working council or executive), exercised a wide discretion in administration and legislation. The practice, therefore, of repeating, as many writers do, the statements of Matthew Paris, who ascribes to the reign of Henry III an abnormal growth of this power and even the introduction of the technical phrase "non-obstante," can no longer be countenanced. For the letters-patent and letters-close of John contain many important non-obstantes, while the Pipe Rolls of Henry II and Bracton's Note-book show how wide was the discretionary power of the Angevin monarchs. Again, it is profitless to cull from the Rolls of Parliament or Statutes of the Realm isolated protests or decisions of the Commons as evidence of the illegality of this prerogative; this is, indeed, "retrospective constitutionalism." In place of the oft-proclaimed legislative supremacy of our mediæval parliament, a political system prevailed that had not the slightest resemblance to that imagined by the Puritan lawyer. At that period the king and officials (and on extraordinary occasions the king and full council) governed the country, legislated, and exercised the functions of a court of appeal. From the reign of William I to that of Edward I, the Crown issued ordinances and modified them by dispensations. Moreover, while in the king's service the official enjoyed a protection which suspended all suits against him, and permitted him, for any offence committed in discharge of his duties, to be tried by the king alone; he was also excused the ordinary civic duties and often, as a reward for his services, his quota of taxes. Nor did our kings renounce these powers after 1270, but continued to publish proclamations and ordinances, to modify them and the statutes of parliament by dispensations, and to protect their officials. Looked at from this point of view the dispensing power assumes its proper place in the history of our administration and legislation, which after all was not so very different from that of France down to the reign of Edward II. And notwithstanding the progress made by parliament under this monarch and his successors, the conditions of mediæval life demanded an executive with great powers of initiative and discretion. Localism, an almost chronic state of war, fitful and crude legislation, an absence of rapid means of communication: these conditions placed the administration in a position of great authority. But from this point, government by king and council is slowly challenged by another ideal—government by king and parliament. Very slowly indeed does the new ideal develop; the dispensing power is still widely employed, though parliament gradually succeeds in limiting the number and privileges of protections, and constantly protests against the modification of its statutes. In spite of the increased criticism which this power received from the Lancastrian judges, the Tudors more than restored its falling authority. Elizabeth's grants of monopoly, her many licences to trade, contrary to statute, and her daring innovation of sub-letting her prerogative to license acts against penal statutes, show that its strength at the end of the sixteenth century was still unimpaired. The Stuarts, owing to the rise of new political and religious forces and their own faults of character, failed to maintain the Tudor form of government in which the council overshadowed parliament. It is significant that the promulgation of the judges' decision against monopolies and the sub-letting of the prerogative of dispensation synchronized with James I's arrival in England; Coke's judgment against proclamations and the statute against monopolies reveal still more clearly the new temper of the age. Charles I's abuse of the dispensing power during his period of absolute rule called forth vehement protests from members of the Long Parliament at the moment of its assembly; and by abolishing the courts which had so zealously supported this prerogative, parliament (1641) struck at its very roots. Though Charles II frequently dispensed with the statutes on trade and religion, this power now became a mere shadow of its former self. Even avowed Royalists came at length to regard it as an evil survival, and to see that it was no longer compatible with the new doctrine of parliamentary supremacy. When Charles, already suspected of Catholicism, exercised it against the Test Act, even though he afterwards revoked his letters-patent, it was gravely discredited. It was wholly doomed when James II, an avowed Catholic, renewed the attempt in favour of Colonel Hales and his brother officers.

Disraeli, BENJAMIN, EARL OF BEACONSFIELD (1804–81), was the eldest son of Isaac Disraeli, the author of the "Curiosities of Literature." He was first destined for the law, but he soon turned to literature. In 1826

he published his first novel, "Vivian Grey," and subsequently travelled on the continent and in the east for some years. In the year 1832 he appeared as the Independent candidate for High Wycombe. He gradually approached the Conservative party, and in 1836 he published a series called "The Letters of Rummymede," which was a violent attack on the Whigs. In 1837 he was returned as Conservative member for Maidstone. His first speech in the House excited so much antagonism from the Irish members that he had to give up the attempt to complete it; it concluded with the well-known words: "I have begun several times many things, and I have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me." During the first years of his parliamentary career he was a supporter of Sir Robert Peel; but when Peel pledged himself to abolish the Corn Laws in 1845 Disraeli turned towards the Protectionists and at once became their leader. In December 1852 Lord John Russell resigned, and Lord Derby entered office with Disraeli as chancellor of the exchequer. In 1858 he returned to office and brought in a Reform Bill, which, however, did not meet with much support. The Liberals again returned to office, and for ten years longer Disraeli led the opposition, and severely criticized Lord Palmerston's foreign policy. In 1866 the Liberals once more resigned, and Lord Derby and Disraeli came into power. They immediately brought in a Reform Bill on the basis of household suffrage, which was carried after a violent and bitter struggle. In February 1868 Lord Derby retired and Disraeli became prime minister. His tenure of office was, however, very short. Gladstone carried his Irish Church resolutions against the government, and in the general election which followed the Conservatives were completely beaten. Disraeli declined to take office in 1872, but in 1874 Gladstone dissolved, and when a general election returned the Conservatives with a majority of fifty, Disraeli became prime minister, holding office for six years. Several measures of domestic legislation were passed during this period, including a Factory Act (1878), an Artisans' Dwellings Act, and the Agricultural Holdings Act. In March 1876 public indignation in Great Britain was violently excited by the reports of atrocious cruelties practised by the Turks on the Bulgarian Christians; and the support given by the government to the Porte was made the text for vigorous attacks by some of the leading Liberal statesmen. In August 1876 Disraeli was raised to the peerage by the title of Earl of Beaconsfield. Throughout 1876 and 1877 the prime minister, in spite of much opposition in the country, and the withdrawal of two of his own colleagues, Lord Derby and Lord Carnarvon, continued to maintain a guarded and even hostile attitude towards Russia; and when the Russians seemed about to enter Constantinople, the British fleet was ordered to the Dardanelles, and an Indian contingent was brought to Malta. When a treaty was concluded between the belligerents at San Stefano, Lord Beaconsfield insisted that the document should be submitted to the great powers. A general congress at Berlin followed, which Lord Beaconsfield himself attended as one of the representatives of Great Britain, and in the summer of 1878 the Eastern question was temporarily set at rest by the Treaty of Berlin (q.v.). In the general election of 1880 the Liberals were victorious by an enormous majority, and Beaconsfield resigned. In the early weeks of 1881 he was prostrated by a complication of maladies, and succumbed on April 19. He was buried at Hughenden, in Buckinghamshire, and a memorial was voted to him in Westminster Abbey by parliament. Lord Beaconsfield was the author of a poem, "The Revolutionary Epic," a "Life of Lord George Bentinck," several political pamphlets, and a number of novels, in which many of his ideas and theories on politics may be traced. The best known of these brilliant political romances are "Sybil," "Coningsby," "Tancred," and "Endymion," which last was published within a few months of the writer's death.

Divine Right. In England the doctrine of divine right of sovereigns grew up during the sixteenth century, flourished during the seventeenth, and died a natural death in the eighteenth. The idea of the sacredness of hereditary right had made great progress during the fifteenth century. The false pedigree put forth by Henry of Lancaster to justify his claim to the crown, the history of the Duke of York's pretensions to the throne, the theory by which Richard III strove to justify his usurpation, and the care with which Henry VII guarded his hereditary title against anything which might seem to impair it, mark the advance of this view. The theory of election fell more and more into the background. At the coronation of Edward VI the king was presented to the people as their lawful and undoubted sovereign before he took the oath to preserve the laws and liberties of the realm. Thus the very form of an election contract was destroyed. The accession of James I was the triumph of hereditary over parliamentary title. James was himself one of the chief exponents of the divine-right theories. Before his accession to the English throne he had already published his "Basiliikon Doron" (1599) (q.v.), in the same year there appeared his "Trew Law of Free Monarchies," and other political works followed in 1607 and 1615. The resolution which recognized him as king stated, "that immediately on the decease of Elizabeth, late Queen of England, the imperial crown of the realm of England . . . did by inherent birthright, and lawful and undoubted succession, descend and come to your most excellent Majesty, as being lineally, justly, and lawfully next and sole heir of the blood royal of this realm." Already in two of the religious confessions of Henry VIII's reign—the "Institution of a Christian Man" (1537) and the "Necessary Doctrine and Erudition" (1543)—the duty of passive obedience had been established as a necessary consequence of the fifth commandment. In the Canons of 1606 the clergy went so far in enforcing this view that the king felt that the obedience they demanded for a de facto king undermined his hereditary title. He was also obliged, at the complaint of parliament, to condemn the theory of his absolute power put forth by Cowell, the professor of civil law at Cambridge, in his "Law Dictionary." Under Charles I the House of Commons complained of the sermons of Sibthorpe and Mainwaring (1627), and in their remonstrance of May 26, 1642, asserted that the "erroneous maxim being infused into princes that their kingdoms are their own, and that they may do with them what they will, as if their kingdoms were for them and not they for their kingdoms . . . was the root of all the subjects' misery." The act by which Charles II was made to succeed immediately on his father's death, and his reign dated accordingly, was a practical acknowledgment of the doctrine of divine right. The Church of the Restoration made the absolute duty of non-resistance part of its teaching, and it was also made part of the oath of allegiance. Both Oxford and Cambridge proclaimed this duty, and the former university burnt the works of its opponents. In 1680 Filmer published his "Patriarcha," which became "the accepted manifesto of the absolutist party." Closely connected with the doctrine of the divine right was the custom of touching for the "king's evil," which was, in the eyes of the people, "a visible, palpable attestation of the indefeasible sanctity of the royal line." A Latin service for this ceremony had been drawn up under Henry VII; under Charles I an English one took its place, and during the reign of Anne was inserted in the Prayer Book. In a single year Charles II touched 8,500 persons; in the course of his reign it is estimated that one hundred thousand persons received his healing touch. William III naturally never attempted to exercise this power, but Anne revived the ceremony. It was again abandoned by the Hanoverian kings, and the practice was only maintained by the exiled heirs of the Stuarts. During the same years the theory of divine right was passing away. It revived under Anne, and its efficacy was preached by Sacheverell and other divines. But when George I came to the throne, with a title based on the Act of Settlement alone, it was impossible for any party which accepted the Hanoverian succession still to maintain this doctrine. Moreover, as the Tories were in opposition, they had no motive for exalting the monarchy. The Jacobites alone continued to make this tenet part of their faith, and they became practically extinct by the accession of George III.

Dodington, GEORGE BUBB (1691-1762), was a politician of some prominence in the first half of the eighteenth century. He entered parliament in 1715 as member for Winchelsea, and was almost at once dispatched as ambassador to Spain, where he signed the Treaty of Madrid, and remained till 1717. He inherited a magnificent property, and attached himself to Walpole's party, but deserted that minister in 1740. Before this he had, in 1737, used all his influence with Frederick, Prince of Wales, to dissuade him from openly setting his father at defiance, and was one of the leading friends and counsellors of the prince for many years. After holding several offices, he became the confidential friend of Lord Bute, in the first year of George III's reign, and was by that nobleman's influence created Baron Melcombe. He did not, however, long enjoy his new honours, but died the next year. He had some claims to being a patron of men of letters, and it was to him that Thomson dedicated his "Summer." Among his friends were Young, Fielding, and Lyttleton. He left behind him a "Diary" (published in 1784), which is still one of the leading authorities for the minor history of the times in which he lived.

Dodowah, THE BATTLE OF (1826), took place on the Gold Coast, between a British force, under Colonel Purdon, and the Ashantis, who, after fighting with desperate bravery, were compelled to give way.

Dogger Bank, BATTLE OF THE (January 24, 1915), was fought between a British naval squadron of 9 cruisers and 3 Harwich flotillas under Admiral Beatty, and a German squadron of 9 cruisers and 19 destroyers under Rear-Admiral Hipper. The latter was reconnoitring off the Dogger Bank, and Beatty had been sent from Scapa to intercept him. The German vessels sailed for home as soon as the surprise attack began (in the morning of January 24). The engagement was therefore a race to Heligoland. During the battle the British cruiser Lion was disabled and the German cruiser Blücher was sunk.

Dollar, THE BATTLE OF (875), resulted in a complete victory for the Danes, under Thorstein, over Constantine I and the men of Alban. As a consequence of this defeat, Constantine is said to have been compelled to cede Caithness, Sutherland, Ross, and Moray to the invaders, who became rulers of "more than half " Scotland. Dollar is on the borders of Fife and Perthshire.

Dolly's Brae, THE RIOT AT, occurred on July 12, 1849. Fifteen hundred Orangemen marched through this defile, which is near Castlemellan, to congratulate the Earl of Roden, their provincial grand master. On their way back they were fired on by the Roman Catholics, an attack which the Protestants were not slow to return. The result of the affray was that the latter body drove back their opponents, who left four dead and forty wounded on the field. The question was taken up in parliament, and the Earl of Roden was eventually dismissed from his lord-lieutenancy.

Domesday is the name given to the great survey of England, made by order of William the Conqueror and carried out in 1086. In 1084 England was threatened with invasion by Canute of Denmark. At the beginning of that year the king laid a heavy "geld," or tax, on all England of six shillings on the hide. The invasion of the Northmen was not made. The threatened danger, however, and the tax which seems connected with it, probably made the Conqueror anxious to ascertain the capabilities of his kingdom, both as regards defence and taxation. At the Christmas Assembly of 1085, after "deep speech" with the great men, the king ordered that a survey of the kingdom should be made. For the purpose of the survey the country was divided into districts, and a body of commissioners was sent to hold an inquest in each district. The second of the two volumes of the survey deals with the three eastern counties; the first with the rest of the country, except the north. There is no return for London or Winchester. The names of the commissioners sent into the midland counties are preserved, and show that men of high position were employed in the work. They were bidden to inquire who held each estate at three dates—1042, 1066, and 1086, what its value was at these dates, whether that value could be raised, and by what title it was held. In order to find out whether an estate was capable of contributing a larger sum to the royal treasury, minute inquiries were to be made as to its extent, and the men and beasts it supported. The commissioners gained their information by public inquiry (probably in the County Court), the unit being the hundred, and the return for each being sworn to by twelve jurors, six English and six Norman. It was not the first time that an inquest had been held to ascertain the value of the land throughout the country for the purpose of taxation; for in the time of Ethelred the country had been surveyed and divided for the assessment of the danegeld, and an inquest seems to have been held for the geld of 1084. It is evident, however, that these had not been of the comprehensive nature of the Domesday survey, which was intensely disliked by Englishmen. The inquest was finished in the summer of 1086.

Questions of right, as well as the nature of the inquest, led to irritation and to some bloodshed. With matters of title the commissioners did not concern themselves further than to record the conflicting claims, and in doing this they treated the people of both races alike. Cases of illegal occupation are often ranged in a class by themselves, and include possessions gained by defective or disputed titles, as well as by acts of violence. These are the terræ occupatæ of the western shires, and the invasiones of Essex, etc. Few indications can be found in the record of the violence of the Conquest. The rights and obligations of each landholder are settled by those of his antecessor, and the date at which these are ascertained is that of the death of King Edward. There is seldom anything to show that the new possessor did not succeed his antecessor peacefully, and as far as possible all reference to the reign of Harold is avoided. Nevertheless the record bears witness to a sweeping confiscation of the lands of the wealthier and more powerful class, and in a lesser degree of the smaller owners also, to widespread devastation, and to the ruin of many boroughs. The primary object of the survey was to make a record of the fiscal rights of the king—geldum, miscellaneous dues, and the produce of the Crown lands; its secondary object, to obtain a national valuation list which would reveal the resources of the kingdom.

Domesday was housed at Winchester until the treasury removed to Westminster; it remained at Westminster until removed to the Public Record Office during Queen Victoria's reign.

Domesday was first printed (2 vols. folio) in 1783; see also R. Kelham, "Domesday Book," 1788; H. Ellis, "General Introduction to Domesday," 2 vols., 1833; F. Dominica, the largest presidency of the Leeward Islands, was named after the Lord's day on which it was discovered by Columbus in 1493. It was colonized by the French in 1632, but in 1660 it was guaranteed a neutral reserve for the Caribs by France and England. English attempts, however, to possess the island were defeated by the death of Warner in 1674. Evacuated by French counter-claimants in 1730, the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748 again guaranteed native neutrality. But the French government infringed this and the island was captured in 1761 by the British, to whom it was ceded in 1763 and added to the administration of Grenada, until a separate government was granted in 1770. Captured by a French force from Martinique in 1778, it was restored in 1783 with its trade ruined. Unsuccessfully attacked in 1795, and ravaged in 1805 by the French, it remained British. It joined the Leeward Islands (q.v.) in 1882, having, as a Crown colony, an executive council of ten. In 1898 the semi-elective constitution was abolished by a local act in return for Imperial financial assistance and a nominated legislative council of six official and six unofficial members established.

Dominica, THE BATTLE OF, OR "BATTLE OF THE SAINTS" (April 12, 1782), resulted in the destruction of the French naval power in the West Indies. On April 9 a division of 8 ships under Sir Samuel Hood, which had become separated from the rest of the fleet under Rodney, had maintained for an hour an unequal contest with 15 French ships, and the French admiral de Grasse had thought it wise to retire when the rest of the British fleet came up. The next two days were occupied in trying to bring the French to action. On the 12th Rodney, favoured by the wind, took advantage of a break in the French line, and, advancing in column, cut the French fleet in two. Sir Samuel Hood, who was leading the British van, at once became engaged with that of the French fleet, while Rodney was busy with the enemy's centre. The action was vigorously carried on, and resulted in the retreat of the French. A chase was immediately begun, and five ships were taken or destroyed, including the enormous Ville de Paris. Four more were soon afterwards captured by Hood when cruising among the islands. The British loss in the two actions of the 9th and 12th was comparatively small. Rodney and Hood were both raised to the peerage. The battle itself is famous in naval history as being the first in which the manoeuvre of breaking the line was practised.

Dominicans, THE, OR BLACK FRIARS. This order was founded by St. Dominic at the beginning of the twelfth century, and approved by Innocent III in 1215. Thirteen brethren of this order crossed into England in 1221, and before long fixed their abode at Oxford, where they soon became prominent in the schools. Their second English house was the Blackfriars in London, originally situated where Lincoln's Inn now stands, but removed from this place about 1279. At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries there were fifty-eight Dominican houses in England and Wales, several of them being situated in the principal towns, such as Bristol, Northampton, Salisbury, York, and Leicester. Dominions Office. [COLONIAL OFFICE.]

Dominis, MARCO ANTONIO DE (1566-1624), was a Jesuit who, in 1604, became Archbishop of Spalatro. He made the acquaintance of Bishop Bedell in Italy, and was induced by him to quit his archbishopric and come to England, where he published his work, "De Republica Ecclesiastica" (1617), which was aimed at some of the evils, temporal and ecclesiastical, of the papal system. De Dominis professed himself a Protestant, and was much patronized by James I and the High Churchmen in England. He received the mastership of the Savoy, and was made dean of Windsor. In England he saw that his ambition was not likely to be gratified by the highest honours of the Church. He therefore returned to Rome (1622), where his old schoolfellow, Gregory XV, was pope, and seems to have entertained the idea that by his efforts England might be restored to the Church of Rome. But on the death of Gregory De Dominis was arrested by the Inquisition, and imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, where he died.

Newland, "Life of De Dominis."

Donald, son of Constantine I (d. 900), was the first ruler of Scone to be styled by the chroniclers "King of Alban." He is said to have reigned from 889 to 900, and was occupied during the early part of his reign in repelling the attacks of Sigurd, the newly-appointed earl of those Norwegians who had already begun to colonize the Orkney Islands. The newcomers invaded Caithness and Sutherland, and the presence of the King of Alban was constantly required in those parts to keep them at bay, though their incursions could hardly affect that part of Scotland over which Donald really reigned. Later on, it is said, a fresh body of Danes from Dublin swept down upon the kingdom of Alban itself, and Donald was slain at Dunotter in contest with them. Other and older accounts, however, represent Donald as having died a natural death.

Donald Baloch of the Isles was a relative of Alexander of the Isles, on whose captivity he raised a force and defeated the royal troops under the Earls of Mar and Caithness at Inverlochry (1431). Shortly after, Donald was compelled to seek refuge in Ireland, whence he attacked Arran and Renfrewshire in 1453 in the interest of the Douglas faction. In 1462 he and his kinsman, John, Earl of Ross and Lord of the Isles, concluded a treaty with Edward IV of England by which they were, with his support, to divide between them all Scotland north of the Forth. Ross was not finally subdued until 1476.

Donald Bane, KING OF SCOTLAND, was brother of Malcolm Canmore, whom he succeeded in 1093 to the exclusion of Malcolm's children. After reigning six months, he was driven out by his nephew Duncan, supported by William Rufus. In 1094, however, on Duncan's death, he recovered the throne, which he shared by agreement for three years with Edmund, son of Malcolm by his first wife. Donald Bane ruled over the Scots north of the great firths, while Edmund, as the son of the Saxon Margaret, reigned over the more Saxon population of the Lowlands. At last, in 1097, Edgar Atheling, with the assistance of an English force, after defeating his nephew Edmund and Donald Bane, set his other nephew Edgar on the Scottish throne. Two years later Donald Bane was taken prisoner, and after being blinded, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment till his death. He was buried in Dunfermline Abbey.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911; C. S. Terry, "History of Scotland," 1920.

Donald Bane MacWilliam (d. 1187) claimed to be a descendant of Duncan, son of Malcolm Canmore. In 1181, during the absence of William the Lion at the English court, he tried, with the aid of many of the Scottish barons, to make himself king of the country north of the Forth and Clyde, and for six years he there maintained a sort of irregular warfare, which ended in his defeat and death near Inverness (July 1187).

Donald Brec, or DOMNAL BREAC, the son of Eocha (q.v.), was King of Dalriada (629-42). In 634 Donald was defeated by the Angles at Calathros, while attempting to wrest from their hands the district between the Avon and the Pentland Hills. In 637 he crossed over to Ireland with a large army to aid Congal Claen, King of Ulster, against the King of Ireland, but was utterly routed at the battle of Magh Rath. After another attack upon the Anglian territory, in which he was assisted by the Britons of Strathclyde, he seems to have fallen out with this last race upon the death of the great Rhydderch Hael, and was slain in battle with the new King of Strathclyde at Strathcarron (642). On his death, the kingdom of Dalriada reverted to anarchy.

Dorchester, VISCOUNT (1573-1632). [CARLETON, DUDLEY.]

Dorchester. (1) In Dorset, a Roman station, called Durnovaria, or Durinum, was a place of some importance under the Anglo-Saxon kings, and was made the seat of a mint by Athelstan. The remains of the ancient Roman fortifications were destroyed, and a Franciscan priory built from the materials in the reign of Edward III. The town was incorporated by James I in 1610, and returned two members to parliament from the year 1295 until 1868, and one from 1868 till 1885. Dorchester, COUNTESS OF (1657-1717). [SEDLEY, CATHERINE.]

Dorislaus, ISAAC (1595-1649), was the son of a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church. He was appointed judge advocate of Essex's army on account of his great knowledge of civil law, and assisted in the preparation of the charge against Charles I. In May 1649 he was sent as ambassador from the Commonwealth to Holland, where he was murdered at The Hague by some servants of Montrose, headed by Colonel Whitford (May 12, 1649). He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but exhumed at the Restoration.

Dorset, PEERAGE OF. In 1397 John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, eldest of the legitimated sons of John of Gaunt, was created Marquis of Dorset, as well as Marquis of Somerset; but in 1399 he was degraded to the rank of earl by parliament and was never subsequently reinstated. His son Edmund was created first Earl and then Marquis of Dorset, and the title continued in this branch of the Beaufort family till the execution and forfeiture of Henry, Duke of Somerset, 1464. In 1475 Thomas Grey, Lord Ferrers of Groby, was created Marquis of Dorset; but his grandson, Henry, 3rd Marquis of Dorset and Duke of Suffolk, was attainted in 1554 and his honours forfeited. In 1604 Thomas Sackville, Baron Buckhurst, was created Earl of Dorset. Lionel, the 7th earl, was created Duke of Dorset in 1720. In 1843 Charles, the 5th duke, died unmarried, and the dukedom became extinct.

Dorset, 3RD MARQUIS OF. GREY, HENRY (d. 1554).

Dost Mohammed (1793-1863) was the brother of Futteh Khan, the vizier of Mahmud Shah of Afghanistan. In conjunction with his brothers, he succeeded to the throne of Kabul on the expulsion of Mahmud, brother of Shah Shuja. In 1834 Dost Mohammed successfully quelled the attempt of Shah Shuja to recover Afghanistan, but during this war he lost the province of Peshawar definitely to Ranjit Singh. In 1836 Dost made overtures to Lord Auckland for arbitration, and on his refusal appealed to the King of Persia. In 1837 he sent an expedition to Peshawar, and at Jumrud won a fruitless victory. In 1838 overtures for an alliance were made to Dost Mohammed, and an embassy sent to Kabul under Captain Burnes. Dost Mohammed declared his willingness to dismiss the Russian and Persian envoys, provided the British would assist him to recover Peshawar. This the governor-general refused, and Dost Mohammed therefore turned to Persia and Russia, and the latter power guaranteed the defence of Kandahar. Thereupon the British determined to depose him, and to attain this object the Afghan expedition of 1839 was dispatched. Deserted by Persia, with a British army advance-ing on Kabul, Dost Mohammed fled with a handful of followers to the Hindu Kush. After being kindly received by the chief of Khulum, he passed on to Bokhara, where he was detained by the Amir; but on effecting his escape, he returned to Khulum, gathered an army of Usbegs, and crossing the Hindu Kush, proclaimed a religious war. He was defeated, however, September 18, by Brigadier Dennie. After another attempt to raise the country against the British, he surrendered to Sir William Macnaughten, and was brought to Calcutta. He was released in 1842. In the second Sikh War he made common cause with the Sikhs, and captured Peshawar, from which, however, he was shortly afterwards expelled. In 1856-7 a British army was dispatched to aid him against the Shah of Persia, who had seized Herat. Before he died he had succeeded to some extent, at least, in uniting the Afghan power. On his death in 1863 the country was divided between the partisans of his eldest son, and the younger son, Shere Ali, to whom Dost Mohammed had bequeathed his throne. [AFGHAN WARS.]

Doughty, THOMAS (d. 1578), was Drake's second in command in the famous voyage of 1577. He was appointed captain of a Portuguese vessel captured near Santiago. Soon after quitting the Plate river, Doughty deserted with his men, but was soon overtaken, and his crew transferred to Drake's own ship, the Pelican. On the Patagonian coast the adventurers came upon a gibbet, on which, more than fifty years before, Magellan had hanged his mutineers; and this spot was now put into fresh service for the execution of Doughty. A court-martial was extemporized; Doughty was found guilty, and beheaded, after first embracing the admiral and partaking of the holy communion. A story of the time makes Drake himself the executioner.

Douglas, THE FAMILY OF. The first member of this family known to history is William de Douglas (or Dufglas), whose name frequently occurs in charters of the period 1175-1213. At the end of the thirteenth century Sir William Douglas was prominent as a supporter of Wallace against the English interest. During this and the succeeding century vast possessions in the south of Scotland were accumulated by the Douglasses; who became, in virtue of their territorial power, formidable antagonists to the royal authority. On the failure of the line of Bruce, it seemed for a time by no means improbable that a member of the Douglas connexion might oust the Stuarts from the Scottish throne. Besides their estates in Scotland the Douglasses had at one time extensive lands in England, just as the Percys had similar claims in Scotland. These claims were to have been satisfied for both parties under the terms of the Treaty of Northampton (1328); and it has been remarked that a slight difference in the distribution of the estates of either family would have "inverted their position, and made the Percys national to Scotland, the Douglasses to England." In 1358 William Douglas was raised to an earldom under the title of Earl of Douglas; and in 1389 George Douglas was created Earl of Angus.

Douglas, THE PEERAGE OF, dates from Sir William Douglas, who was created Earl of Douglas in 1358. The earldom came to an end in 1455 with the attainder of James, 9th earl, after the battle of Arkenholm and the unsuccessful Douglas rebellion. The peerage of Angus had been conferred on George, illegitimate son of the 1st Earl of Douglas, in 1389. In the Douglas rebellion of 1454 the Anguses adhered to the Crown, and got a large portion of their relatives' estates. In 1633 William, 11th Earl of Angus, was created Marquis of Douglas. In 1703 Archibald, 3rd marquis, was created Duke of Douglas. The dukedom of Douglas became extinct with him in 1761. The estates of the Douglas family were the subject of a protracted law-suit, known as the "Douglas Cause," between the Duke of Hamilton and Archibald Stewart, nephew of the Duke of Douglas, who obtained the estates by a judgment of the House of Lords in 1771, and was created Baron Douglas in 1790. The peerage became extinct in 1857. In 1875 Cospatrik, Earl of Home, whose wife was descended from the 1st Baron Douglas, was created Baron Douglas of Douglas. The marquissate of Douglas and earldom of Angus passed on the death of Archibald, Duke of Douglas, in 1761, to James, 7th Duke of Hamilton, who was descended, by a second marriage, from William, 1st Marquis of Douglas (d. 1633).

Douglas, SIR ARCHIBALD (d. 1333), was the youngest brother of the famous Sir James Douglas, and a warm adherent of David II. In 1332, having defeated Edward Baliol at Annan, he made a successful raid into Cumberland. On the capture of Sir Andrew Murray (1333), Douglas was chosen regent of Scotland; but in the same year he was defeated and slain at Halidon Hill.

Douglas, ARCHIBALD, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1424), was the son of Archibald, 3rd Earl of Douglas. In 1399 his sister Elizabeth had been married to the Duke of Rothesay, the heir to the Scottish crown, and Douglas is said to have been privy to the murder of that young prince in 1402, in revenge for his unfaithfulness to his wife. In September of the same year he headed an army collected for the invasion of England, but was defeated and taken prisoner by the Percys at the battle of Homildon Hill (q.v.). While in captivity, he was induced to join Percy in revolt against Henry IV; and was again defeated and taken prisoner at Shrewsbury (q.v.), 1403. He was released in 1408, and later participated in many border raids. In 1423 he crossed over to France to fight against the English in that country. There he was created Duke of Touraine and lieutenant-general of the French army; but fell in the battle of Verneuil, and was buried at Tours.

Douglas, ARCHIBALD, 5TH EARL OF ANGUS (d. 1514), was the leader of the baronial party in the conspiracy against the ministers of James III at Lauder Bridge (q.v.), and from his famous remark on that occasion, "Heed not, I am he who will bell the cat," was ever afterwards called Archibald Bell-the-Cat. He shared in Albany's intrigues with Edward IV, and in 1488 fought on the side of the insurgents at the battle of Sauchie Burn (q.v.). In 1491 he resumed his intrigues with England, but in 1493 he was made chancellor, an office he appears to have held until 1498. He tried to dissuade James IV from fighting at Flodden (1513).

Douglas, ARCHIBALD, 6TH EARL OF ANGUS (d. 1557), was the grandson of the preceding. In August 1514 he married Margaret Tudor, the queen regent of Scotland, and mother of James V, incurring thereby great unpopularity. In 1520 he defeated his enemies the Hamiltons in the battle of "Cleanse the Causeway" (q.v.), and seized Edinburgh, but on the return of the regent Albany he found himself compelled to seek a temporary asylum in France. In 1524 he returned, and later became guardian of the young king, whom he kept in close restraint for three years. In 1528 James succeeded in escaping his vigilance; and in the same year, Margaret, from whom he had long been parted, obtained a formal divorce. Angus was now tried and forfeited for treason; and in 1529 he fled to England, where he remained till 1542. On the death of James V he returned to Scotland. At first he supported English interests; and in 1543 received Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador, at his castle of Tantallon; but in the following year Angus threw over Henry, and joined the national party, an act which drew down on his lands the army of Lord Hertford. Shortly afterwards he defeated the English at the battle of Ancrum Moor (q.v.). He fought at Pinkie in 1547.

Douglas, SIR GEORGE (d. 1552), was a brother of Archibald, 6th Earl of Angus. Having given offence to James V of Scotland, he was banished to England along with his brother (1528). Some years later he took part (1532) in a raid on Scotland, to which country he did not return until the death of James V, 1542, when his forfeiture was rescinded. He was one of the Assured Lords (q.v.), and was urgent in promoting the marriage of Mary with Edward, but did not do much real service to Henry VIII, except by giving good advice to his ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler.

Douglas, SIR JAMES (d. 1330), called "The Good," was the son of Sir William Douglas, the friend of Wallace. Many stories, more or less incredible, are told of him, as of most of the other patriots who were fighting for Scotland at this time. He was an able and gallant partisan of Robert Bruce, his first exploit in the king's cause being the capture of the castle of Douglas from the English in 1307, and the massacre of its garrison. He was in command of one of the divisions of the Scottish army at Bannockburn in 1314, and in the same year harried Northumberland in conjunction with Edward Bruce. On the departure of Robert Bruce for Ireland, in 1316, the charge of the kingdom was committed to Douglas, who managed to defeat all attempts at invasion on the part of the English nobles. In 1318 he invaded England to create a diversion in favour of the beleaguered castle of Berwick, and won a complete victory at Mytton-on-Swale, in Yorkshire. In 1327, whilst on a similar expedition, he surprised the English camp by night at Stanhope Park, in Durham, cutting, it is said, the very ropes of King Edward's tent. Later on, he was one of the Scottish commissioners at the conclusion of the Treaty of Northampton. After the death of Bruce (1329), Douglas set out on an expedition to Palestine for the purpose of conveying the king's heart to Jerusalem, but being diverted from his original enterprise, was slain in battle with the Moors in Andalusia, 1330. His body was brought back to Scotland, and buried at Douglas.

Douglas, JAMES, 2ND EARL OF (d. 1388), the son of William, Earl of Douglas, married, in 1373, Isabel, daughter of Robert II. He succeeded to the title in 1384. He was renowned for his bravery and skilful generalship. In 1385 he took part in a raid upon England in conjunction with a body of French troops under John of Vienne. In 1388 he penetrated as far as Durham, and was retiring, carrying with him Henry Percy's (Hotspur) captured pennon, when he was met by the Percys at Otterburn (q.v.). This battle resulted in the defeat of the English, who fled from the field, leaving their leader, Hotspur, in the hands of the enemy; but it was dearly purchased by the Scots with the death of the Earl of Douglas.

Douglas, JAMES, 9TH EARL OF DOUGLAS (d. 1488), was the brother of William, 8th Earl of Douglas (q.v.) (stabbed by James II of Scotland), whom he succeeded as head of the family, February 1452. Almost his first act was to nail a defiance of the king to the walls of the parliament house at Edinburgh, charging him with murder and perjury; but the king raised an army against him and he made temporary submission. In 1453 he was appointed a commissioner to England to negotiate a truce, and appears to have seized the opportunity to enter into treasonable relations with the English court. The king determined to complete his destruction. In March 1455 he took the field against him, being supported by the Angus branch of the Douglas family. Douglas himself fled across the border, and his brothers were defeated at the battle of Arkinholm (q.v.). James Douglas was attainted and his lands were forfeited to the Crown. He remained in England until he was taken prisoner in a border foray, 1484. Soon afterwards he entered the monastery of Lindores, where he died in 1488, the last of his line.

Douglas, JAMES, 4TH EARL OF MORTON (1525 ?–1581), Regent of Scotland, succeeded to the earldom of Morton in 1543. He was captured by the English at Dalkeith in 1548, but released two years later. He ratified the Treaty of Berwick (q.v.) in 1560. He became one of Mary Stuart's privy council, and was made chancellor in 1563. He gave lukewarm support to the Darnley marriage scheme, and was the chief instigator of the murder of Rizzio (1566), whom he alleged to be intriguing against him with the queen. After the murder he fled to England, whereupon his friends contrived to secure from the queen a pardon for him as a condition of their ridding her of Darnley (December). He returned to Scotland, but was absent from Edinburgh on the night of Darnley's murder. He declined to take part in the trial of Bothwell. When Bothwell carried off the queen, however, Morton relinquished his friendship, formed a "secret council" of the lords to deliver the queen, defeated Bothwell at Carberry Hill on June 14, 1567, and carried the queen back to Edinburgh, whence she was conveyed to Lochleven (June 12). On June 20 Norton discovered the famous Casket Letters (q.v.). He was made a member of the council of regency set up under Moray, and after Langside (at which he led the van—May 13, 1568) he was one of the four commissioners at York. On the death of Moray (February 1569) he secured the election of Lennox to the regency (July 12), and virtually controlled the government himself. On the succession of Mar to the regency (September 1571) Morton became lord-general of the kingdom, and himself became regent on Mar's death (November 1572). He now brought to an end a series of negotiations which he had been conducting with Elizabeth, by the agreement of Perth (1573), which resulted in his surrendering Edinburgh Castle and ruining the cause of Mary. For the next few years his supremacy in Scotland was unquestioned. He preserved order by his system of itinerant justices, and worked to build up a Protestant league with England to be followed by union under one crown. Both his domestic and his English policies won him great unpopularity, however, and his authority was undermined by the enmity of Colin Campbell, 6th Earl of Argyll, who induced the king to take over the government himself to the exclusion of Morton (March 1578). Morton contrived to retain a position on the council, but he felt insecure, and, rumours being circulated that he had poisoned the Earl of Atholl (who died suddenly in April 1579), Esmé Stuart landed in Scotland to prove that he (Morton) had himself murdered Darnley. This danger was soon dispelled, but Lennox discovered a plot between Morton and Elizabeth to resist his attempt to carry the king via Dumbarton to France, and secured the arrest of Morton on a charge of treason (December 29, 1580). He was executed on June 2, 1581.

Douglas, JAMES, 4TH DUKE OF HAMILTON (1658–1712), made his first appearance in history in opposition to the lord high commissioner, the Marquis of Queensberry (1702), when he led a secession of eighty members from parliament. The extremely unsettled nature of his political views caused him to be excluded from the Scottish Union commission, and he became a zealous opponent of the Union. In consequence he grew to be the darling of the Edinburgh mob. His influence in this year (1706) checked a projected rising of Cameronians and Jacobites. In 1707 the opponents of the Union were reduced to despair, and, as a last attempt, it was resolved to lay a solemn protest on the table of the House, and then secede from parliament. The protest was to have been presented by Hamilton; but at the last moment he refused to appear, pleading toothache; and when peremptorily summoned declared he had never had any intention of presenting the protest. By some it was supposed that the cause of his conduct was the claim of the house of Hamilton to the Scottish throne, and by others that Anne had commanded him to lay aside his opposition to the Union, as it was a preliminary step to a Stuart restoration. In 1708 he was looked on as the leader of a Jacobite insurrection, but the emissary from St. Germain, Colonel Hooke, was unable to obtain an interview with him. When the French invasion of 1707–8 was imminent, Hamilton set out for England, where he was arrested; but was set free by the exertions of the Whig peers, Newcastle and Wharton, who wished to gain popularity for their party in Scotland. In 1711 he was allowed to take his seat in the House of Lords as an English peer, with the title of Baron of Dutton and Duke of Brandon. In 1712 he was appointed ambassador to France, and it is asserted by the Jacobite Lockhart that he was to be sent over with the view of undertaking the restoration of the Pretender. Before his departure he was killed in a duel with Lord Mohun, in which there was every appearance of foul play. His death was regarded by the Tories as a political murder.

Douglas, JAMES, 2ND DUKE OF QUEENSBERRY (1662–1711), succeeded to his father's title in 1695. He had been a staunch supporter of the Prince of Orange, and in his earlier years had served in the army. In 1700 he was appointed high commissioner to the parliament of Scotland, and in 1702 and 1703 occupied the same position for Queen Anne. In the latter year he was driven out of office for his share in what is popularly called "The Queensberry Plot" (q.v.), but two years later was made keeper of the privy seal, and a commissioner for the treaty of the Union. For the purpose of carrying the Union through, he was appointed lord high commissioner to the last Scottish parliament in 1706, and on his journey to London was received with the utmost honour in England as some recompense for the execrations he had to encounter in Scotland. As a reward for his services on this occasion he was created a British peer (1708), a pension of £3,000 a year was granted him out of the post office, and "the whole patronage of Scotland was vested in his hands." In 1709 his vote in the election of the Scottish representative peers was disallowed, as he now sat in the House of Lords in his own right. His death occurred in 1711. His son Charles, the 3rd Duke of Queensberry, was the friend and patron of Prior and Gay.

Douglas, Sir William (d. 1353), the Knight of Liddesdale, was the eldest son of Sir James Douglas of Lothian. He was taken prisoner (1332) by Sir Antony de Lucy in a raid into Scotland, and by order of Edward III was put in irons. On his release, he did good service against the English, whom he expelled from Teviotdale (1338). In 1342 he took Alexander Ramsay prisoner owing to a private feud, and starved him to death in his castle of Hermitage; but this crime was pardoned by David II, who even made its perpetrator governor of Roxburgh Castle. Douglas was taken prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross, and while in captivity entered into treasonable negotiations with Edward III. He was assassinated in 1353, whilst hunting in Ettrick Forest, by his godson, William, Lord of Douglas, the son of Sir Archibald Douglas, the regent.

Douglas, William, 1st Earl of (d. 1384), was the son of Sir Archibald Douglas, Regent of Scotland in 1333. On his return, about 1348, from France, where he had been trained to arms, his first exploit was to drive the English out of Douglasdale and Teviotdale. He was the godson of Sir William Douglas, the Knight of Liddesdale (q.v.), whom he murdered in Ettrick Forest (1353), probably in revenge for his intrigues with the English king. In 1356 he was present at the battle of Poitiers on the French side; and in 1358 was created Earl of Douglas. In 1363 a dispute arose between Douglas and King David II relative to the application of the money raised for the payments of the king's ransom from the English; but the story that, on the death of David, Douglas intended to dispute the succession of the house of Stuart, and was only bought off by an alliance between his son and Isabel, daughter of Robert II, is unworthy of credence. In 1381 Douglas negotiated a truce with the English at Berwick.

Douglas, William, 6th Earl of (d. 1440), and 3rd Duke of Touraine, was the son of Archibald, 5th Earl of Douglas, who died 1439. On succeeding to the earldom, he incurred the enmity of Sir William Crichton, who, with Sir Alexander Livingstone, controlled the young king, James II. They invited him to pay a visit to James at Edinburgh Castle, and there, after some form of trial, had him beheaded, along with his brother David (1440). The young earl was but some eighteen years old at the time of his death.

Douglas, William, 8th Earl of (d. 1452), succeeded to the estates on the death of his father, James the Gross (1443). He was a man of turbulent spirit and vast power, possessing a large part of southern Scotland. He is said to have been appointed lieutenant-governor by James II, and certainly exercised the functions of that office. He rapidly concentrated his power by entering into alliances with the Earls of Crawford and Ross and other great nobles, and by setting on foot intrigues with foreign powers and with the English, whom he had defeated on the borders. He used his influence with the king to deprive Sir William Crichton of the chancellorship; and secured the downfall of the powerful family of the Livingstones. In 1450 he passed in state across the seas to spend the Jubilee in Rome. In his absence, Crichton and others of his enemies undermined his position with the king, and he returned to find his estates forfeited. In 1451 a hollow truce was concluded between Douglas and the king, which was soon broken. Douglas ravaged the lands of many of the king's more immediate friends, even daring to put to death Sir John Herries and McLellan. In 1452 James summoned him to an interview at Stirling, during which the king, enraged at his insolence, stabbed him in the throat, whereupon he was quickly dispatched by Sir Patrick Gray. He married his cousin, Margaret Douglas, the "Fair Maid of Galloway," and so reunited the possessions of the house of Douglas.

Douglas, William, 3rd Duke of Hamilton (1635-94), appears as member of the privy council in the year 1687. When James II refused to allow religious liberty to the Covenanters, and when the assembly of the Scottish estates also proved refractory, Hamilton led the opposition. At the Revolution he joined the victorious side, while his eldest son declared for James. He was elected president of the convention by a large majority, and when the convention became a parliament he was made lord high commissioner. But he attempted to bring the old influence of the Crown, by means of the lords of the articles, to bear on the estates, and hence a strong opposition was formed which thwarted his government for the remainder of the session. On the discovery of Montgomery's plot (1689-90) to place James on the throne, it was revealed that he had been offered the post of president of the council. Upon this William dismissed him from his office of commissioner (1690).

On the fall of Melville he once more occupied Holyrood House as lord high commissioner (1693), and is said to have subscribed £3,000 to the African Company.

Douglas Castle (in Lanarkshire) obtained during the wars of Scotland with Edward I the name of the "Perilous Castle of Douglas," from the difficulty of holding it against the Scots. It was three times recaptured from the English by Sir James Douglas, and its garrison destroyed. About the year 1451 it was demolished by James II's orders, while the earl was absent in Rome. It was, however, rebuilt, and was in 1639 garrisoned by the Covenanters.

Douglas Rebellion, THE. [DOUGLAS, JAMES, 9TH EARL OF DOUGLAS.]

Dover, called by the Romans Dubris, was a place of considerable importance in the early history of England. It was one of the Cinque Ports, and a very usual port for embarkation to the continent. It was here that Eustace, Count of Boulogne, committed the outrage which led to the banishment of Godwin (1051). At this time the town held its privileges by supplying the Crown with twenty ships for fifteen days. Harold founded a castle here. After the battle of Hastings the town was burnt by William's troops, and a few years later Eustace of Boulogne attempted to seize it by force during William's absence abroad (1067). It was taken by the French in 1296; and in 1670 it was the scene of the negotiations which led to the Treaty of Dover (q.v.). In 1918 the town was bombarded by a German submarine, with fourteen casualties. [CINQUE PORTS.]

Dover, THE TREATY OF (1670), was concluded between Charles II and Louis XIV, chiefly through the instrumentality of Charles's sister, the Duchess of Orleans. By this treaty:—(1) England and France were to declare war against Holland; and England was to receive the province of Zeeland in case of success. (2) The Prince of Orange was, if possible, to receive an indemnity. (3) Charles was to assist Louis to make good his claim on the Spanish succession, and to receive as his reward Ostend, together with any conquests he might make in South America. (4) Charles was to receive a subsidy of £300,000 a year from Louis. These four clauses comprised the whole of the public treaty, which was signed by Shaftesbury and the other ministers. But there were secret clauses known only to Clifford, Arlington, and Arundel, by which Charles was to re-establish Roman Catholicism; while to enable him to crush any opposition in carrying out this scheme, Louis was to give him £200,000 a year and 6,000 French troops.

Downing, SIR GEORGE (1624-85), was member for Carlisle in 1657. It was he who seems to have first suggested that the "Instrument of Government" should be abolished, and a new constitution, which aimed at reproducing the old constitution under a dynasty of Cromwells, substituted for it. After the Restoration, he was English ambassador at The Hague, and in 1664 was strongly in favour of making reprisals on the Dutch, a course of conduct which was adopted, though not in the king's name. A year later he proposed in the House of Commons that the method of contracting government loans through the goldsmiths should be abolished, and that the treasury should constitute itself a bank; and when his plan was adopted, he received a subordinate part in that department of state. In 1672 he was again ambassador in Holland, and in 1678 he had once more to defend his financial schemes in the House, this time without effect.

Downs, THE BATTLE OF THE (1666), was fought between the English fleet, commanded by the Duke of Albemarle, and the Dutch, under De Ruyter, De Witt, and Van Tromp. The battle lasted for several days, opening on June 1. On the 3rd, Albemarle retired, after setting fire to his disabled ships, and late in the evening was joined by his colleague, Prince Rupert. The battle was one of the most obstinate and bloody of all the indecisive battles fought between the Dutch and the English in the seventeenth century.

D'Oyley, COLONEL EDWARD (1617-75), the president of the first military council in Jamaica (1656), succeeded William Brayne as governor in 1657, and by his severe measures compelled the disbanded soldiers to colonize the island for England, in accordance with the wishes of Cromwell.

Drake, SIR FRANCIS (1540?-96), was born near Tavistock, in Devonshire. Early inured to a sea life, he accompanied his relative, Sir John Hawkins, to the Spanish Main (1567), and subsequently, in 1570, undertook a voyage on his own account to the West Indies. In 1572 he sailed with two vessels to make reprisals upon the Spaniards for the previous losses he had sustained at their hands, and made an unsuccessful attack on Nombre de Dios (July 29). It was just before his return from this voyage that he saw the Pacific from a treetop in the isthmus of Panama. On his return to England, Drake was at first employed by Elizabeth in Ireland; but in 1577 he sailed, with her sanction, on another expedition. He plundered all the Spanish towns on the coasts of Chile and Peru, captured immense booty, and finally crossing the Pacific Ocean, returned to England round the Cape, thus circumnavigating the globe in a three-years' voyage. On arriving in England, he was knighted by the queen, in recognition of his daring (1580). Five years later Sir Francis was sent with a fleet to the West Indies, where he captured the cities of Santiago, St. Domingo, and Cartagena. In 1587, during the preparations for the Spanish Armada, he commanded a fleet, which did much damage in the port of Cadiz, where he is said to have burnt 10,000 tons of shipping, an operation which he styled "singeing the King of Spain's beard." He then captured an immense treasure-ship off the Azores, and returned home in time to take a very active part in the defeat of the Armada, as vice-admiral of the fleet. In 1595, in conjunction with Sir John Hawkins, Drake sailed on an expedition to the West Indies, but nothing effectual was done; and Sir Francis died on board his own ship off Porto Bello, January 28, 1596, and was buried in mid-ocean.

Drapier's Letters (1724) is the name of a series of pamphlets written by Swift against the new copper coinage which the government were attempting to introduce into Ireland, and the monopoly for coining which had been granted to a man named Wood. The letters profess to be the production of a certain M. B., a drapier, or draper, of Dublin, and he, writing as an ignorant, unskilled shopman, gives utterance to his own apprehensions of ruin. While professing extreme loyalty to the king, the honest shopman shows, or attempts to show, that the patent was unjust to begin with; that its terms had been infringed, and that the new coins themselves were base. In this publication Swift hit the public taste of Ireland, and became unrivalled in popularity. So great was the impression produced by this work, that the patent had to be withdrawn from Wood, who was, however, compensated by a pension of £3,000 a year. [SWIFT; WOOD'S HALFPENCE.]

Drogheda is noted in history as being (1) the place where the papal legate Paparo held a synod in 1152, on which occasion the authority of the Roman Church was greatly strengthened in Ireland. (2) It was at this town that Poyning's Act was passed in 1494, and about the same time a mint was established there. (3) In December 1641 Drogheda was besieged by O'Neill with a large force of Irish, but was for three months successfully defended by Sir Henry Tichborne. (4) On September 3, 1649, Cromwell appeared before the town, which had been garrisoned by Ormonde with his best regiment, most of them English, altogether 2,500 men, commanded by Sir Arthur Aston, an officer of great reputation. On the 10th the bombardment began; but a storm attempted by the Puritans failed, and the garrison refused to surrender. On the 12th the storming of the place was again attempted, and succeeded, after a desperate struggle. The whole garrison was put to the sword, and Sir

Arthur himself had his brains beaten out. Cromwell admits "that the officers were also knocked promiscuously on the head except two." Altogether, it seems that about 4,000 people perished, about half of whom must have been unarmed—so, at least, it would appear from the depositions of eye-witnesses. (5) In 1690 Drogheda surrendered to William III, directly after the battle of the Boyne.

Droit d'Aubaine was the rule by which the property of a deceased foreigner was claimed by the State unless the defunct man had a special exemption. This rule was not peculiar to England, but common to other countries. The derivation of the word "aubaine" has been variously explained.

Droits of Admiralty are the perquisites attached to the office of lord high admiral. Most valuable among them is the right to seize the property of an enemy in time of war. It has been customary in maritime war to seize the property of an enemy if found within our ports on the outbreak of hostilities, and to consider the prizes as forming part of the Droits of Admiralty. Prizes captured by non-commissioned vessels are also said to be subject to the same conditions. In the Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars large sums were obtained by the enforcement of these regulations, but for the most part the money so gained was devoted to the public service. By an act of William IV's reign the Droits of Admiralty for that reign were to be put to public use, and the lord high admiral is no longer in possession of his claim to the tenth part of property captured on the seas.

Druids, THE, were the priests of the Celts in Britain and Gaul, Druidism, according to Prof. Rhys, representing a survival from pre-Celtic days. Cæsar says that there were in Gaul only two classes who obtained any consideration, the common people being in a condition little above slavery. These two classes were the noble order, Equites, as Cæsar calls them, and the priestly order, the Druids. The last presided over all the religious functions. They had the care of public and private sacrifices, and they interpreted the religious mythology. To them the youth flocked in crowds for instruction. They were too, we find, the judges in all cases, both criminal and civil, settling questions of disputed boundaries or affairs of inheritance, as well as those connected with infractions of the law. If anyone refused to abide by their decision, they could inflict on him the penalty of excommunication or interdiction from the sacrifices, which deprived him of all his civil rites, and cut him off from all commerce with his fellow-men. At their head was one chief Druid, who succeeded by election. Generally, the claim of one person to succeed to the vacant post was universally recognized; sometimes, however, disputed claims led to bloodshed. Once a year all the people who had any cause for hearing assembled in the most central part of Gaul, the country of the Carnutes, and were judged by the Druids: much, one may fancy, as the Israelites were judged by their judges. As has been already said [CELTS], Britain was considered in Cæsar's day the especial nursery of Druidism.

Cæsar tells us, as a distinction, that the Germans had no Druids. But if by this were meant that the Germans had no sacerdotal class, the statement certainly requires modification. The Germans, like most of the Aryan races after their earliest days, had a class of priests who stood side by side with their kings or chiefs. The Celtic Druids were, we may feel sure, a sacerdotal class, of the same kind as that which was found among their kindred nationalities: that is to say, their essential function was to stand foremost in the sacrifices, and to preserve by oral tradition the mythic histories, whether of gods or heroes, which had been composed in verse, as well as to compose fresh forms when required. They were both priests and bards: gleemen, as the Saxons said, or, as the Norsemen would have said, scalds. This was their essential character. It was in degree chiefly that their functions differed from those of the priests of, say, the heathen Saxons. The Celts were undoubtedly, as Cæsar describes them, a very religious people, and being such, they had raised their priesthood to a position of exceptional power, and from this exceptional position arose their functions as judges. We easily gather this much from Cæsar's account of the Druids; for we see that the enforcement of their decrees was not secured by ordinary legal, but by distinctly religious, penalties: they forbade men the sacrifices. If the people had not been exceptionally religious, this penalty would not have carried with it such exceptional terrors. Too much has been made of Pliny's description of the ceremonies which accompanied the cutting of the mistletoe; for we have no reason to think that this was in any degree the central point of the Druidic ritual, or that it was more than one among twenty similar rites. Nor, again, must we take too literally a beautiful passage in which Lucan describes the high doctrines of the Druids concerning the future life, for these doctrines were not essentially different from those which have been held by all the Aryan nations. [CELTS.]

Being raised to such a high position, it is probable that the Druids took unusual care to fence themselves round with the mystery of a priestly caste. It is quite possible that they may among themselves have cherished doctrines above those of the common herd; but the theory that they had a great and secret philosophy, which by oral tradition they handed down far into the Middle Ages, is an extravagant notion which has been cherished by enthusiastic and uncritical minds. Drumclog, THE BATTLE OF, was fought on the borders of Lanarkshire and Ayrshire, June 1, 1679, between a party of the Covenanters who had been surprised at a "conventicle" and the royal troops under Claverhouse. The Covenanters, who were led by Balfour of Burleigh and Hackston of Rathillet, were victorious.

Drumcrub, THE BATTLE OF (965), was fought between Duff, King of Alban, and Colin, son of Indulf, a rival claimant to the throne. The latter was completely defeated, two of his chief supporters, the Lord of Atholl and the Abbot of Dunkeld, being slain.

Drummond, SIR GORDON (1772-1854), was one of the British generals during the American War of 1812-14. In 1814 he defeated the Americans at Fort Oswego, and soon afterwards gained a second victory over them at Lundy's Lane. In August of that year, however, he was himself defeated at Fort Erie, to which he afterwards laid unsuccessful siege. In 1815 he was appointed governor-general of Canada.

Drummond, THOMAS (1797-1840), permanent under-secretary for Ireland from 1835 until his death, was born in Edinburgh, became an officer in the Royal Engineers, and was employed in the government survey of Ireland, and subsequently in the Boundary Commission rendered necessary by the Reform Bill of 1832. Attracted to politics, he became permanent under-secretary at Dublin Castle. He was largely responsible for the organization of the Royal Irish Constabulary (1836). His policy was to govern Ireland by the ordinary law, recognizing the grievances of the people and pursuing a conciliatory policy towards the Catholics. He was bitterly attacked by the landlord party, and the aphorism "Property has its duties as well as its rights" was coined by him in a reply to a protest from the Tipperary magistrates.

Drummond, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1828), entered parliament in 1795 as member for St. Mawes. In 1801 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to the court of Naples, and in 1803 he was appointed ambassador at Constantinople. Sir William was more distinguished as a scholar, however, than as a diplomatist, and published several learned works.

Drunken Parliament, THE (1661), was the name given to the ultra-Royalist Scottish parliament elected just after the Restoration. It restored the Lords of the Articles, and annulled all acts of the preceding twenty-eight years. [ARTICLES, LORDS OF THE.]

Drury, SIR WILLIAM (1527-79), attained considerable fame in the reign of Elizabeth as an able general and administrator. In 1567 he was in command of the border forces, and in 1570, in conjunction with Lennox, took Hamilton from the Duke of Châtelherault. In 1573 he conducted the siege of Edinburgh to a successful issue (May 21-8), and received the thanks of the queen. Three years later Drury was made president of Munster, and signalized his entrance upon the office by a series of vigorous measures. He died at Waterford in October 1579.

Dryden, JOHN (1631-1700), was educated at Westminster and Cambridge. At the Restoration he appears to have changed his politics; for after having, in 1659, written an elegiac poem on the death of Oliver Cromwell, we find him in 1660 ready with another in honour of the new king. From this time there hardly occurred any political event of importance that is not alluded to in his pages. The Dutch were satirized in 1662; and five years later the wonderful events of 1665-6 were celebrated in the "Annus Mirabilis." In 1681 he published his greatest work, "Absalom and Achitophel," a political satire, directed mainly against the intrigues of Shaftesbury and Monmouth on the question of the accession of the Duke of York. All the characters in this poem are intended to represent the chief statesmen of the day under the thin disguise of Hebrew names. Thus David is Charles II; Absalom, his favourite son, the Duke of Monmouth; Achitophel, the Earl of Shaftesbury; while the versatile Duke of Buckingham appears as Zimri. The attack on Shaftesbury was before long continued in "The Medal," while by the next year, in the "Religio Laici," he was again engaged upon one of the leading topics of the day, defending the Church of England against the attacks of the Dissenters. Under James II Dryden turned Roman Catholic, and his pension as laureate, an office to which he had been appointed in 1670, was renewed after a temporary cessation. Shortly after this the poet's gratitude evinced itself in the publication of "The Hind and the Panther" (1687), another political and religious poem, in which the "milk-white hind, unspotted and unchanged," represents the Church of Rome; while the panther, "the noblest creature of the spotted kind," stands for the Church of England, and other sects are represented under the guise of various beasts. At the Revolution his various offices were taken away from him, and he henceforward confined himself to purely poetical work.

An edition of Dryden's "Works," with a "Life" by Sir Walter Scott, was published in 1808, and revised and reissued by Professor George Saintsbury in 1882.

Dublin has been from the very earliest times a place of great importance in Irish history. Its name bespeaks a Celtic origin, and it has been identified with the Eblana of Ptolemy. In the ninth century it fell into the hands of the Ostmen, or Danes, who, with occasional reverses, kept their footing in Ireland till the time of the English conquest. In 1171 the town was unsuccessfully besieged by Roderick, King of Connaught, with an immense host of Irish; and in the same year Henry II received there the homage of the Irish chiefs. The government of Dublin was then undertaken by Hugh de Lacy. In 1207 the new English colony was granted a charter, and two years later was nearly exterminated by a native rising, during Easter, which has given to the day of its occurrence the title of Black Monday. Richard II visited Dublin twice, and was being entertained there when news came of Bolingbroke's invasion. In 1591 a charter of Queen Elizabeth founded Trinity College and the University of Dublin. A new university was instituted here by the Irish University Act of 1908. In 1646 Dublin was besieged by the papists, and was next year surrendered to the Parliamentary forces. After the Revolution of 1688, James I held a parliament in this city, which, however, fell into the hands of William III soon after the battle of the Boyne. In later times Dublin has been the head-quarters of several plots and seditious projects, such as the plot of Lord E. Fitzgerald (1798), of Emmett (1803), the Fenian Conspiracy of 1867, and the plot of the Invincibles in 1882. The city suffered during the Easter rising of 1916, over 200 buildings being destroyed, and again in 1922 from violence on the part of forces opposed to the treaty with Great Britain. [IRELAND.]

Dublin, THE TREATY OF (1646), conducted by Ormonde on behalf of Charles I and the Irish Council of Kilkenny, was concluded on March 28, 1646. It was of a political character (religious articles being omitted until the king's pleasure should have been ascertained), and provided for the equipment of 10,000 Irish troops to help the king. The papal nuncio and Owen Roe O'Neill strongly opposed it, and a synod at Waterford excommunicated all who adhered to it. It was practically set aside by the Irish advance on Dublin.

Duclair Episode. In 1870 six British vessels were seized by the Germans at Duclair in the course of their military operations, and sunk in the Seine; their crews, moreover, it was said, were treated with brutality. This excited considerable irritation in Great Britain. On explanations being demanded, however, Prince Bismarck showed himself ready and desirous to avoid all cause of quarrel by satisfactorily explaining away all causes of offence, and offering the fullest compensation to the parties entitled to claim it.

Dudley, AMBROSE, EARL OF WARWICK (1528?-1590), third son of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland (q.v.), was tried, and condemned (1553), for his participation in his father's plot, but was not executed. In 1563 he was in command of the English garrison at Havre when it was forced to surrender; and after his return to England was proposed by Elizabeth as a husband for the Queen of Scots. In the rebellion of 1569 he was in command of some of the royal forces, and aided materially in crushing the insurrection.

Dudley, SIR ANDREW (d. 1559), brother of the Duke of Northumberland, was sent in 1553 to the Emperor Charles V for the purpose of mediating between the Spaniards and the French. In the same year he received instructions from his brother to bribe the King of France to send an army to England in furtherance of the scheme for placing Lady Jane Grey on the throne. For this he was put on his trial and condemned to death, but was afterwards relieved.

Dudley, SIR EDMUND (1462-1510), was one of the unprincipled agents of Henry VII's rapacity, to which he contrived to lend a kind of legal support by founding it in many cases upon a revival of obsolete statutes. In 1492 he accompanied Henry to France, and it was on his return from this expedition that he united with Empson in inaugurating that system of exaction for which he has obtained so unenviable a notoriety. In 1504 he provides an example of the completeness of Henry's power at that time by his appearance as Speaker of the House of Commons, while the king conferred upon him also the rank and office of a baron of the exchequer. Dudley and his partner Empson were naturally very unpopular; they were men, to use the words of Bacon, "whom the people esteemed as his [Henry VII's] horse-leeches and shearers, bold men and careless of fame, and that took toll of their master's grist." On the death of Henry VII, his successor could find no better way to ensure popularity at the opening of his reign than by the surrender to the people's fury of these agents of his father's oppression. Dudley and Empson were accordingly arrested on a charge of high treason, were at once condemned, and executed in August 1510. So general was the disgust and indignation which Dudley and Empson had excited, that it was thought necessary to pass a special act of parliament to prevent the recurrence of the illegalities of which they had been guilty. [EMPSON.]

Dudley, LORD GUILDFORD (d. 1554), son of the Duke of Northumberland, was married in 1553 to Lady Jane Grey (q.v.), whose claim to the throne the duke intended to assert on the death of Edward VI. Upon the failure of his plot, he was condemned to death in company with his wife, but the sentence was not carried into effect till February 12, 1554, when the insurrection of Sir Thomas Wyatt (q.v.) and the solicitations of Simon Renard, the ambassador of Charles V, induced Mary to order his instant execution. [GREY, LADY JANE; MARY.]

Sir H. Nicolas, "Life of Lady Jane Grey."

Dudley, SIR HENRY (d. 1565?), a cousin of the Duke of Northumberland, formed (in 1556) a conspiracy in favour of the Princess Elizabeth, the avowed object of the plot being to free England from the yoke of Catholicism and Spain. Elizabeth was to be married to Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devon (q.v.), who had been the cause of the previous rebellion of 1554. A plan was also laid to carry off a large amount of Spanish silver from the treasury; but the whole plot was betrayed by one of the accomplices, named Thomas White, and most of the conspirators were arrested. Dudley himself, however, escaped abroad.

Dudley, JOHN, DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND (1502-53), was the son of Edmund Dudley, the extortionate minister of Henry VII. Created Lord Lisle by Henry VIII, he distinguished himself in naval warfare with the French, as lord high admiral (1545), and was named by the king one of the executors to carry on the government during the minority of Edward VI, being shortly afterwards created Earl of Warwick. In 1547 he again distinguished himself at the battle of Pinkie, and two years later was instrumental in crushing the rebellion of Ket. About this time he attached himself to the Protestant party, chiefly from motives of self-interest, and on the fall of Somerset (1549) assumed the office of protector, two years later being made Duke of Northumberland. After the execution of Somerset (1552), Northumberland obtained complete ascendancy, not only over the council, but also over the young king, whose favour he won by his pretended zeal for Protestantism; though at the same time he contrived to conciliate to a certain extent the emperor and the Catholic party. The ill-health of Edward VI in 1553 made it evident that he had not long to live; and Northumberland, partly from ambition, and partly from the knowledge that, if Mary succeeded her brother, his own ruin was inevitable, formed the design of getting the succession altered in favour of Lady Jane Grey (q.v.), whom he shortly afterwards married to his son, Guildford Dudley. He had little difficulty in persuading the king to enter into his project. The privy councillors he had more trouble with, but eventually the will in Lady Jane Grey's favour was signed, and the duke, relying on the Protestant party and on French aid, thought the success of his plot secured, and it was even hinted that he hastened Edward's end by poisoning. On the king's death (July 6, 1553), Northumberland at once caused Lady Jane to be proclaimed, and announced to her that she was queen; but, contrary to his expectation, the feeling of the country was against the usurpation, and almost the whole of England declared in favour of Mary. The duke was arrested at Cambridge (where, seeing the failure of his scheme inevitable, he had proclaimed Mary) by the Earl of Arundel, who conveyed him to London. He was tried in Westminster Hall, by a court presided over by the Duke of Norfolk, and was condemned to death, being executed on Tower Hill (August 22, 1553). Before his execution he confessed himself a Roman Catholic.

Dudley, ROBERT, EARL OF LEICESTER (1532 ?-88), was the fifth son of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland. Implicated to some extent in the schemes of his father, he was for some years in disgrace, but was ultimately restored in blood by Mary. In 1549 he married Amy (or Anne) Robsart, daughter of a Norfolk gentleman, and is said to have procured her murder at Cumnor (1560). The charge cannot be absolutely proved; but she certainly perished at a time most convenient for Dudley's ambition. The probable truth is that she was murdered by someone who wished to see Dudley married to Elizabeth. He had not been long about the court before his handsome appearance won him the favour of the queen, whose relations with her "sweet Robin" were so peculiar as to lend colour to the worst representations of her enemies, though the rumours were probably groundless. The queen's fondness for Dudley, whom, in 1564, she created Earl of Leicester, caused his marriage with her to be regarded as a matter of certainty. But Elizabeth, fond as she was, preferred that "at court there should be no master, only mistress." The bitter enemy of Cecil, whom he regarded as his rival in influence over the queen, Leicester was continually trying to deprive him of his office, but without success. His arrogance and his influence over the queen made Leicester an object of almost universal detestation; and the probability of his marriage with Elizabeth called forth the most violent opposition. When the queen, in 1562, believed herself to be dying, she named the earl as protector of the realm; and the following year, though she would not marry him herself, proposed him as a suitor for the hand of Mary, Queen of Scots, that he might thus, perhaps, after all, obtain the throne of England. It was long, however, before Leicester gave up all hope of an alliance with the queen; and he was one of the most determined opponents of the projected marriages with the Duke of Anjou and Charles of Austria. About the year 1567 Leicester assumed the rôle of head of the Puritan party, partly out of chagrin with the Catholics, who refused him support, and as a means of checkmating his enemy Cecil. Twenty years later, when in the Netherlands, he gained many supporters amongst the Reformers by his pretence of sincere Protestantism. In 1578 he secretly married the Countess of Essex, and incurred the severe displeasure of the queen, who still retained her partiality for her favourite. In 1582 Elizabeth again quarrelled with him; but a reconciliation was effected, and in 1585 he obtained the command of the English troops in the Low Countries; though his appointment only served to bring out his incapacity to fill a responsible position. On his arrival at Flushing, Leicester was offered and accepted the post of governor by the States, a fact which again provoked the anger of Elizabeth, who declared that the earl and the States had treated her with contempt. Before Leicester returned to England, towards the end of 1586, he had managed, "with conspicuous incapacity," to throw everything into confusion, and to bring the Low Countries to the verge of ruin. Notwithstanding this, the States again offered him the government, and he went back with supplies of men and money in 1587, though he only retained his post a few months. The following year, in spite of the incapacity he had displayed as a general, the command of the English army was entrusted to him during the alarm of the Spanish invasion; and he was about to be created lieutenant-general of England and Ireland when he died of a fever (September 4, 1588). His character is that of an ambitious and unscrupulous courtier. "He combined in himself," says Froude, "the worst qualities of both sexes. Without courage, without talent, without virtue, he was the handsome, soft, polished, and attentive minion of the court."

Dudley and Ward, EARL OF (1781-1833). [WARD, JOHN WILLIAM.]

Duelling. The practice of duelling seems to have originated from the Teutonic custom of trial by battle. But it seems clear that this method of deciding rights did not exist in England before the Conquest. Under William the Conqueror it was rendered compulsory only between two Normans, but was gradually extended in certain cases to both races. This law, though it had long fallen into desuetude, was not finally abrogated till 1819, after it had in 1817 been claimed as his right by a certain Thornton, who was accused of murder. [WAGER OF BATTLE.] The practice of duelling, not as a solemn appeal to heaven for justice, but for the satisfaction of a personal affront, arose from the legal custom, and does not seem to have occurred in England earlier than the sixteenth century, though it became very common indeed in the next one, and so continued till the nineteenth century. It was not till about the year 1843, when Colonel Fawcett perished at the hands of his brother-in-law, that the public feeling was unmistakably expressed against the custom. After this, the army, in whose ranks the sense of honour and claim to satisfy it by shedding blood might be supposed to be strongest, was forbidden to have recourse to this practice under heavy penalties. This regulation, mainly brought about by the Prince Consort, seems to have been of almost equal effect in every class of the community, and duelling in England has now been for many years a thing of the past.

Duff, KING OF ALBAN, was the son of Malcolm I, and succeeded Indulf, 962. We are told that in 965 he defeated Colin, son of Indulf, at Drumerub, but was expelled by him in 967. Duff appears to have taken refuge in Forres, where, it is said, he was slain at the Bridge of Kinloss, 967.

Duffindale, THE BATTLE OF (1549), resulted in a complete defeat of the Norfolk rebels, under Robert Ket (q.v.), at the hands of the royal troops under Warwick.

Dugdale, SIR WILLIAM (1605-86), one of the most famous of the English seventeenth-century antiquaries, was descended from an old Lancashire family. Marrying at the early age of seventeen, he soon settled at Blythe in Warwickshire, where his enthusiasm for the past was kindled by the acquaintances he made. In 1635 he was introduced to Sir Henry Spelman, like himself a famous antiquary, and before long began collecting materials for his great work, the "Monasticon Anglicanum." Fearing the ruin to our national monuments that might ensue from the Civil War that was on the point of breaking out, he made, in 1641, at the instance of Sir Christopher Hatton, copies of all the principal monuments in Westminster Abbey and other great English churches and cathedrals. Next year he attended Charles I's summons to York, and was present at Oxford when it surrendered to the Parliament in 1646. After the Restoration he was appointed Garter king-at-arms. Besides his great work, the "Monasticon Anglicanum," the recognized authority on English monastic foundations—first published in separate volumes 1655, 1661, 1673—Dugdale was the author of many other works, including the "Antiquities of Warwickshire" (1656), the "History of St. Paul's Cathedral" (1658), "Origines Judiciales" (1666, etc.), the "Baronage of England" (1675-6), and "A Short View of the Late Troubles in England" (1681), being an account of the rise and progress of the Civil War. All these works, except the last, which is marked by violent prejudice, are perfect mines of valuable information, and in many cases are remarkable as being the first serious attempts in their various lines.

Duke, the highest title in the English peerage, originated in the reign of Edward III, who in 1337 created his son, the Black Prince, Duke of Cornwall. The first instance of a person not a member of the royal family being created a duke is Robert de Vere, who in 1386 was made Duke of Ireland. The title has been very rarely given, and at present there are but twenty-one imperial dukes, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal. There are, in addition, seven dukes in the Scottish, and two in the Irish peerage. The word "duke" is a heritage of the Roman Empire, under which the "duces" were military leaders; from Merovingian and Carolingian times it passed into the nomenclature of mediæval Europe, where England was one of the last countries to adopt the title. Etymologically it is the same word as the Italian "doge."

Dumbarton, the "fortress of the Britons," is a lofty rock on the right bank of the Lower Clyde. Originally it was called Alcluyd, and was the chief town of the Strathclyde Welsh. Its later name must have been given by the Picts. In 736 it was taken by the Picts and Northumbrians under Egbert. Granted to John Baliol by Edward I, it was in 1562 given up by Arran to Queen Mary, and held for her by Lord Fleming. It was to Dumbarton that the queen was trying to force a passage when she was defeated at Langside, 1568. In 1571 it was taken from Henry by Captain Crawford, and in 1639 it fell into the hands of the Covenanters.

J. Glen, "History of Dumbarton," 1876.

Dumnonia, DAMNONIA, or WEST WALES, was the British kingdom in the south-western peninsula of England. Besides the quite separate Dumnonii of the district round the Roman Wall, there was in Roman times a tribe called the Dumnonii who occupied the whole country west of the modern Hampshire and the Bristol Avon. Some inquirers have regarded them as Goidelic in race, and therefore to be distinguished sharply from their British (Brythonic) neighbours. But, if so, it is difficult to see how the Brythons, driven westwards by the Saxons, were able in their defeat to conquer and assimilate these Goidels, for in later times the speech of Cornwall certainly was more kindred to the Brythonic than the Goidelic group of Celtic languages. Perhaps there remained traces of an earlier race, though the Dumnonii were roughly Brythonic. Anyhow, the sixth century saw a Celtic race still supreme in these regions, and, by its possession of the lower Severn valley, in communication with the "North Welsh" beyond the Bristol Channel. In Gildas's time the tyrant Constantine was king of this region; but with the advance of the West Saxons westwards, the Dumnonian kingdom was forced into narrower limits. The conquests of Ceawlin in 577 (battle of Deorham) separated it from the modern Wales. The victory of Cenwealh at the Pens drove the "Brytwealas" over the Parret (658), and the tales of Armorican migration attest the disorganization of the defeated race. Geraint, the Dumnonian monarch, was signally defeated in 710 by Ine, and the West Saxon frontiers were advanced to the Exe. Ine's organization of the Sherborne bishopric, and refoundation of Glastonbury Abbey, shows the completeness of his conquests. Yet even in Egbert's time the West Welsh remained unsubdued, and avenged their defeat, if not conquest, in 815, by joining the Danes against the West Saxon Bretwalda. Their defeat at Hengestesdun (838) led to their entire subjection. Yet it was only temporary; for Exeter continued to be jointly inhabited by

English and Welsh until Athelstan expelled the latter; an act which led to the confinement of the Welsh to the modern Cornwall. When they were subdued directly to the West Saxons we hardly know; but no king of the West Welsh can be proved to have existed later than the Howel who did homage to Athelstan. The retention of the Celtic language, at least till the end of the seventeenth century, still marked off Cornwall from the rest of the country. But the last trace of any separate organization was the appointment in 1051 of Odda as Earl of the "Wealas." The modern duchy is of much later date. Even in Domesday there are hardly any British proper names in the old Dumnonia, though to this day the great majority of the place-names among the dwellers of the more western portion are purely Celtic.

The original authorities are a few meagre entries in the chronicles, Welsh and English, of battles. Philology and local antiquities give something more. For the ethnological question see Rhys's "Celtic Britain"; and T. Rice Holmes, "Ancient Britain," 1907; also "Victoria County History: Cornwall."

Dunbar, BLACK AGNES OF. [MARCH, AGNES, COUNTESS OF.]

Dunbar, THE BATTLES OF. (1) April 27, 1296, resulted in a complete victory for the English forces under Edward I and Earl Warenne over the Scots under the Earl of Atholl and Sir Patrick Graham.

(2) September 3, 1650, resulted in a complete victory for the Parliamentary army under Cromwell, Monck, and Lambert, over the Scots under David Leslie. Leslie had taken up a strong position, and fortified all the heights between Edinburgh Castle and Leith. For a whole month Leslie kept his impregnable position till it seemed that Cromwell must be starved into submission. Fearing this fate, the English general removed to Dunbar, where he could command the sea, and Leslie followed him along the slopes, settling finally upon the hill of Doon, cutting off the retreat of the enemy, and looking down on them in the town. On the night of September 2 the Scottish army forsook its strong position and foolishly descended to the lower ground. Leslie's caution had been overcome by the rash zeal of the preachers in his camp. At day-break Cromwell ordered his whole force to advance against the Scottish horse, which were crossing the glen of the Broxburn in advance of the main body, and before they had time to form their lines they were driven back on their own ranks behind, and the day was lost. It was on this occasion that Cromwell uttered his memorable quotation as the sun cleared away the mist from the hills and showed the certain rout of his enemies, "Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered." Three thousand men perished in this engagement, and nearly ten thousand were taken prisoners. From Dunbar Cromwell passed on to Edinburgh, and in a short time all Scotland was in his power.

Dunbar Castle, in Haddingtonshire, was granted to Gospatric, Earl of March, by Malcolm Canmore in 1070. It was taken by Edward I and Earl Warenne, April 1296, and in 1314 it gave shelter to Edward II after his flight from Bannockburn. In 1338 it was successfully defended for nineteen weeks against the Earl of Salisbury by "Black Agnes of Dunbar" (q.v.). It was garrisoned by French troops during Albany's regency in the time of James V, and its fortifications strengthened after its evacuation by the foreigners. It gave shelter to Mary and Darnley after the murder of Rizzio, 1561, and again received the queen, this time in the company of Bothwell, on the rising of the Confederate Lords, 1567. The castle was destroyed by the regent Moray.

Duncan, ADAM, 1ST VISCOUNT CAMPERDOWN (1731-1804), entered the navy early in life. In 1749 he served in the Mediterranean under Keppel. He was wounded in the attack on Goree in 1758, and obtained his lieutenancy soon after the battle. In 1761 he took part in the expeditions against Belle Isle and Havannah, and was entrusted by Keppel with the difficult task of landing the troops in boats. In 1779 he was employed in the Channel till he accompanied Rodney to the relief of Gibraltar, and in the action of January 16, 1780, Duncan did good service, and was so hardly used in the battle that he had not a boat wherewith to take possession of his prizes. In 1782 he proceeded again to the relief of Gibraltar, on this occasion under Lord Howe, and in 1787 was made rear-admiral. Seven years later he received the command of a fleet stationed in the North Sea, and in this office had to watch the Dutch fleet at the Texel (1797). When the mutiny at the Nore broke out, Admiral Duncan found himself left with only two ships to blockade the enemy. His firmness upon this occasion contributed in no small degree to the suppression of the mutiny; but at the same time he kept up the semblance of a watch upon the Dutch admiral. Later, by retiring to Yarmouth, he gave De Winter, the Dutch admiral, an opportunity of putting out to sea. The chance was immediately taken by the Dutch, while the British fleet made every effort to cut off their retreat. On October 11, 1797, he managed by skilful tactics to get between the enemy and the land. He then broke through their line, and after a stubborn contest off Camperdown gained a complete victory, capturing two frigates and eight line-of-battle ships, including the admiral's ship. Duncan was at once rewarded by a peerage and a large pension. He remained, however, for two years more in the North Sea before coming home to spend his last days in retirement. He died suddenly on August 4, 1804, on his way to Scotland. [CAMPERDOWN.]

Biography by P. Haldane-Duncan, 1898.

Duncan I, KING OF SCOTLAND (d. 1040), son of Crinan, lay abbot of Dunkeld, succeeded his maternal grandfather Malcolm, in 1034. Defeated before the walls of Durham in the first year of his reign by Eardulf, Earl of Northumbria, Duncan next attempted to wrest Caithness from Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney, in order that he might bestow it upon his relative Moddan. In this attempt, however, the king was worsted in a naval engagement near the shores of the Pentland Firth, and in a battle at Burghead (q.v.), in Elgin. About this time, his general, Macbeth, Mormaer of Moray, went over to Thorfinn's side, and slew Duncan by treachery near Elgin, August 14, 1040. Duncan, who is called in the Sagas, Karl Hundason (hound's son), married a daughter of Siward, Earl of Northumbria. It is on the legendary accounts preserved of the incidents of this reign and the next that Shakespeare has founded his great tragedy Macbeth.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Duncan II, KING OF SCOTLAND (s. 1094, d. 1094), though some obscurity surrounds his birth, was, probably, the son of Malcolm Canmore by his first wife. When quite a boy, in 1072, Duncan was sent as a hostage to the English court after the Treaty of Abernethy. There he remained till 1094 when, with Norman aid, he succeeded in driving his uncle, Donald Bane (q.v.), from the Scottish throne. Six months afterwards, however, Donald procured his murder at the hands of Malpedir MacLean, Mormaer of Mearns. The scene of this crime was Mondynes, in Kincardineshire, and a huge monolith that is still found there is said to commemorate the event. The secret of his fate seems to lie in the fact that he was a Norman by education and character, and had perhaps agreed to hold the kingdom as a vassal of the English sovereign. He does not seem to have ever been fully recognized except in Lothian and Cumbria; for the Gaelic districts north of the Forth were at most only divided in his favour.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Duncannon, VISCOUNT (1781-1847). [PSONSBY, JOHN WILLIAM.]

Duncombe, SIR CHARLES (d. 1711), was originally "a goldsmith of very moderate wealth." He amassed a large fortune by banking, and purchased for £90,000 the estate of Helmsley, in Yorkshire. He subsequently accepted the place of cashier of the excise, from which he derived great wealth; but Montagu dismissed him from the office because he thought, with good reason, that he was not a man to be trusted. In 1697 we find him defending Sunderland in parliament. He accused Montagu of peculation, but failed to make good the charge, and was in turn accused of fraud and forgery in connexion with the exchequer bills. A bill of pains and penalties was accordingly brought in against him, after he had previously been sent to the Tower and expelled the House. The bill providing for the confiscation of the greater part of his property and its application to the public service, passed the Commons. It was felt, however, that the measure was open to censure, and that his judges had strong motives for voting against him. Urged by these and other reasons, the Lords threw out the bill, and the prisoner was released. He was, however, again arrested by order of the Commons, and kept in prison for the remainder of the session.

Dundalk is sometimes regarded as the scene of the great defeat suffered by John de Courcy at the hands of the Irish (1177); but the actual site of this battle was Downpatrick. In 1560 Dundalk was unsuccessfully besieged by the O'Neills, and in 1649 surrendered to Cromwell.

Dundalk (or FAUGHART), THE BATTLE OF (October 14, 1318), was fought during the invasion of northern Ireland by the Scots under Edward Bruce. Edward Bruce had some 3,000 men with him; and among the commanders were the de Lacys. The Anglo-Irish army was led by John Bermingham (q.v.). The victory was won at the first onset of the English forces; and the losses on the Scottish side were heavy. Bruce himself was killed, and his head was sent to Edward as a trophy. This battle put an end to the Scottish invasion.

Dundas, HENRY, 1ST VISCOUNT MELVILLE (1742-1811), was the son of Robert Dundas, who was for many years president of the Court of Session. Having adopted the bar as his profession, he made his way with wonderful rapidity to the forefront of his profession, being solicitor-general in 1773 and lord advocate two years later. In this position he threw himself eagerly into politics, abandoning the law. Attached to a ministry which, after a long period of office, was at last falling beneath a weight of obloquy, Dundas exhibited so much spirit and ability that he was at once recognized as promising to rise to the highest power. Not the smallest source of his rising reputation was the minute knowledge he displayed with regard to Indian affairs. On the fall of North's ministry, Lord Rockingham was not slow to avail himself of Dundas's services, which were employed in the office of lord advocate, an office which he combined, under Lord Shelburne, with that of treasurer of the navy. He retired, however, on the formation of the coalition (1783), but did not have long to wait before he resumed his old post under Pitt. In June 1793 he resigned the treasurer-ship to become president of the board of control with a seat in the cabinet. With Pitt he resigned in 1801, and was raised to the peerage in the following year. In 1804 he again followed Pitt into office, and was appointed first lord of the admiralty, where he remained until 1806, when he was impeached for misappropriation of public money during his former period of control over the navy treasury. Pitt defended his faithful follower and colleague with his utmost ability, but a strong case was brought against him, and when the numbers on division were equal, the Speaker gave his casting vote against Lord Melville. Pitt was quite broken down by the blow, and did not live long enough to see the censure reversed by the Lords in 1807, after which the name of Lord Melville, which had been erased, was restored to the privy council list. He had retired, however, to Scotland, and never again took any part in public affairs; and in retirement he died in May 1811. That Dundas had been "guilty of highly culpable laxity in transactions relating to public money," no one can doubt; but no loss had accrued to the State in consequence, and it was undeniable that he had exhibited a most praiseworthy energy in taking some steps to remedy the hopeless confusion and mismanagement which had for many years prevailed at the admiralty.

Dundee, in Forfarshire, was granted by William the Lion to his brother, David of Huntingdon, about 1200. It was taken from the English by Robert Bruce in 1306 and again by Edward Bruce in 1313. The English recaptured it in 1385. The town was pillaged by Protector Somerset. In 1645 it fell into the hands of Montrose, until Monck stormed it in 1651 and exterminated the garrison. John Graham of Claverhouse (q.v.) became constable of Dundee in 1684.

"Dunes, BATTLE OF THE." [DUNKIRK.]

Dunfermline, in Fifeshire, was long a favourite residence of the kings of Scotland, some of whom were buried in the monastery, which was founded by Malcolm Canmore and burnt by Edward I in 1304.

Dungal, the son of Sealbach, obtained the throne of Dalriada by his father's abdication in 723. He was soon afterwards driven out by Eochaidh, the head of the Cinel Gabran, who subsequently resisted Dungal's attempt to regain the throne at Ross Foichen, though the old king, Sealbach, had himself issued from his monastery to assist his son, 727. On the death of Eochaidh, 733, he regained the kingdom of Dalriada, but a year afterwards was compelled by Angus MacFergus to take refuge for a time in Ireland. In 736 Angus invaded Dalriada, imprisoning Dungal and his brother.

Dunganhill, BATTLE OF. The English

army under Colonel Michael Jones here defeated the Irish on August 8, 1647. Six thousand of the latter fell, while the English loss was inconsiderable.

Dungannon, HUGH O'NEILL, 3RD BARON OF (1540?–1616). [O'NEILL.]

Dungannon Convention, THE (September 8, 1785), is the name given to the meeting of the representatives of 270 of the Irish volunteer companies assembled at Dungannon under Grattan's influence. These delegates passed several resolutions, the object of which was to secure parliamentary reform for Ireland by threatening to withhold supplies unless the parliament of Westminster acceded to the demands. A convention was to have met at Dublin had not the Duke of Rutland's firmness prevented it.

Dunk, GEORGE MONTAGU, 2ND EARL OF HALIFAX (1716–71), succeeded to the title while still a boy. In 1761 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and a little later became one of Bute's secretaries of state. When the last-mentioned nobleman went out in March 1763, Lord Halifax combined with Lord Egremont and George Grenville to form the administration popularly known as the Triumvirate. It was in the joint names of Lords Halifax and Egremont that the general warrant was made out for the arrest of Wilkes. Lord Halifax has also been charged with the authorship of the most fatal measure of this unfortunate administration, viz., the Stamp Act; but though he was a warm advocate of the bill, as his office compelled him to be, there seems no evidence that he was the actual author of it. In 1765 he was a party with Lord Sandwich to the fraud which was practised on the king in order to make him agree to the omission of his mother's name from the council of regency; and the king seems to have felt more deeply injured by him than by Lord Sandwich. Nor did his conduct in this matter give satisfaction to his colleagues; and during the last few months of the Grenville administration complaints against Halifax seem to have been rife. The Grenville administration fell in 1765. When Lord North came into power (1770) Halifax was appointed secretary of state, but died the following year.

Dunkeld, in Perthshire, is chiefly remarkable as being the site where Constantine, King of the Picts from 789 to 820, founded a church, perhaps about the year 796, to which Kenneth MacAlpin transferred the relics of Columba from Iona in 851. This last event marked the date of the final decay of the ecclesiastical rule of the abbots of Iona, whose representatives, as heads of the Pictish Church, were henceforth to be the abbots of Dunkeld. In time Dunkeld Abbey fell into the hands of a lay abbot, while the bishopric of Fortrenn, which in earlier times had been filled by the abbot of Dunkeld, passed on to Abernethy. One of the most famous names in early Scottish history is that of Crinan, lay abbot of Dunkeld, whose son Duncan, King of Scotia, was murdered by Macbeth. Duncan's grandson, David I, either restored or established the bishopric about the year 1127.

Dunkeld, THE BATTLE OF (August 21, 1689), was a victory gained by the Cameronians over the Highlanders, and followed closely after Mackay's victory at St. Johnston's. The disorders in the Highland army had increased, and Lochiel had left them in disgust. Meanwhile, the Scottish privy council, against Mackay's wish, had sent a regiment of Cameronians to garrison Dunkeld under Cleland. Cannon, at the head of 500 men, advanced against the town. The outposts of the Cameronians were speedily driven in; but the greater part of the regiment made its stand behind a wall which surrounded a house belonging to the Marquis of Atholl. After all ammunition had been spent, and when both Cleland and his successor in command, Major Henderson, had been shot dead, the Cameronians succeeded in setting fire to the houses from which the Highlanders were firing on them. Soon disorder spread among the Highland host, and it returned hastily towards Blair. "The victorious Puritans threw their caps into the air and raised, with one voice, a psalm of triumph and thanksgiving. . . . The Cameronians had good reason to be joyful and thankful, for they had finished the war."

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Dunkirk. The port of Dunkirk was throughout the seventeenth century the headquarters of pirates and privateers who preyed on British commerce. Accordingly, when Cromwell allied himself with Louis XIV against Spain (March 1657), it was stipulated that Dunkirk and Mardyke should be besieged by a combined French and English army, and belong to England when captured. Six thousand men, first under Sir John Reynolds, afterwards under General Thomas Morgan, formed the English contingent. Mardyke was captured in September 1657, and Dunkirk besieged in the following May. On June 4 a Spanish army under Don John of Austria and the Prince of Condé, in which the Dukes of York and Gloucester were serving, attempted to raise the siege, but was defeated with great loss. The town surrendered ten days after this "Battle of the Dunes," and remained in English hands till 1662, when it and its dependencies were sold to Louis XIV for the sum of five million livres (October 27, 1662). The attacks on English trade still continuing, Dunkirk was unsuccessfully attacked by a combined Dutch and English fleet in 1692, and it was stipulated by the Treaty of Utrecht that the fortifications should be destroyed and the port blocked up (1713). This stipulation was repeated by the Treaties of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) and Paris (1763). Nevertheless, the city and port were continually restored, and in the years 1778 to 1782 the corsairs of Dunkirk captured 1,187 British vessels. In 1793 the town was besieged by a British army under the Duke of York, with the intention of retaining it as a compensation for the expenses of the war, but the victory of Hondschoote, by which the corps posted to cover his operations was forced to retreat, obliged the duke to abandon the enterprise.

Dunning, JOHN, 1ST BARON ASHBURTON (1731-83), was the son of an attorney at Ashburton, in Devonshire. After being articled to his father, he came up to London and was called to the bar in 1756. In 1762 he made a great reputation by the defence which he drew up on behalf of the East India Company against the Dutch claims. In 1765 he still further increased his fame by his eloquence in the cause of Wilkes against the legality of general warrants. In 1766 he became recorder of Bristol; was appointed two years later solicitor-general; and obtained a seat in parliament as member for Calne. In 1770 he went out of office, and throughout Lord North's long administration vigorously opposed the government policy. He warmly maintained the legality of the Middlesex election, advocated Catholic relief, seconded Sir George Savile's motion for an inquiry into government pensions, and was one of the most persistent opponents of the policy pursued towards the American colonies. In 1780 he carried the famous resolution that "the influence of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." In 1782, when the Marquis of Rockingham came into power, Dunning was appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and raised to the peerage.

Dunnottar (DUN FOTHER), in Kincardineshire, a few miles south of Stonehaven, is memorable for its siege by Brude MacBile in 681. It was again besieged in 694, and in 900 was the scene of the murder of Donald VI by the Danes. In 934 Athelstan advanced as far as Dunnottar with his invading army. The castle of Dunnottar was taken by Sir William Wallace in 1298, and by Sir Andrew Moray, 1356; in 1645 it was besieged by Montrose, and taken by Cromwell's troops, 1651. The castle belonged to the family of the Keiths, earls marischal. It was at Dunnottar that the revolting imprisonment of a body of Covenanters took place in 1685. The castle was dismantled after 1715.

Dunstable, THE TOWN OF, in Bedfordshire, is known in English history as the place where the barons met in 1244, and ordered the papal envoy to leave England; and where the commissioners for the divorce of Queen Katharine sat in 1533. Dunstable was the seat of a great abbey of monks, and was made the property of the foundation in 1131.

Dunstan, ST., Archbishop of Canterbury (960-88), the son of Heorstan and Cynethryth, was born near Glastonbury. Two of his kinsmen were bishops, and others were attached to the court, while his brother as "reeve" looked after the secular interests of Glastonbury Abbey. Kings Athelstan and Edmund lived very often in that neighbourhood, and Dunstan began both his court life and monastic training at a very early age. He became guardian of the "hord" of Edmund, and was consequently rewarded with the abbacy when still very young. Glastonbury was then only a monastery in name, served by married secular clerks, though even in its degradation very famous, and largely frequented by Irish pilgrims as the shrine of St. Patrick. Dunstan reformed this state of things, in the interests of education rather than as a fanatic of asceticism. Many tales are told of this early period of Dunstan's life, which are to be received only with the utmost caution. Nearly all the details of his biography are mythical. In 946 Edred succeeded Edmund. He was very sickly, of the same age as Dunstan, and the probable companion of his youth. Dunstan, who had closely attached himself to the king's mother, Eadgifu, and other great ladies, now began his political career. His policy resulted in the brilliant successes of the West Saxons, under Edred, culminating in the conquest of Northumbria from the Danes and the assumption of the title of Caesar by the English king in 955. But Dunstan still continued his activity as a teacher at Glastonbury, and refused the bishopric of Crediton. The death of Edred led to a reversion of Dunstan's policy. He had "aimed at the unity of England under the West Saxon Basileus, but giving home rule to each state." This policy was disliked by the West Saxon nobility, who regarded the vassal kingdoms as their own prey, and desired to make each state a dependency of Wessex. Their influence triumphed at the accession of Edwy, a boy of under fifteen. The ordinary details of the story of Dunstan's fall are quite incredible, but it remains a fact that the next year saw him banished. His stay at a great Benedictine abbey in Flanders first brought him in connexion with the monastic revival with which his name has been so closely associated. Meanwhile the dependent states revolted from Edwy, whose ministers, besides their reactionary policy, had set themselves too much against the monks to retain their position. The Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and chose Edgar king; he recalled Dunstan and made him bishop, first of Worcester, and then of London as well. His retention of a chapter of secular canons at both sees shows that he was at least not zealous for the monastic cause. On the death of Edwy, Wessex also acknowledged Edgar, and Dunstan was made Archbishop of Canterbury, and for a second time his policy triumphed. The glorious reign of Edgar the Peaceful was the result of the realization of Dunstan's ideas. The hegemony of Wessex was established on a firm basis, without the degradation of the other states. In ecclesiastical affairs also the monastic question came to a head, but how far Dunstan was identified with this movement it is hard to say. As a Benedictine, he doubtless preferred monks to secular canons, but he was no fanatic to force them on a reluctant race. In his own see he did not expel the canons, but in Mercia, where the fervour of monasticism was perhaps needed to repair the Danish ravages, monks came in everywhere. But Æthelwold of Winchester, "father of monks," was the real monastic hero, although the late biographers of Dunstan connected naturally his great name with what to them was the great movement of the age. His spiritual activity, however, was rather the activity of teacher and organizer, and after all he was more of a statesman than an ecclesiastic. If the coronation of Edgar at Bath was his work, and if it was a conscious reproduction of the ceremony which made Otto I Emperor of Rome, his claim to statesmanship must be exceptionally high. With Edgar's death a new period of confusion begins. After the troubled reign of Edward, the accession of Ethelred the Unready put power again into the hands of Dunstan's enemies, and ended finally his political career. We do not know who was the ruler of England during Ethelred's minority; but it does not seem to have been Dunstan. He lived on till 988, devoting his last years to the government of his diocese and his province, and in the pursuits of literature, music, and the finer handicrafts, to which he was always addicted. In his old age, as at Glastonbury in his youth, he reverted to the same studies and objects. He was, as Stubbs says, the Gerbert, not the Hildebrand, of the tenth century. The unreal romances of later biographers that have obscured his life in a cloud of myth must be disregarded for earlier, if scantier, authorities, if we desire to find out what the real man was.

The materials for Dunstan's biography are collected by Stubbs, in his "Memorials of Dunstan," in the Rolls Series. The "Introduction" is of great importance for the details of the Saint's career. Stubbs's collection includes a life by an almost contemporary Saxon monk, which, nevertheless, has a large legendary element, and later biographies by Adalbert and by Osbern, and still later by Eadmer and William of Malmesbury, to correct Osbern's mistakes. It is from these later sources that accounts like Milman's in "Latin Christianity" are drawn, and which consequently give entirely false impressions of the subject. Hume's famous account represents the reaction against the monastic idea that inspired Osbern and Eadmer. Like that in most of the ordinary histories it is historically worthless. Robertson's "Essays on Dunstan's Policy," and the "Coronation of Edgar," in his "Historical Essays," are extremely suggestive, but their theories are not always based on definite facts. [J. Armitage-Robinson, "The Times of St. Dunstan," 1923, throws valuable new light upon the movements, secular and ecclesiastical, with which Dunstan's name is associated.] [T. F. T.]

Dupleix, JOSEPH (1697-1763), was appointed governor of Pondicherry for the French East India Company in 1742. Before this final promotion he had spent over twenty years in the East, where he had acquired an enormous fortune. The outbreak of the war in 1744 gave him, as he thought, an opportunity for establishing the French ascendancy. La Bourdonnais, the French admiral, captured the town of Madras, and Dupleix, acting as governor-in-chief, and intending to destroy all the British settlements, refused to ratify the treaty which provided for the restoration of the town. But this act of perfidy was rendered useless by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), which stipulated for an exchange of conquests in India. On the death of the Nizam-ul-Mulk of the Deccan, and the dispute for the succession between his son, Nazir Jung, and his grandson, Mazafar Jung, Dupleix formed a confederacy with Chanda Sahib (q.v.), the pretender to the Carnatic, and Mazafar Jung to oust the British candidates, Nazir Jung and Mohammed Ali, and eventually, as he hoped, drive the British from India. The whole Carnatic was overrun by the French, and the British and their nawab were cooped up in Trichinopoly. Dupleix was equally successful in the Deccan. A conspiracy broke out at his instigation. Nazir Jung was murdered, and Mazafar Jung, assuming the vacant dignity, conferred the nawabship of the Carnatic on Chanda Sahib, and the viceroyalty of all India south of the Kistna on Dupleix. Clive's daring expedition to, and defence of, Arcot divided the forces of the allies, and the long string of successes which followed caused the complete failure of Dupleix's plans. As his success deserted him his employers became alienated. In 1754 he was recalled, to die in misery and poverty a few years afterwards in Paris.

Dupplin, THE BATTLE OF (August 12, 1332), was fought in Strathearn between Edward Baliol, the leader of the "disinherited barons" (q.v.), and the army of David II, under the Earl of Mar. Baliol, though at the head of a much smaller body of men, and in a most disadvantageous position, won a complete victory, owing to the over-confidence and inefficiency of the royalist troops.

Duquesne, FORT. [FORT DUQUESNE.]

Duras, LOUIS, EARL OF FEVERSHAM (1640?–1709), was a French noble, nephew of Turenne, who entered the English service under Charles II and James II, and commanded the army which defeated Monmouth at Sedgemoor. Though his incapacity in that campaign was only equalled by his brutality, he was made commander-in-chief of the army that James II collected to overawe his people. In 1688 he disbanded that army, and was for a short time imprisoned by William III.

Durham is chiefly memorable in early English history as an important centre in Deira, to which the bishop and clergy from Holy Island finally transferred the relics of St. Cuthbert to escape from the ravages of the Danes towards the end of the tenth century. The town seems to have suffered at the hands of William the Conqueror, when he laid waste the north in 1070. The same king built a castle here in 1072. Some twenty years later Bishop William of St. Calais commenced to build the great cathedral (1093). In later history, on account of its position near the borders, Durham was a place of great military importance in the wars between England and Scotland. As the seat of the courts of the Palatine jurisdiction of its bishop, it was a place of much political importance. Its chapter was exceedingly wealthy; and the plan of Oliver Cromwell, to establish a university out of the caputular revenues, was revived and carried out in 1833.

Durham, 1ST EARL OF (1792–1840). [LAMBTON, JOHN GEORGE.]

Durotriges, THE, were an ancient British tribe, occupying roughly the area of the present county of Dorset. Rhys considered them to have been, like the Dumnonii of Cornwall and Devon, in the main Goidels—that is, members of the earlier Celtic invasion, and therefore more likely to be to a considerable extent infused with the blood of the pre-Celtic races—rather than Brythons; but such evidence as exists on the point is inconclusive.

Durward, ALAN, EARL OF ATHOLL (d. 1268), was justiciar of Scotland in the middle of the thirteenth century, and married to an illegitimate daughter of Alexander II. He served with great credit in the French wars under Henry III, who afterwards supported his cause in Scotland. The Durward family was opposed to the influence of the great Norman family of the Comyns, and succeeded in wresting the young king, Alexander III, from his subjection to their rivals. This was accomplished by the seizure of Edinburgh Castle, after which the aspect of affairs in Scotland looked so serious that Henry III was obliged to come northwards and personally adjust the government (1255). He set up a council of regency consisting of Durward and his faction. But the party of the Comyns soon gained ground. In 1257 they once more secured possession of the young king, and Alan Durward was forced to flee to England, where he seems to have been always in favour with Henry III. The Comyns, however, lost their great leader, the Earl of Menteith, and in 1259 a compromise was effected whereby four members of the English party were admitted to the council of regency. In 1261 Alexander attained his majority, and thenceforward he was personally responsible for the conduct of affairs. At the close of the thirteenth century Nicholas de Soulis, one of Alan Durward's descendants through his wife Maryoz, claimed the succession to the throne of Scotland, a claim which, to some extent, explains the charge brought against Alan, in his lifetime, of intriguing with the pope for the legitimation of his wife, so as to make her next heir to the throne.

Dutch Wars, THE. [HOLLAND, RELATIONS WITH.]

Dynham, JOHN, LORD (d. 1509), lieutenant of Calais, was a Yorkist leader who, in 1459, sallied forth from Calais, and, proceeding across to Sandwich, captured two of the Lancastrian nobles, Lord Rivers and Lord Scales, whom he led back with him to Calais. He was also engaged in the battle of Towton, and for his services received large grants of land from Edward IV.

Ealdgyth [ALDGYTH], wife of Harold Godwinson, was the widow of Gruffyd, King of North Wales, daughter of Earl Elfgar of Mercia, and sister of Edwin and Morkere. The date of her second marriage is doubtful, but its motive, viz., to secure the friendship of her powerful brothers, is sufficiently plain. [HAROLD II, KING.]

Ealdorman. [ALDERMAN.]

Eanfrith, King of Bernicia (633-4), was the son of Ethelfrith. After his father's death he fled to Scotland, where he was converted to Christianity. On the death of Edwin he returned to Northumbria, and obtained his father's kingdom. But, like Osric, he relapsed into paganism, and, like him, was slain by Cadwallon of Wales.

Earl is a word which in the early Anglo-Saxon period has simply the sense of "noble." It was thus used in the laws of Ethelbert (c. 600): "If any man slay a man in an eorl's town, let him make compensation for twelve shillings." Its use was, however, restricted until the time of the Danish invasions; in the days of Ethelred the title began to supplant that of the official ealdorman, owing probably to its similarity in sound to the Danish jarl, with which it became identified. This change was completed by Canute, who gave the earl a permanent status among the servile nobility. The theory that he divided the kingdom into four great viceregal earldoms which continued down to the Norman Conquest is not borne out by the evidence of contemporary charters, which are witnessed by a much larger number of persons designated by the name of eorl or dux; but it is clear that already in the eleventh century it was usual for an earldom to embrace several shires. Under the Norman kings the title of earl became easily amalgamated with the French title of count, both having comes as their Latin equivalent. The nature of the office changed; it ceased to be a magistracy and became an hereditary fief. The earls of the reign of William I, who, even before the conspiracy of 1075, bestowed the title sparingly, were men who already held the title of count in Normandy, or were merely the successors of the English officials of the same name. Exceptions to this rule were the great palatine earldoms created by William, probably as part of the national system of defence. Such were the earldoms of Chester and Shrewsbury on the Welsh marches; the bishopric of Durham on the Scottish border; and the earldom of Kent. These earls were virtually independent princes, possessed of regalian rights, holding their own councils, appointing the sheriffs, and receiving the profits of the courts. It should be observed that they were all created before the great conspiracy of 1075. The sons of the Conqueror were also cautious in creating earldoms, and it has been estimated that at the end of the reign of Henry I there were not more than eight in existence. Stephen and Matilda, however, in order to gain adherents, created between them no fewer than fifteen, all of which were perpetuated by Henry II. In accordance with post-Conquest customs these new creations took their titles whenever possible from the counties in which lay the earl's chief territorial strength. The dignity of earl was hereditary, and was conferred by special investiture, the sword of the county being girt on by the king; and by this ceremony the rank was bestowed until the seventeenth century. As the successor of the ealdorman, the earl also received, in most if not in all cases, the "third penny" of the county (i.e., a third of the profits from the county pleas). His relief was higher than that of a baron. Gradually the dignity of earl ceased to imply a territorial jurisdiction, and became merely honorary. The precise date at which the change was effected is a matter of dispute, but historians are agreed that the official earldoms did not long survive the opening of the thirteenth century even if they lingered till then. Earls could be created by charter, or by letters patent, or later by act of parliament—a custom introduced by Edward III. The title continued to be taken from a county or county town (with the exception of the earldoms of Arundel and March) long after all local authority had disappeared. Later it became the custom for commoners and barons created earls to keep their own names instead of adopting local titles. An earl takes precedence after a marquis, and before a viscount or baron. Earthquake, COUNCIL OF THE (May 1382), was the name given to the synod at Blackfriars which condemned the tenets of Wyclif and his followers. [WYCLIF.] It was so called from a shock of earthquake which was felt on the third day of its sitting, and which did much damage in and around London.

East Africa, THE BRITISH DOMINIONS IN, consist of Kenya Colony and Protectorate, British Somaliland and Sokotra, Tanganyika Territory, Uganda Protectorate, and Zanzibar Protectorate. Nyassaland Protectorate and Northern and Southern Rhodesia are closely connected with the former possessions and may be treated as potential parts of British East Africa. They all have separate histories and problems, but there is at present a movement towards some sort of political confederation, the outcome of which is uncertain. Politically it consists of a north block (Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, and Zanzibar) and a south block (Nyassaland and Northern Rhodesia), each with problems of its own. Southern Rhodesia is of a different nature, older and more firmly established, a colony that has refused to join the Union of South Africa and yet has little incentive to join a similar union of East Africa should ever such a consummation be achieved. British connexion with East Africa dates roughly from 1839 when a commercial treaty was made. In 1841 a British consul was sent to Zanzibar and an anti-slave campaign followed. In 1862 England and France recognized Zanzibar's independence, but a British protectorate was established in 1890. In 1886 an Anglo-German agreement was arrived at, and a second in 1890. The Imperial British East Africa Company received its charter in 1888, and was bought out by the government in 1895, when the East Africa Protectorate and Uganda were taken under British protection. Somaliland came under British protection in 1887, the year after Sokotra. Tanganyika was a war conquest (1916-18).

ZANZIBAR, the centre of East African trade, became an independent dominion in 1856 when Said, Sultan of Muscat, drove out the Portuguese and suppressed piracy. Commercial treaties with U.S.A. (1833), France (1844), and Great Britain (1839) had been followed by the establishment of consulates on the island. The first British consul came into residence in 1841, but Zanzibar was an independent sultanate from 1861, when by Canning's award it was separated from Muscat, until 1890, when it became a British protectorate administered by the foreign office. In 1862 France and Great Britain had guaranteed its independence. Both, France in 1873 and Great Britain in 1877, had refused to assume a protectorate over Zanzibar when offered, but German commercial rivalry on the mainland, the disorderliness of Zanzibar, and the establishment of the British East Africa Company (1888) led to the establishment of the British protectorate in 1890. This was part of a general agreement between Great Britain and Germany defining their respective spheres of influence in East, West, and South-West Africa. Germany recognized the British protectorate over Zanzibar and withdrew her claims and settlements, in exchange for Heligoland. Great Britain recognized the French protection over Madagascar and French influence in Central Sahara, while France recognized the British protectorate over Zanzibar and Pemba. The bombardment of Zanzibar (1896) was followed by the abolition of the slave trade there, although the legal status of slavery was not abolished until 1907. From 1890 to 1906 a British resident was maintained at Zanzibar, but in 1906 British control was made definite and a council created. In 1913 Zanzibar was transferred to the colonial office. It had been a free port from 1892 to 1899.

BRITISH SOMALILAND. The capture of Aden in 1839 by the Bombay government led to the development of trade on the Somaliland coast. From 1877 Great Britain recognized the nominal jurisdiction of Egypt in Somaliland, but actually exercised control herself and declared a British protectorate in 1884. This was the result of a division of the coast between Great Britain, France, and Italy, the interior remaining subject to Abyssinia. The protectorate was notified in 1887, and the boundaries with France adjusted in 1888, with Italy in 1894, and with Abyssinia in 1897. The Italian protectorate dates from 1889. Fighting with the Mullah in four successive years (1901-4) resulted in Great Britain withdrawing to the coast, and in 1905 the protectorates were transferred from the foreign to the colonial office. In 1915 the Dervishes were driven out, and defeated in 1920.

SOKOTRA, now in effect a dependency of Aden, over which a protectorate was established in 1886 because of the activity of pirates, is governed by the sheikh, who is pledged not to cede the island to any foreign power. A British Trade Preferential Treaty has existed since 1876.

KENYA COLONY AND PROTECTORATE, originally known as the East Africa Protectorate, consists of the coast and a vast hinterland, defined by the boundary treaties of 1891 (with Italy), 1908 (Abyssinia), and 1925, together with the Witu Protectorate now administered as part of Tanaland. The Imperial British East Africa Company was incorporated in 1888, the protectorate assumed in 1890, and the country administered by the company from 1891 to 1893 as Ibea. Kenya Protectorate consists of the mainland dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, ceded, in return for £10,000 a year, to the company, from whom it was transferred to the Crown in 1895 and put under the control of a commissioner and commander. In 1905 it was transferred from the foreign to the colonial office and a governor and council appointed in 1906. The same year executive and legislative councils were introduced. In 1924 Jubaland was ceded to Italy, and in 1920 the territories outside the mainland dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar were annexed and recognized as a colony. The protectorate constitution from 1920 has been the governor and executive council of the colony, together with a legislative council to which Indian and Arab members were added in 1924. Native councils were added in 1924. The constitution of the colony, 1920, and altered in 1925, consists of a governor, an executive council of 7 official and 4 nominated unofficial members, and a legislative council of 11 officials (the council), 9 other nominated officials, 11 elected Europeans, 5 elected Indians, 1 Arab, and one unofficial member nominated to represent the Africans. The white settlers, many of them ex-war settlers, wish to impose a hut-tax in order to make the natives work, and desire full self-government. This last is not favoured by the colonial office, but has been virtually promised by the colonial secretary.

UGANDA PROTECTORATE. The native kingdom of Uganda was taken under British protection in 1894. From 1890 part had been administered by the Imperial British East Africa Company until it was taken over by the foreign office (1905), only to be transferred almost immediately to the colonial office. It is divided into 5 administrative provinces, where the natives are given some measure of self-government, though all is directly administered, except Rudolph Province. The Province of Buganda is a native kingdom with three native ministers and a native council. The governor of the protectorate is assisted by a nominated executive council (since 1920) of 4 official and 2 unofficial members and a legislative council consisting of the former with the addition of 2 more unofficial members.

TANGANYIKA TERRITORY is administered by Great Britain under a League of Nations mandate (1922). Originally the colony of German East Africa, a protectorate (1885) by Germany had been recognized by Great Britain in 1886. The coastline territory of the Sultan of Zanzibar was acquired in 1890. In 1889 and 1905 native risings had been suppressed. It was captured (1916-18) and a British administration appointed in 1919. A governor and an executive council of 6 officials were appointed in 1920, and the districts administered by Belgium taken over in 1921. In 1922 slavery was abolished, a mild form of serfdom having existed from 1905, when a German enactment provided for the gradual abolition of slavery. In 1926 a legislative council of 13 official and up to 10 unofficial members was added. The mandate lays down stringent conditions as to native labour and land.

East Anglia. There is no account left us of the settlement of the Angles on the eastern shires of central England, nor have we even any such entry as that of the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," which for the more northern Anglian district relates that Ida assumed the kingdom of Northumbria in the year 547. Nothing of the details of the conquest is known to us now, and we can only dimly infer a two-fold settlement, which has perpetuated itself down to our own days in the two counties of the North Folk and the South Folk (Norfolk and Suffolk). If the evidence of later genealogies be accepted, we must conclude that the East Anglian settlements coalesced into a state during the first half of the sixth century. The first historical king of the East Angles is Redwald, the protector of Edwin of Deira (q.v.), and the fourth of the "Bretwaldas," who reigned from about 593 to 617. This Redwald was, according to Beda's account, the grandson of one Wuffa, from whom the East Anglian kings took their gentile name of Wuffings. In his days East Anglia was to some extent dependent on the kingdom of Kent, and Redwald seems to have become half Christian under the pressure of his overlord. But the new creed was not as yet thoroughly acceptable to the mass of the people. Redwald's son and successor, Eorpwald, was slain by one of his own subjects in 627 or 628, the year of his conversion, and for several years the land reverted to paganism. But at last Eorpwald's cousin, Sigebert the Learned, who had received the new faith during his exile among the Franks, returned to rule the kingdom. Under his protection Felix the Burgundian began the work of reconversion or conversion at Dunwich. Two years later Fursey, an Irish monk, came over to East Anglia, and before long Sigebert himself resigned his throne, and retired into a monastery (634). Next year, however, he was dragged forth from his retreat by his people, who were now yielding before the growth of Mercia, and perished in the battle against Penda. Anna, the nephew of Redwald, succeeded, and is noted chiefly for the sanctity of his four daughters, who all eventually embraced a religious life. It was at his court that Cenwealh of Wessex took refuge when driven out of his own country by Penda, and it was while resident in the East Anglian realm that he became a Christian. For the hospitable shelter afforded to Cenwealh, Anna incurred the resentment of Penda, who now fell on the East

Anglians and utterly destroyed Anna and his host (645). East Anglia seems now to have been dependent on Mercia to some extent, and Penda appears to have used Anna's brother Æthelhere as a tool against Northumberland. But with the battle of the Winwæd, the sceptre of Britain passed to Oswy of Northumbria, and doubtless the East Angles from this time, though retaining their own king, became dependent on the great kingdom of the north. But Mercia was not long in reviving, and it may well be that by the time of Oswy's death the power of Northumbria was only nominal in East Anglia. During the reign of Wulfhere (659-75) the East Angles seem to have been practically under the rule of Mercia. Towards the beginning of the reign of Eadwulf, king of the East Angles, the new diocese of Elmham was founded for the Northfolk. The seat of this see was removed to Thetford about the year 1078, and to Norwich in 1101, having towards the end of the ninth century incorporated Dunwich, the diocese of the Southfolk [BISHOPRIC.] From this time we may regard East Anglia as being an appendage of Mercia, till on the fall of that kingdom it was attached to Wessex. In accordance with this view, we find Ethelbald of Mercia leading the East Angles to fight against the West Saxons at the battle of Burford (752). On Ethelbald's defeat, East Anglia seems for a time to have thrown off the Mercian yoke; but before the close of his reign it must again have been subject, though still retaining its own kings. East Anglia and Mercia were the two kingdoms whose frontiers marked the boundaries of Offa's short-lived archbishopric of Lichfield. But by this time the days of Mercia's greatness were almost numbered, and it had already laid up a deep store of hatred in the subject kingdom of East Anglia. For in 793 Offa had caused Ethelbert, the king of the East Angles, to be put to death, and had thereupon seized his kingdom. Hence it is no wonder that when Ecgbert of Wessex had defeated Beornwulf of Mercia at the battle of Ellandune (825), the king of the East Angles should request the victorious West Saxon sovereign to help them to throw off the Mercian yoke, and, encouraged by his promise, defeat his tyrannical overlord and his successor in two battles. East Anglia seems to have still clung to its old kings under the West Saxon overlordship till the days of the Danish invasion, when its last native king, Edmund, was murdered by the Danes (870). The land was then taken possession of by the invaders, and by the Treaty of Chippenham became the seat of a Danish kingdom under Guthrum (878). [DANELAGE.] Later on, notwithstanding the treaty, the Danes of East Anglia aided Hastings in his attacks upon England. Alfred's son and successor, however, succeeded in forcing the Danes of East Anglia to acknowledge him after a long struggle, which lasted nearly all his reign. From this time their existence as a separate kingdom ceased, but they seem still to have retained their own witan, which in 1004 bought peace of Sweyn. When the kingdom was divided between Canute and Edmund Ironside in 1016, East Anglia fell to Edmund's share; on Canute's death it declared, with the rest of the country north of the Thames, for Harold Harefoot. Under Canute, East Anglia had been one of the earldoms into which the kingdom was divided, and it continued an earldom under Edward the Confessor. Harold seems to have been appointed to this office about the year 1045. With the Conquest the separate existence of East Anglia comes to an end. [ANGLES; ANGLO-SAXON KINGDOMS.]

East India Company. [INDIA.]

East Retford Question (1828).

The borough of East Retford had been convicted of corruption, and the question of the manner in which its franchise should be disposed of was brought before the House of Commons. On the one hand, it was proposed that it should be given to the town of Birmingham; on the other, that it should be transferred to the hundred in which East Retford is situated. The Duke of Wellington and the majority of the cabinet supported the latter alternative; Huskisson (colonial secretary) supported the former. The divergence involved the resignation of Huskisson and his fellow Canningites in May, and left the cabinet more united under Wellington and Peel. [HUSKISSON.]

Eastern Association, THE. [ASSOCIATED COUNTIES.]

Ebbfleet, in the Isle of Thanet, has been identified with the Heopwines-fleet or Wippedesfleote, where, according to the story told in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," Hengest and Horsa (q.v.) landed (in 449 or 450), and near which Hengest and Aesc are said some years later to have totally defeated the Britons. It has been conjectured that Ebbfleet was also the landing-place of St. Augustine in 597.

Ecclesiastical Commission Court, THE, was established by James II in 1686, with powers similar to those of the Court of High Commission (which had been abolished in 1641). It enforced the king's orders against controversial sermons, deprived the master of Magdalene College, Cambridge, for refusing to give a degree to a Benedictine monk, and expelled the fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford, for refusing to elect a royal nominee (Anthony Farmer) as president. James dissolved the commission in October 1688. [HIGH COMMISSION, THE COURT OF.]

Ecclesiastical Commissioners, THE. In 1835 a commission was appointed "to consider the state of the several dioceses in England and Wales with reference to the amount of their revenues, and the more equal distribution of episcopal duties; to consider also the state of cathedral and collegiate churches with a view to the suggestion of such measures as may render them more conducive to the efficiency of the Established Church; and to devise the best means of providing for the cure of souls, with special reference to the residence of the clergy on their respective benefices." This commission recommended a further distribution of episcopal duties and revenues, and the establishment of a fund to provide for worship in poor districts by the appropriation of part of the revenues of cathedral and collegiate churches, and of the surplus revenues of certain bishoprics. For this latter purpose a commission was created by an act of 1836 with all the powers of a perpetual corporation. In 1850 Queen Victoria was empowered to nominate two "Church Estates Commissioners" (one paid), and the archbishop one (paid). These were to be members of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and to form with two other members the "Church Estates Committee," which was to manage all the property of the commission. They were empowered to secure fixed incomes to bishops, and to manage episcopal estates; to make grants to, or increase the endowments of, poor livings; and to arrange for the creation of new parishes, etc. In 1856 they became also the Church Building Commissioners (first created in 1818).

Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. In England the canon law has a separate history from that which prevailed on the continent. There the influence of the Theodosian Code secured it a uniform procedure and a ready acceptance. Here it was modified by, and in constant antagonism to, the common law. Before the Conquest the law of the Church in England consisted of rules of penance, canons, religious laws, and the course of episcopal jurisdiction. Rules of penance, appropriating to every sin the amount of satisfaction to be paid by the sinner, are laid down in the penitentials of Archbishop Theodore, Bæda, and others. These were binding only in so far as conscience enforced them. Some canons from abroad were adopted, and others were made by provincial councils. Royal laws on religious matters—e.g., the laws of Alfred—are not properly part of ecclesiastical law. They had their binding force as part of the law of the land. Besides these written laws, the bishop or his archdeacon, sitting in the shire or hundred court, declared the law on ecclesiastical matters; for to the bishop pertained the duty of watching over sacred persons and things, and deciding matrimonial cases. As the ealdorman pronounced the secular law in matters which were secular, so in ecclesiastical cases the bishop pronounced the law which was proper to them. The ordinance of the Conqueror, separating the spiritual and temporal courts, provided that the bishop should judge ecclesiastical causes in his own court, and according to the canons and episcopal laws, which were to take the place of the unwritten law which decided these matters. With this ordinance must be connected the appointment of men like Lanfranc, who were skilled in the law of the continent, to the English episcopate. Dioceses now were broken up into different territorial archdeaconries for the purposes of jurisdiction. During the reign of Stephen the bishops were upheld by papal interference, and the middle of the twelfth century saw a great epoch in the history of canonical jurisprudence. In 1149 Archbishop Theobald brought over Vacarius from Lombardy to teach the civil law in Oxford. Vacarius was sent out of the kingdom by Stephen, but the study which had lately been revived abroad drew many from England to pursue it on the continent. About this time Gratian, a native of Tuscany, put forth his "Decretum," which was an embodiment of canon law as it then stood. As the mode of procedure and many principles in canonical jurisprudence were supplied by the civil law, the two systems were held to be closely joined. They were looked upon with dislike by the common-lawyers and the Crown. Ecclesiastical courts were continually trying to extend their jurisdiction. They harassed the people, and encroached on the province of the royal courts. Henry II curtailed their jurisdiction by taking away from them cases of advowson, etc., and by the Constitutions of Clarendon. [BECKET; HENRY II.] Their encroachments were checked by prohibitions issued by the royal courts. As the Decretum received new additions from successive popes, so the English canon law was enlarged by the addition of constitutions, legatine and provincial. Legatine constitutions began from the legations of Otho and Ottobon, in the reign of Henry III, which may therefore be reckoned as the period at which the received text of the English canon law began to be formed. Successive archbishops, from Langton to Chichele, framed provincial constitutions. Ecclesiastical jurisprudence was so closely connected with papal and foreign influence that it met with little favour from Englishmen in the reign of Henry III. Complaint was made by the clergy of the use of prohibitions. In 1236 the barons at the Council of Merton refused to admit canonical or civilian principles into the laws of England; and the king closed the law schools in London where the canon and civil laws were taught. Archbishop Peckham (q.v.), a notable canonist, engaged in a vain struggle against Edward I. He drew on his cause the defeat inflicted by the writ Circumspecte agatis, founded on 13 Ed. I, which defines the province of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was limited to cases merely spiritual (e.g., heresy), to those of deadly sin (e.g., fornication), of tithes and offerings, and of assaults done on clerks and defamation where no damages were claimed. It extended to all matrimonial causes, and by customary law to those of a testamentary nature. In cases in which the condemned party neglected to give heed to the ecclesiastical censure, it was enforced by the civil power. For the bishop sent his significavit to the sheriff, who thereupon issued a writ De excommunicato capiendo, by which the offender was imprisoned until he made satisfaction. The ecclesiastical authorities seem, by the Articuli Cleri drawn up in the reign of Edward II, to have been dissatisfied with this process, and received answer that the writ had never been refused. The canonists held that this writ was a right, and Archbishop Boniface in the reign of Henry III declared that its refusal might be answered by an interdiction. Chief Justice Coke, however, the violent opponent of canonical pretension, declared in the reign of James I that it was a matter of favour. The statute De Hæretico Comburendo was carried out by the ecclesiastical and civil authorities acting together. The Statute of Provisors, 25 Ed. III, c. 4, by restraining the pope's interference with patronage, and of Præmunire, 16 Ric. II, c. 5, by checking appeals to Rome, lessened the power of the ecclesiastical law. In the reign of Henry V, Lyndwood, the Dean of Arches, compiled his "Provinciale," which is a code of English canon law. The study of canonical and civil jurisprudence was largely pursued at Oxford and Cambridge, and a degree of doctor of both laws was granted. A body of skilled judges and practitioners versed in the science of law existed side by side with those of the common-law courts.

Early in the reign of Henry VIII it was evident that that monarch disliked the canonical jurisdiction. His breach with the pope, consequent on the avocation of his divorce case, was made the occasion for his attack on the study and practice of canon law. Having caused the clergy to own him as supreme head, "so far as is allowed by the law of Christ," he procured the great petition of the Commons against the practice of the canon law in 1532.

On this, by 23 Hen. VIII, c. 9, the appellate jurisdiction of the archbishop was weakened, and by 25 Hen. VIII, c. 19, the power of legislation was taken away from convocation, and the canon law was declared to be in force, subject to a total revision by a royal commission. As this revision has never been made, the canon law up to that date, in so far as any part of it has not been abolished by national legislation, seems to rest on that statute. Such provisions only of foreign canon law, however, have force as have been received in England, nor can any law bind the laity which has not received the assent of parliament. Henry next proceeded to destroy the study of canonical jurisprudence. He issued a mandate forbidding lectures and degrees in canon law. From that time the legal doctorate in Oxford has only been in civil law, expressed by the letters D.C.L., while Cambridge still keeps up the form of the doctorate of the two laws by the LL.D. degree. A new court of appeal in ecclesiastical cases, composed of divines and civilians, was formed in this reign, and called the Court of Delegates. This court was superseded in 1831, and by 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 41, it was enacted that its jurisdiction should be transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, an arrangement which has been again altered by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. The legislation of Edward VI was destructive of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction. During his reign an abortive attempt was made by Peter Martyr, in his "Reformatio Legum," to accomplish the revision promised in 1534. Elizabeth, while making as little declaration of power as possible, fully kept up the royal supremacy in action. She exercised this supremacy by the Court of High Commission, founded in virtue of 1 Eliz., c. 1. This unconstitutional court became an engine of tyranny, in which it was aided in no small degree by the ecclesiastical practice of the ex-officio oath. The court was abolished by 16 Car. I, c. 11, which set forth that it had illegally inflicted fines and imprisonments. The ex-officio oath was abolished by 15 Car. II, c. 12. The canons of 1604, though approved by James I, were not accepted by parliament, and are therefore only binding on the clergy. This was declared by Coke, who made on all occasions decided resistance to ecclesiastical encroachment. Unfortunately this resistance was combined with an undue exaltation of the royal prerogative in ecclesiastical matters, and tended rather to the subservience of the clergy than to public liberty. That some resistance to clerical pretensions was needed is shown by the Articuli Cleri of Archbishop Bancroft. In these articles remonstrance was made against the issue of prohibitions by the courts of common law, and against their interpreting statutes concerning religion. Coke declared these articles to be "monstrous." A lamentable co-operation between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions resulted in the execution by burning of two men for heresy in this reign, under the old statute De Heretico Comburendo. This statute was repealed by 29 Car. II, c. 29. The gradual advance towards toleration weakened the power of the Church to punish offenders against her laws, though, until the end of the eighteenth century, fine or imprisonment and civil disabilities still sometimes followed her censures. At length the power of coercive correction was taken away by 53 Geo. III, c. 127.

The ecclesiastical courts are—(1) The Court of the Archdeacon, of which his official is judge, and which takes cognizance of matters affecting the Church and clergy within a distinct district. Archidiaconal courts have, however, now fallen into virtual abeyance, owing partly to the decline of ecclesiastical jurisdictions in general, and partly to the competition of the consistory courts. (2) The Consistory Court of the bishop or archbishop, of which the chancellor is judge, for the trial of ecclesiastical causes. The title of chancellor seems to cover the two offices of the official, who is concerned for the most part in what may be considered temporal business, and of the vicar-general, whose province is in more purely spiritual matters. (3) The Archbishop's Commissary Court, which is held for the archiepiscopal diocese. (4) The Court of Audience, in which formal business is transacted, and in which it appears, from the case of the Bishop of St. Davids, 1696, that bishops may be visited and corrected. (5) The Court of Faculties, which, by 25 Hen. VIII, c. 21, has power to grant certain dispensations which before pertained to the papal court. This court is now chiefly concerned in the grant of marriage licences. (6) The Prerogative Court lost its jurisdiction when the Court of Probate and Divorce was instituted, 20 and 21 Vict., c. 77, c. 85. (7) The Vicar-General's Court for the confirmation of bishops; and (8) The Court of Arches (for which see ARCHBISHOPS). By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, provision was made for the transfer of ecclesiastical appeals from the Judicial Committee by order-in-council. This portion of the act, however, was repealed by 39 and 40 Vict., c. 59, which preserves the appellate jurisdiction of the judicial committee in these cases, and provides for the appointment of additional lords of appeal in ordinary, and for the attendance of ecclesiastical assessors. These provisions were carried out by the Rules of November 28, 1876. (See Chitty's "Digest," 1880.) A royal commission to inquire into the whole subject of Ecclesiastical Courts and their jurisdiction drew up an exhaustive report in 1883.

Ecclesiastical Taxation. (1)

ROYAL.—Before the Conquest, the differentiation of clergy from laity had not proceeded far enough to necessitate separate ecclesiastical taxation. The clergy paid their share of the dues customary from citizens, and if they were in any way distinguished from the laity, it was on account of their participating, on the analogy of the Empire, in certain immunities which, so early as the Codes of Theodosius and Justinian, were permitted to the clergy. But the great papal and sacerdotal movement of the eleventh century resulted in the formation of a clerical caste, whose claim for absolute immunity from State burdens was based on right divine. Yet, as citizens, the clergy still paid taxes like other men. Besides their necessary share in indirect taxation, the "temporalities of the Church," their lands, were chargeable with the ordinary feudal services. Much of the land held by clergymen was held by ordinary lay tenure, with incidents precisely similar. Even the peculiar clerical tenure of frankalmoign did not exempt the tenants in free alms from heavy burdens. The spiritualities of the Church, however, its tithes and offerings, were now secure from taxation. But the growth of the royal power and royal needs made these spiritualities an ever-tempting bait. Gradually attempts were made to tax them, with results which, though successful for the Crown, led to the growth of the constitutional action of the clergy, the development of the ecclesiastical estate, and the establishment of convocation. The Saladin Tithe (q.v.) of 1188 began the new epoch by at once taxing the movables of the laity and the spirituals of the clergy. Its religious purpose excused an innovation, which at once became a precedent for more directly secular taxation. The ransom of Richard I took even the chalices of the churches. John's attacks on the wool of the Cistercians led the way to his formal demand in 1207 for a grant from the benefited clergy for the recovery of Normandy. It was refused, and a similar request from Innocent III was forbidden by the king. But with the alliance of pope and king, a joint pressure was put on the clergy which they could not long withstand. By the reign of Henry III taxation of spirituals was a regular thing, and the clergy could only obtain that, like the laity, they should assemble by their representatives, and grant the tax themselves, instead of its being arbitrarily imposed on them by the king. The establishment of convocation (q.v.) is one result of this process. Under Edward I the clergy were represented in parliament, where their proctors generally were compelled to make much larger grants than the laity. At last Edward I's demand of half their reveuues led to their taking refuge in Boniface VIII's bull, Clericis laicos (q.v.), which forbade clerical taxation by the Crown. Edward's answer was to outlaw the whole clergy, an act which soon led to a compromise. It is unnecessary to trace further the growth of clerical taxation, except to notice that the clergy objected to returning representatives of their estate to parliament, and preferred to tax themselves separately in their clerical synod to sharing in the burdens and deliberations of the nation. The importance attached to accurate assessment of spiritual incomes is seen in the minuteness of the "Valor Ecclesiasticus" of Henry VIII. This custom of separate clerical taxation continued over the Reformation, until 1664, when an agreement between Archbishop Sheldon and Clarendon resulted in the clergy's abandoning this right and reverting to the custom of Edward I by being included in the money bills prepared by the House of Commons. In 13 Car. II the clergy gave their last separate subsidy. They received in compensation the right of voting at parliamentary elections, but it was too late for them to return, as of old, special clerical proctors to the House of Commons. [CONVOCACTION.]

(2) PAPAL.—Besides these special royal exactions, the clergy were also liable to heavy taxation at the hands of the pope. This was of comparatively late origin, for Peter's Pence (q.v.) was not an exclusively clerical tax. It reached its highest point under Henry III, when to ecclesiastical the popes added temporal supremacy through John's submission, and diminished after the nationalist movement of the fourteenth century affected even the Church, but was a subject of continual complaint up to the Reformation. The Crown handed over the clergy to the papacy in return for papal permission of royal exactions more often than it protected them against the alien oppressor. [PAPACY, RELATIONS WITH.]

Ecclesiastical Titles Act, THE (1851), was passed in response to a great popular outcry in England against the pope. In 1850 much commotion was caused by a papal bull appointing a Roman Catholic archbishop and bishops with territorial titles in England. The following year Lord John Russell passed the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, declaring the pope's bull null and void, and imposing penalties on all who carried it into effect. The excitement, however, soon died away, and the act was repealed in 1871.

Ecgbert, KING OF THE WEST SAXONS (802-39), was a member of the royal house of Wessex, but was also connected with the line of Kentish rulers or sub-kings. After the death of Cynewulf (793 or 796 ?) he appears to have laid claim to the throne, but Brihtic, the vassal and ally of Offa, King of Mercia, drove him into exile. Ecgbert took refuge in the dominions of Charles the Great, where he remained for three years. How he spent the years of his exile or in what circumstances he returned to England is unknown; but on the death of his rival Brihtic in 802 he was chosen as his successor. For many years he remained the vassal of the King of Mercia, but after the death of Cenwulf in 821 Wessex embarked upon a struggle for independence and domination. The contest culminated in a great victory over Beornwulf at Ellandune (825), after which Ecgbert annexed the lesser kingdoms of Kent, Surrey, Sussex, East Anglia, and Essex, which had become Mercian dependencies. Four years later the great kingdom itself was reduced; and shortly afterwards Northumbria, a prey to internal dissensions, owned his overlordship. So great was Ecgbert's success that his subjects hailed him as Bretwalda—the eighth in succession from the shadowy Ella of Sussex. Having thus established a power co-extensive with the English settlements, Ecgbert set himself to reduce the Welsh, and was as successful as he had previously been over the Celtic inhabitants of Cornwall. Over the Celts north of the Dee, however, his power did not prevail. Towards the end of Ecgbert's reign an old enemy, the Danes, began to reappear. In 838 he won over them and the Cornish Welsh a great battle at Hengestesdun (Hengest Down, near Plymouth), which for the time checked their invasions. The renewal of their inroads under his successors was to result in the perpetuation in the royal house of Wessex of the kingship of all England.

Edbert (EADBERHT), PRÆN, KING OF KENT (796-8), seems to have been collaterally connected with the old Kentish royal house, and to have been an ecclesiastic before his accession. It is possible that he had been forced into a monastery by Offa, on whose death he hastened to assert the independence of Kent and his own claim. In 798, however, he was attacked in force by Cenwulf of Mercia, who ravaged Kent and obtained the excommunication of Edbert by the pope. Cenwulf eventually took Edbert prisoner, and is said to have caused his eyes to be put out and his hands amputated.

Edbert (EADBERT), KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (737-58), was the cousin of Ceolwulf, whom he succeeded, and brother of Ecgbert, Archbishop of York. He was a successful ruler; he checked a Mercian attack under Ethelbald, and in 756 reduced the British kingdom of Strathclyde to subjection with the help of Angus, king of the Picts. His friendship was sought by Pepin of France, who sent him costly presents. Like many of his contemporaries he abdicated and retired to a monastery, where he lived for nine years.

Edburga (EADBURH) (fl. c. 800), daughter of Offa of Mercia and wife of Bertric, King of Wessex, according to West Saxon legend poisoned her husband by mistake, having intended the death of his favourite. It is said that, "in detestation of the crime, the West Saxons determined that henceforth no wife of a king should occupy a royal throne by her husband's side, or bear the title of queen." We are told that she fled to the court of Charles the Great, who made her an abbess. "But she ruled over the monastery ill, and did wickedly in all things." Expelled thence, after many wanderings she is said by Asser to have died a beggar in the city of Pavia.

Eden, GEORGE, 1ST EARL OF AUCKLAND (1784-1849), the second son of the 1st Lord Auckland, entered parliament as member for Woodstock, and in 1814 succeeded to the peerage. In 1830 he was appointed president of the board of trade, and in 1834 was for a few months first lord of the admiralty. On the return of his friends to office, Lord Auckland was appointed governor-general of India, and quitted England (1835) for the administration of affairs in that country. Before he had been six months in Calcutta he perceived a storm gathering in the North-West. The complications which arose brought on a great political crisis with which he was not competent to deal. He had little reliance on his own judgment, and acted for the most part under the influence of those who surrounded him. His administration is almost exclusively comprised in the fatal expedition to Afghanistan. [AFGHAN WARS.] In February 1842 the arrival of Lord Ellenborough at Calcutta brought Lord Auckland's administration to a close. On his return he was created an earl. On the accession of the Russell cabinet, 1846, he was once more placed at the head of the admiralty board.

Eden, WILLIAM, 1ST BARON AUCKLAND (1744-1814), the third son of a Durham baronet, Sir Robert Eden, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, and was called to the bar in 1769. In 1771 he published "Principles of Penal Law," which brought him into notice, and he was appointed auditor and one of the directors of Greenwich Hospital, and in the following year an under-secretary of state. In 1774 the Duke of Marlborough gave him the family seat of Woodstock. Two years later he was appointed to the board of trade, and, again after two years, one of the commissioners for making terms with the American colonies. His mission was unsuccessful, but it made him acquainted with Lord Carlisle, who, in 1780, appointed him his secretary in Ireland, where Eden remained until the Rockingham ministry came into power in 1782. He conducted an active opposition to that government, and on its fall was made a privy councillor and vice-treasurer of Ireland—an office, however, which he soon resigned. In 1785 he went over to Versailles with plenary powers to negotiate a treaty of commerce with France, and was most successful. In 1788 he was appointed ambassador to Spain. On his return a year later he was raised to an Irish peerage, and was almost immediately afterwards sent to Holland as ambassador. He held this position until, in May 1793, he was raised to the British peerage. In 1798 he was appointed by Pitt to be joint postmaster-general, and only gave up the place when Pitt went out of office in 1801. He was a warm supporter of most of Pitt's measures, and especially of the union with Ireland, the scheme for which he had himself helped to prepare. He was the author of measures for bettering the condition of criminals, for erecting penitentiaries, and for substituting hard labour for transportation.

Edgar (EADGAR), KING (b. 944, s. 959, d. 975), was the younger son of King Edmund. We read that in 957 the Mercians and Northumbrians, disgusted at the inefficient rule and vicious life of his elder brother Edwy, chose Edgar for their king, although he was at the time not more than fourteen years old. On Edwy's death, at the end of the year 958, Edgar was elected king of all England. His reign owes a great deal of its importance and success to Dunstan, whom he recalled from exile immediately after his accession to power, and who became to all intents and purposes his "prime minister." The reforms in the Church which belong to this reign were the joint work of the king and the archbishop [DUNSTAN]. Several new sees were established, and many monasteries were founded or refounded by Edgar. There are but few striking events recorded in Edgar's reign, and the absence of Danish invasions is very marked. There are the usual wars against the Welsh (965), and some trouble was occasioned by the Scandinavian settlers in Cumbria; but normally the surrounding kingdoms seem to have been in a condition of quiet vassalage, from Scotland to the Bristol Channel; and certainly Edgar more than any other Saxon king deserved the title "Pacificus." The story of his being rowed on the Dee by six or eight tributary kings need not be considered altogether apocryphal. The "Chronicle" tells us that in 973 he was met at Chester by six kings, who plighted their troth to him, while later authorities enumerate eight kings as having taken part in the ceremony—Kenneth of Scotland, Malcolm of Cumbria, Magnus and Siferth of Man and the Isles, Dunwallon of Strathclyde, Jago and Howell of North Wales, and "Juchil" of South Wales. Just previous to this, after he had been king fifteen years, Edgar was solemnly crowned at Bath. The story that this coronation was necessary on account of the penance he had to undergo for the abduction of a nun rests on no good authority, but no other solution has been attempted of this curious circumstance. In 975 Edgar died. He had been twice married: first to Ethelfleda, by whom he had Edward, who succeeded him, and secondly to Elfrida (Ælfthryth), who became the mother of Ethelred. The numerous stories of his amours, though no doubt greatly exaggerated, show his private character to have been anything but exemplary; as a king, however, he was a worthy successor of Alfred. He was the first West Saxon ruler who made his supremacy really felt over the Mercians and Northumbrians, and who was fully entitled to call himself king of all England. His legislation seems to show the results of an enlightened attempt to put Saxons, Angles, and Danes on a perfect equality before the law. His close association with the nobles of the north, and the favour he showed to the Danelagh, did not, however, increase his popularity among his West Saxon subjects; while the resentment against him was increased by the policy of monastic reform which he pursued in conjunction with Dunstan. His premature death left the succession to be disputed between his sons; while his policy had already marked out the lines of cleavage between north and south, which were to become so disastrously apparent under Ethelred. His reign marks the climax of the power of the West Saxon house, and also the beginning of its decline. In recording his death, the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" gives an interesting fragment of a poetical estimate of the king:—

" This year died Edgar,
King of the English,
Dear Lord of West Saxons,
The Mercians' protector.
Widely was it known
Through many nations
Across the gannet's bath [i.e., the sea],
That Edmund's offspring
Kings remote Greatly honoured,
To the king submitted,
As to him was fitting,
Was no fleet so insolent,
No host so strong,
That in the English race
Took from him aught
The while the noble king Reigned on his throne ! "

Edgar (EADGAR), KING OF SCOTLAND (1097-1107), son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, obtained the crown from his rival Donald Bane chiefly by the aid of his uncle, Edgar Atheling (q.v.), and Rufus, King of England. He confirmed Magnus of Norway, who in 1102 devastated the Lindseys with fire and sword and captured Man, in the possession of the western isles; the rest of his reign was exceedingly uneventful, owing, perhaps, to his mild character, which has caused him to be likened to Edward the Confessor. In 1100 his sister Matilda married Henry I of England, and Edgar throughout his rule displayed strong English sympathies. He died in January 1107, and was buried at Dunfermline. Before his death he divided the kingdom between his two brothers, Alexander and David, making the latter Earl of Lothian and Cumbria.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Edgar Atheling (1057 ?-1120 ?) was the son of Edward the Exile, the son of Edmund Ironside. On the death of Edward the Confessor he was the nearest heir to the throne, but his claims were disregarded, and even after Harold's death there were very few who seriously advocated his cause. He submitted to William at Berkhamstead in 1066 and was graciously received. For two years he remained at the Conqueror's court, but in 1068 he withdrew, perhaps intending to participate in the rising of Edwin and Morkere. Subsequently he fled with his two sisters to Scotland. King Malcolm married Margaret, one of the sisters, and supported Edgar's claims in many attacks upon England. He also received hospitality and offers of assistance from Flanders and France. Having met with no substantial success, however, Edgar at length gave up his claims to the English crown on consideration of receiving estates and a pension from William (1074). In 1086 he departed for a period of service with the Normans in Apulia. On his return he formed a great friendship with the Conqueror's eldest son, Robert, whom he supported against William Rufus. The ill-success of the former obliged Edgar to flee once more to Scotland, in 1091, where he was instrumental in effecting a peace between Malcolm and William Rufus. After the death of Malcolm (1093) Edgar, now reconciled to the English king, took his sister's children under his protection, and eventually got leave from William to raise an army for the purpose of placing his nephew, Edgar, on the Scottish throne (1097). Having effected this, he joined the Crusaders just in time for the siege of Jerusalem (1099). Subsequently he was taken prisoner by Henry I while fighting for Robert of Normandy in the battle of Tenchebrai (1106), but was soon released and allowed to retire to his estates, where he lived peacefully to a ripe old age. The date of his death is unknown, but he is clearly not to be identified with the Edgar Atheling who figures in the Pipe Rolls of 1158 and 1167.

Edgcott, THE BATTLE OF (July 26, 1469), was fought between the insurgents, led by "Robin of Redesdale" (q.v.), and the troops of Edward IV, under the Earl of Pembroke. The former were completely victorious. Pembroke was defeated with great slaughter, and he and his brother, Sir Richard Herbert, were taken prisoners and put to death by the rebels. Edgcott is in Northamptonshire, a few miles from Banbury.

Edgehill, THE BATTLE OF (October 23, 1642), was the first important battle of the Civil War of the seventeenth century. Two months before, the king had raised his standard at Nottingham, and on September 9 the Parliamentary army, under Essex, left London. The king at first marched westwards to Shrewsbury, where his force was considerably increased, and then resolved to push rapidly on London. Essex determined to prevent this, and marched on Worcester, where the two armies remained for some time within a few leagues of one another. At length the king marched forward, and on October 23 the armies met at Edgehill, near Kington, in Warwickshire. The Royalists occupied the hill while Essex drew up his troops in front of Kington. The king's army was about 12,000 strong, while Essex's troops numbered about 10,000, and by Rupert's advice the king determined to march down the hill and attack the enemy on the plain. The battle began about two in the afternoon, and lasted till the evening. Rupert routed the Parliamentary cavalry, but rashly pursued them more than two miles from the field, till stopped by the arrival of Hampden's regiment with the artillery. Meanwhile, the Royalist infantry had been broken, and Rupert's horse were in too great disorder to retrieve the fortunes of the day. The forces remained facing each other during the night, but on both sides large numbers deserted, and in the morning the two armies marched away—the king into Oxfordshire, Essex to Warwick. The Parliamentary loss was the heavier, but the Royalists lost many officers of rank, including the Earl of Lindsey, the commander-in-chief. The real advantages lay with the king, who was able to capture Banbury, and march to Oxford without resistance.

E. A. Walford, "Edgehill," 1904.

Edinburgh (Eadwines byrig, "the castle of Edwin"; in Gaelic, Dunedin, which means the same thing) was founded by Edwin of Northumbria as a frontier defence against the Picts, and became the chief town of Lothian, which the cession of Canute put under the Scottish kings. The introduction of English and Norman usages into the Scottish royal house made Edinburgh the chief royal residence and capital by the time of David I. It was given up to the English in 1174, but the Treaty of Falaise restored it to the Scots in 1189. In 1296 Edward I carried off the regalia from the castle, which was a few years afterwards retaken by Robert Bruce. In 1322 it was besieged by Edward II, and in 1333 given up to Edward III, from whom it was taken in 1341. Richard II burned the town in 1385. In 1544 Edinburgh was burnt by Hertford, and shortly afterwards was garrisoned by the French, who were driven out by the Lords of Congregation, 1559. Two years later it was the scene of a treaty (q.v.). After the murder of Darnley, the castle was taken by the Confederate Lords, but subsequently became the head-quarters of Queen Mary's party, until Kirkcaldy of Grange was compelled to surrender it, 1573. The Covenant was signed in Edinburgh in 1638. In March 1639 the castle fell into the hands of the Covenanters, and in 1650 was taken by Cromwell. In 1689 it held out for some time for James II, under the Duke of Gordon. In 1708 a Jacobite plot was formed for seizing the castle, another attempt being made in 1715, and in the rebellion of 1745 it was captured by the Highlanders. It was the scene of the Porteous Riots (q.v.) in 1736. In 1582 the University of Edinburgh was founded by the town council, partly from the proceeds of a legacy left by Robert Reid, Bishop of Orkney, and partly from endowments bestowed by James VI.

Edinburgh, THE TREATY OF (July 6, 1560), enacted peace between England and Scotland on condition that the French should retire from Scotland; the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar should be razed; and a fine should be paid for the blazoning of English arms with those of Scotland and France by Mary Stuart.

Edith (EADGYTH) (d. 1075), wife of Edward the Confessor, was the daughter of Earl Godwin of Wessex. She was married in 1045. Her relations towards her husband are doubtful, but she probably exerted her influence in favour of her father's policy, as on the disgrace of Godwin, in 1051, she was banished from the king's presence, and sent to a convent. On Godwin's return in the next year she was reinstated and her lands and goods were restored. She favoured her brother Tostig against Harold, and after the Conquest seems to have been treated with great respect by William. She died in 1075 in her dower city of Winchester. She was revered alike by English and Normans, the latter apologizing for her origin in the famous line—

"Sicut spina rosam genuit Godwinus Editham."

[EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.]

Edith, "SWANSNECK," was the mistress of King Harold. She it was who is said to have identified his body after the battle of Hastings. Nothing more than this is known about her.

Edmund (EADMUND), KING (b. 922, s. 940, d. 946), afterwards called Edmund the Elder by historians, was the son of Edward the Elder, and half-brother of Athelstan. Before his accession he had already gained renown in the battle of Brunanburh (q.v.). The most important events of his reign are the recovery of the Five Boroughs (q.v.) (942) and Northumbria (944) from the Danes, and the grant of Cumberland (i.e., probably the Viking settlement on the Solway Firth) to Malcolm, King of Scots, in 945. The next year he was murdered at Pucklechurch by a robber named Liofa at the early age of twenty-four. His second wife was Ethelfleda, a daughter of the ealdorman Aelfgar, and by her he had two sons, Edwy and Edgar (q.v.). Edmund received the title of "Magnificus," i.e., the doer of great deeds, apparently from his successes against the Danes. His sons were so young at the time of his death that they were passed over in favour of his brother Edred.

Biography by J. B. Mackinlay, 1893.

Edmund (EADMUND) IRONSIDE (b. 993?, s. April, d. November 1016), was the son of Ethelred II. During his father's lifetime he had been active in opposing the Danes. In 1015 he married Aldgyth, widow of Sigefrith, and took possession of the lands of her former husband and his brother Morkere in the region of the Five Boroughs (q.v.), thus forming a kind of principality of his own in the heart of the Danish district. On the death of Ethelred, Edmund was chosen king by the citizens of London and those of the witan who were there, while the rest of the people elected Canute. The brief reign of Edmund is taken up with struggles with his rival, in which the valour of Edmund and the bravery of his followers are in great measure neutralized by the treachery of Eadric Streona and others. Immediately after his election Edmund left London, marched into Wessex, and defeated Canute at Pen Selwood. Another battle was fought at Sherston, in Wiltshire, in which Eadric's treachery almost caused the defeat of the English. Edmund next relieved London, and won a victory at Brentford. A fourth battle was fought at Otford, where the Danes were once more defeated, and "all men said that Edmund would have destroyed them utterly had not Eadric beguiled him to stop the pursuit at Aylesford." Shortly after this the Danes gained a great victory at Assington (Assandun), in Essex, in which the "Chronicle" tells us "all the nobility of the English race was destroyed," and which is to be attributed to the defection of Eadric and his men. Canute pursued Edmund to Gloucester, and a sixth battle was about to be fought when the witan proposed that a division of the country should be made between the two kings. For this purpose a meeting was held on the Eyot of Olney, near Deerhurst, where it was agreed that Edmund "was to be the head king, and have Wessex, Essex, East Anglia, and English Mercia, with the city of London; and Canute was to have Danish Mercia and Northumbria." The story of Edmund having proposed to decide the matter by single combat with Canute rests on no good authority. Very soon after this, on November 30, 1016, Edmund died, having, according to a persistent but unauthenticated tradition, been murdered by the traitor Eadric. He left two young sons, Edward and Edmund, who were exiled by Canute. His great physical strength, as well as his valiant spirit, gained him the surname of "Ironsides." He reigned only seven months, and during that time he had fought five great battles, in three of which he was completely victorious, and in the others only defeated by treachery.

Edmund (EADMUND), KING OF SCOTLAND (1094-7), son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, joined his uncle, Donald Bane, in driving his half-brother Duncan from the throne. He reigned in conjunction with Donald three years, having Strathclyde as his especial province. In 1097 Edgar, his brother, successfully established himself on the throne and the danger of the repartition of Scotland was averted.

Edmund (EADMUND), ST., KING OF EAST ANGLIA (856-70). Little is known of his life, save that in 866 he bought off the Danish host and induced it to depart to Northumbria. Of his death we are told by late authorities that in 870, having been defeated and taken prisoner by the Danes at Hoxne, he was offered his life and kingdom on condition of his giving up Christianity and acknowledging the Danish supremacy. Refusing these terms, he was bound to a tree and shot at with arrows, and at last beheaded. His body was translated shortly after his death to the royal manor of Bedricsworth, which changed its name in his honour to St. Edmund's Burgh. His constancy in faith earned him canonization, and the English Church still keeps his name in remembrance on November 20, the traditional day of his martyrdom.

[LANCASTER, EDMUND, EARL OF.]

Edred (EADRED), KING (946-55), was the son of Edward the Elder, and brother of Athelstan and Edmund, the latter of whom he succeeded. He is said to have been weak and sickly in health, but his reign was an active one, and the administration was wisely managed, for Dunstan was his friend and adviser. In 947 the Northumbrians swore allegiance to him, but the next year they revolted, and set up Eric, son of Harold Harfagr, as their king. Therefore Edred overran Northumbria, compelled the expulsion of Eric, and reduced the Danes once more to submission (948). It was not, however, until 954 that the Danish kingdom of York was finally subjected and Eric slain. Archbishop Wulfstan was deposed in 952, and imprisoned at Judanbyrig (? Idbury), perhaps for complicity in the later Northumbrian disturbances; but two years afterwards he was released, and made Bishop of Dorchester. Edred died on November 23, 955, at Frome, in Somersetshire, and was succeeded by his nephew, Edwy. Edred, the "Chosen," or "Excellent," as he was called, seems to have possessed considerable capacity. He was brave and industrious, and in his reign were begun the administrative and ecclesiastical reforms afterwards worked out by Dunstan and Edgar.

Edric (EADRIC) STREONA (d. 1017), was the favourite adviser of Ethelred, whose daughter Edith he married, and to him all the crimes and treasons of the court are attributed. In 1005 it is said that he treacherously murdered Elfhelm, Earl of Deira, and secured the dispossession or mutilation of other members of his family. In 1007 he was made ealdorman of the Western Mercians; in 1009 he betrayed the English army in a contest with the Danes; in 1015 he murdered Sigeforth and Morkere, two Anglo-Danish thegns of the district of the Five Boroughs; and in the same year, after making an attempt on the life of Edmund Ironside, he openly joined the Danes. At the battle of Sherston, the legend runs that by pretending that Edmund had been slain, he tried to throw the English ranks into disorder, but the promptitude of the English king prevented defeat. Almost immediately afterwards, however, we find Edmund reconciled with Edric at Aylesford, although this was perhaps a move intended merely to prevent Edmund's reaping the advantages of his victory at Otford. At the battle of Assandun (q.v.) Edric deserted with his forces to Canute, who by this means defeated the English; and it is said to have been by his advice that the peace was agreed upon at Deerhurst. Edmund's death in November 1016 is sometimes attributed to Edric's intervention, but there is no proof of his guilt. At first Canute showed favour to the traitor, but before the year 1017 was out he was put to death. His crimes may have been exaggerated by the English chronicler, but although it is improbable that Edric personally wrought all the countless and inexplicable treasons which are laid to his charge, we cannot doubt that he knew how to exercise an extraordinary influence over men's minds, and that that influence was always exerted for evil.

Education in England. Systematic education in England begins with the conversion of the English to Christianity. Most episcopal sees had schools attached to them and learning was almost entirely in the hands of the clergy. Bæda is the "fine flower" of its culture; Alcuin, of the school of York Minster, directed the educational system of Charles the Great. Alfred the Great desired that all the free youth of England, who were rich enough to apply themselves to it, should learn to read English; he set an example in his own court and did much for the perfection and preservation of the Anglo-Saxon language and literature. A principal occupation of some monasteries was the preservation of the country's history; England is especially rich in these monastic chronicles. Disputation was a great feature in the educational method employed in cathedral and monastic schools; we find dramatic entertainments forming part of the curriculum in the Benedictine school at Dunstable. The Norman Conquest introduced a new language; Lanfranc and Anselm transplanted foreign methods from the continent. The University of Oxford appears as a duly constituted body of teachers and pupils in the second half of the twelfth century, Cambridge in the early years of the thirteenth; the ill-defined beginnings of both are to be sought even earlier still. It is said that Oxford in 1209 had 3,000 students; and there is a fable to the effect that in mid-thirteenth century the number reached 15,000. Without accepting these figures, it is probable that the number of scholars in all the early universities, that is, those existing in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was considerable. Colleges, where teachers and taught were lodged and boarded, arose in the latter half of the thirteenth century. William of Wykeham founded New College, Oxford (1379), and a great boarding school at Winchester (1382), intended to supply between them the whole curriculum included in the seven liberal arts, grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. In imitation of Wykeham's establishments, Henry VI founded King's College, Cambridge, and Eton College, near Windsor (1440). In 1447 four London clergymen presented a petition to parliament to found a school in each of their four parishes; Mercers' School traces its origin to this petition. It is possible that Colet was a pupil in the original school (St. Thomas of Acon's Hospital); when Dean of St. Paul's, he refounded (1510) St. Paul's School. The suppression of the monasteries at the Reformation ought to have provided large funds for the support of education, but much of this wealth was squandered by Henry VIII, although some of it benefited Oxford and Cambridge. Edward VI's government suppressed many schools and styled the king the founder of many others, the principal being Christ's Hospital (1553), which owed its existence to the liberality and public spirit of the London citizens. (Shrewsbury is a genuine Edwardian foundation.) Westminster was the most important of the refoundations similarly attributed to Elizabeth. In her reign Judd founded Tonbridge School; Lawrence Sheriff, Rugby; John Lyon, Harrow; and in the next reign Thomas Sutton founded Charterhouse. These various efforts did much for the education of the middle classes and of the higher, but the lower classes were almost entirely neglected. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1698) had by the middle of the eighteenth century established 1,600 charity schools, which clothed boys and girls, gave religious instruction, and taught the "3 R's." The number was very insufficient. Wesley's efforts for popular education were confined to his own communion. In 1730 Griffith Jones, a clergyman of the Church of England, effected a great improvement in Wales by establishing "circulating schools"; the work was continued after his death by Madam Bevan, who bequeathed her property for that purpose. Towards the end of the eighteenth century the Rev. Thomas Stock and Robert Raikes, proprietor of the Gloucester Journal, awakened public interest in the Sunday schools which they had established in Gloucester. In 1785 was founded "The Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominions." Dissenters joined it as well as Churchmen. These Sunday schools gave a great impulse to the general education of the poorer classes. A further advance was made by the introduction of the monitorial system by Bell and Lancaster. Bell, who returned to England in 1797, had organized this method of mutual instruction whilst he was president of the military orphan school in Madras. Joseph Lancaster, a young Quaker, employed the same method. He met with great success, and was favoured by the court. Under this impulse the British and Foreign School Society was established in 1814; in this society's schools the Bible was taught "without note or comment." In opposition to this, Dr. Bell gave his countenance to the "National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church," founded in 1811. Bell, at his death, in 1832, left £120,000 for the purpose of promoting national education. Lancaster died in poverty in America in 1838. By the rival efforts of these two societies education was much developed, and in 1833 a proportion of about one in eleven of the whole population was attending school. Up to this time the government had taken no direct part in this movement, but the year 1832 introduced a change in this respect. In that year a committee was appointed to inquire into the matter, and in the following year £20,000 was voted for the education of the people. In order to avoid religious disputes, the sum was divided between the two great school societies, and the grant was continued in succeeding years; in 1839 the committee of the privy council on education was formed to administer this annual grant. To secure independence from State control, the Independents founded the Congregational Board of Education, and the Baptists the Voluntary School Society. The further development of the action of government was hindered by the divergence of party views on the question. One party was in favour of an entirely voluntary system, unconnected with the State. Among the supporters of State education, some were inclined to a gratuitous system; some were for denominational, others for secular education. An important step was taken, February 25, 1856, by which the Education Department was established to serve as the administrative agency of the committee of council on education; to this department was added the previously existing Science and Art Departments, which had been established to encourage the application of art and science to industry. A code of regulations was published in April 1860, now known as the "old code." A royal commission, appointed in 1858, reported in 1861. It gave an unfavourable picture of the state of education in England. In July 1861 a revised code of regulations was issued, chiefly under the influence of Robert Lowe. It appeared in a revised form in May 1862. It virtually reduced the subjects of teaching to "the 3 R's"—reading, writing, and arithmetic—established six standards of proficiency for pupils ranging from 6 to 12 years of age, and asserted the principle of payment by results. The Education Department ceased to augment the pay of the teachers. The revised code was severely criticized in its details, and the history of elementary education from 1862 to 1890 is the gradual undoing of the revised code and of its principle, payment by results. The great measure of W. E. Forster, the Elementary Education Act, which became law on August 9, 1870, authorized the formation of School Boards for the purpose of providing public elementary education under the supervision of elected representatives of the ratepayers. It was followed by the Free Education Act in 1891. This act gave an additional government grant of 10s. per annum for each child between five and fourteen years of age in average attendance at recognized elementary schools, and reduced fees accordingly. As the fees charged ordinarily amounted to less than 10s. per child per annum, the result was to abolish school fees in most cases, and where the abolition was not effected by the act it was frequently carried out voluntarily by the managers. The revised code of 1890 made the "merit grant" dependent on the general efficiency of a school as estimated by the inspector rather than on the number of pupils who passed his examination, and so abolished the "payment by results" of Robert Lowe's revised code. In 1894 Mr. Acland issued a new code for evening continuation schools, giving to the then long-established evening classes a wider opening for usefulness. In 1897 acts were passed granting 5s. per scholar to voluntary schools and some relief also to necessitous board schools, the first-named grant to be distributed by associations of school managers. A commission on secondary education appointed in 1894 reported in October 1895, recommending the creation of a central supervisory authority, with subordinate local authorities in counties and boroughs, the rearrangement of educational endowments, with further aid from taxes and rates, the registration of teachers, and a system of State supervision and encouragement which might be extended to private and proprietary schools at their option. In 1899, in accordance with the recommendations of this commission, a statute was passed creating "The Board of Education for England and Wales." This board takes the place of the Education Department and of the Science and Art Department, also of the Charity Commission and the Board of Agriculture in matters relating to education; it is therefore the central authority for national education and as near an approximation to a "Ministry of Public Instruction" as the country has ever possessed. Its chief officials are a president and a parliamentary under-secretary. There is associated with the board a consultative committee, whose first task was to frame regulations for forming a register of teachers. It was felt that such a register should include teachers of all grades, and that it would conduce to the greater efficiency of the teaching profession. The committee put forth its regulations early in 1902, proposing to divide teachers into two classes, certificated masters and mistresses serving in elementary schools being placed in A, masters and mistresses engaged in secondary schools and possessed of certain qualifications falling in B. The scheme failed to attract, and their fees were returned to some 500 persons who had paid a guinea each for registration in column B. Teachers "registered" in column A paid no fee, and were not in fact registered, it being held that their individual records at the Board of Education were equivalent to column A of the register. An act of 1907 authorized the institution of a Teachers' Registration Council to form and maintain a register, not of schoolmasters and schoolmistresses only, but of teachers of all kinds. The scheme, which has met with a fair measure of success, registers all qualified persons upon one list, without reference to the type of institution in which he or she teaches. As from July 1, 1927, the Teachers' Registration Council consists of forty-eight members, three-fourths being elected by the registered teachers, the remainder being appointed by the universities; the chairman is appointed from outside the council.

The Education Act (England and Wales) introduced by Mr. Balfour in 1902 was actuated by the same motive as the act of 1899, namely, to promote the co-ordination and efficiency of education in these countries. This act instituted local authorities to control primary, secondary, and scientific education, invested such authority with rating powers, and threw the cost of the maintenance of all elementary schools in part upon the rates. In respect of secondary schools it allowed the local authority to "take such steps as may seem desirable after consulting with the Board of Education to supply or aid the supply of education other than elementary." The "local authority" is the county council in counties, the borough council in county boroughs and in non-county boroughs with a population over 10,000, and the urban district council in urban districts with a population over 20,000. What were formerly known as board schools are now called provided schools, and those previously known as voluntary schools are now termed non-provided schools. In the case of the latter the buildings have been handed over to the State, but the duty of keeping them in repair remains with the managers. In these schools religious teaching is to be under the control of the managers, of whom the majority are to be "foundation managers" appointed under the provisions of the trust deed of the school. Over this arrangement much dispute arose, it being contended by the objectors that rate-supported schools should in all respects be under popular control. The act received the royal assent on December 18, 1902.

In 1903 an unwillingness on the part of numerous members of the Free Churches to pay that part of the education rate allocated to the support of denominational schools led to the formation of a "Passive Resistance Committee," of which Dr. Clifford was president. In spite of the adverse opinion of counsel, "passive resistance" was continued. On October 31, 1903, the Archbishop of Canterbury wrote to Dr. Horton suggesting a conference, but the reply was that the idea could only be entertained if the Church party would as a preliminary admit the principles that all schools should be under absolutely public control, and that all teachers should be appointed without reference to denomination and by the public authority. The archbishop was unable to assent to these terms.

In 1906 a further bill was introduced under a Liberal government, in which it was provided that no school would be recognized as a public elementary school unless it was a school provided by the local education authority; therefore no elementary school was to receive a penny of public money, either from rates or taxes, unless it became a provided school within the meaning of the Education Act. Voluntary schools receiving rates and grants would at once become provided schools. No catechism or distinctive religious formularies were to be taught, but simple religious exercises and simple Biblical instruction were to be given. After considerable opposition from Churchmen the Bill was withdrawn.

The act of 1918, the most characteristic provisions of which are in abeyance owing to their cost, has as its general policy the removal of barriers between elementary and secondary instruction, and the provision of some form of secondary education for all. Schooling was to be compulsory to the age of 15, the elementary schools to be provided with "tops" for the instruction of children beyond the age of 11 plus. Continuation schools were to be established for the part-time attendance of boys and girls over 15 who were in employment, their attendance continuing till the completion of their sixteenth year. The act provides for the extension of continuation-school attendance to the age of eighteen, after these clauses of the act have been in operation for seven years.

Education in Ireland. (1) The Celtic Tradition of Education in Ireland. Knowledge of the pre-Christian culture of Ireland depends almost entirely on the Christian recensions of the Brehon Laws, carried out after the opening of the mission of St. Patrick (A.D. 432). There was a definite measure of literary education, combined with arduous physical and military training, in the case of ruling families: the whole of this course was carried out under a national system of fosterage, an institution which lasted as long as did the Celtic schools of learning, till about 1650. The Patrician documents (A.D. 440-80) contain very definite references to a professional learned class, originally connected with the Druidic worship among the Celtic peoples, and later stabilized as a Bardic organization. From the completion of the work of St. Patrick and his disciples in Ireland (A.D. 500), a new type of school and of education—the monastic—rapidly developed: leading instances are the establishments of Clonard, Clonfert, Clonmacnoise, in the Midlands, and the school of Bangor in the north-east. All these foundations were well known by A.D. 600, and had as their characteristic the combination of Irish and of classical scholarship in literature, history, law, astronomy with geography, and medicine. This use of the vernacular tongue as a vehicle of higher learning distinguished Irish education from that of all Europe down to the decline of the Renaissance movement and the extinction of the Celtic schools, in the seventeenth century. The important issue of the connexion of classical, and especially of Greek learning, with Irish schools was reopened in 1901 by Heinrich Zimmer, and has been worked over by Ludwig Traube (1907) and other continental scholars. While several Celtic scholars in Ireland itself have since 1912 tended to minimize the evidence for it, Dr. Montague R. James (1922) affirms that the evidence for it is too important to be denied. The culture of Romanized Gaul, of Bordeaux, Toulouse, Autun, Lyons, did find a refuge in Ireland, as Zimmer holds, during the destructive wanderings of Alans, Vandals, and Goths. Dr. James concludes that Græco-Latin texts of various types "had made their way to Ireland in very early times," that "literature unknown to the rest of Europe was read in Ireland," and that there are cumulative

"indications that in the sixth and seventh centuries a knowledge of Greek was far from uncommon in Ireland, at a period excluding the possibility of influence from Canterbury and England." The exodus of Irish scholarship to the northern and central areas of Europe was mainly caused by the Norse and Danish devastations of the Irish schools (A.D. 800-950), and its significance was well summed up by Traube (1907) in the affirmation that "wherever in western Europe, at the middle of the ninth century, Greek scholarship is claimed, it is either the possession of an Irishman, or of the pupils of an Irishman; any other claim is fraudulent." John the Scot (Eriugena) taught at Paris chiefly; Sedulius Scottus at Liège, at that epoch; Donough and Martin of Laon (d. 875) are also prominent, while Dungal was called by Lothair to organize the Imperial school at Pavia (925). An immense amount of manuscript evidence of their work, and of the work of their disciples, survives in continental libraries. "Greek passages that survive in Latin works," says Traube, "are to be set down to Irish influence." The centuries of Norse and Danish inroads into Ireland did much to dislocate the work of schools and of such centres of fine art as produced the magnificent bell-shrines, the Ardagh Chalice, the Cross of Cong, and the Tara and Roscrea Brooches (A.D. 600-1100), not to mention the Books of Kells, Armagh, Durrow, and other monastic centres of learning. The short spell of comparative peace (1040-1170) was followed by the Norman invasions (1170 to 1300); but the Celtic revival in the fourteenth century saw the complete establishment of a system of lay schools of higher learning, all over the area that remained substantially Irish. Important clans, as the O'Donnells of Tirconuail, assigned lands to teacher-families such as the O'Clerys, with the hereditary duty of providing education for all scholars who sought it from them. In many cases of such learned families, as with the O'Clerys on the River Erne, the MacEgans of Ormond on the Shannon, the O'Davorens of Burren in Clare, twelve and even sixteen generations of teaching power, reaching from 1250 to 1650, flourished. A family like that of MacEgan branched out so as to educate ten clans, north and south; and they did the same service for the Celticized De Burgos in Connaught. The last great monument of the scholarship thus perpetuated is the "Annals of the Four Masters," written at Donegal by the O'Clerys and the O'Mulconrys (1632-6): its value was certified by the chief Legist of Celtic Ireland, Flann MacEgan, at Redwood in Ormond, November 1636. This system of hereditary tenure of lands by scholar families gave learning a unique position among all European peoples. It was ended by the Confiscation of Ulster (1608-20) and by the Cromwellian Settlement (1654-70); but the tradition of scholarship survived in the small local schools of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and produced large numbers of highly qualified teachers in the "Hedge Schools" and in Irish towns. Celtic learning, taught in Irish, extended to history, poetry, Brehon law, and to herbal medicine; in Latin, which was fluently and widely spoken to a later date, were taught the Code of Justinian, the usual medical texts of Hippocrates and Galen, and the Greek and Latin classical authors. Attention to these latter works was again developed during the period of renewed contact with European universities, 1570 to 1790: Irish professors were prominent in such Renaissance centres as Rome, Louvain, Paris, and Salamanca.

(2) The Norman and English Systems of Education. Efforts to set up an Anglo-Norman university at Dublin (1310) and at Drogheda (1465) never advanced beyond the documentary stage; but there was a definite education on classical and English lines given in several of the Anglo-Norman monasteries in Ireland. The council of state at the suppression of these houses (1539) pleaded unsuccessfully with Henry VIII that six should be spared for the benefit of "the whole Englishrie of this land," with public service as to education in view. "In them yonge men and childer, both gentilmen childer and other, both of man kynd and women kynd, be broghte up in vertue, lernynge, and in the Englishe tongue and behaviour, to the grete charges of the said houses." The Tudor State policy as to education developed instead on very distinctive lines in Ireland. An act of 1537 imposed the maintenance of parish schools, "for to teach English," on the revenues of the Established Church. There were 350 of these schools in 1790, and no fewer than 780 at disestablishment in 1871. An act of 1570 made similar provision for Diocesan Free Grammar Schools: there were sixteen in existence in 1871. Secondary education was developed very fully in the Anglo-Norman walled cities and towns, which (except Dublin) were at once strongly English and strongly Catholic till the advent of Cromwell, 1649-52. Royal Grammar Schools were endowed on the confiscated lands of Ulster, 1608-20, and still flourish. The Tudor educational structure was completed in 1591 by the addition of an "English College near Dublin," the University of Trinity College.

By a succession of laws from 1560 to 1740, the Catholic population of Ireland was debarred from teaching, and from sending children to Catholic schools at home (which were illegal) or beyond the seas. Often, as in the periods 1609-16, 1630-5, 1652-60, 1672-80, 1695-1740, the illegal Catholic schools were totally suppressed; at intervals they were connived at, especially under Charles I and Charles II. The Renaissance curriculum prevailed in all secondary education, legal or illegal, after 1650. The Scots of Ulster brought in their own school system, 1608-30, and developed it considerably after 1700, despite disabling laws affecting Dissenting academies and schools. The Cromwellian administration in Ireland, 1653-9, ejected Royalists from Trinity College, set up a board of control (probably the first education board in Europe) for secondary schools (1654) and devised a wide system of compulsory apprenticeship of the children of the working-class Catholics under Protestant control (1657). This latter plan was substantially revived by Hugh Boulter, primate and lord justice, in the "Charter Schools" (q.v.) inaugurated in 1733, an expansion of the charity-school system of England and Wales and Scotland (1700-30). The charter schools were under royal patronage; and for them an annual parliamentary grant was voted in Dublin, 1745-1800, and from 1800 to 1831 at Westminster. It was for long the only example of the now universal system of modern educational finance; the grants were in all over £1,000,000. Planned to give an industrial and primary education in boarding farm-schools, the Boulter plan anticipated the work of Pestalozzi at Neuhof, 1774-80, by forty years. Severely criticized by John Howard (1782-7), John Wesley (1785), and by several officials, inspectors, and parliamentary committees, this system of enforced apprenticeship was a complete failure educationally, and led to great abuses in almost all the forty-four schools and farms. There were never more than 2,000 pupils in them. The laws against illegal schools were gradually rendered inoperative, or were modified, from 1782 to 1829. Semi-official attempts to administer small grants through various societies were made from 1816 to 1831, with little result. A National Board of Education operated in the primary field from 1831, and, with increasing grants, became almost nation-wide in its effects by 1860. The schools were nominally neutral, with religious instruction given outside school hours: but a denominational managerial system within the schools was practically everywhere in force. A neutral "Queen's" University, with colleges in Cork and Galway and Belfast, was endowed by Peel in 1845, and lasted till 1882: it was substantially successful in Belfast alone. From the funds of the State Church, disestablished in 1871, and from annual votes, secondary schools of all kinds got financial aid, on an examination basis, after 1878. Endowed schools, of the main historic types enumerated above, were reorganized to some extent from 1887 to 1895, and from 1901 to 1920 a widespread system of technical education, with partial local control and financial provision, was set up. The teaching system for it was not helped by the fact that its work was almost always part-time, and mostly done in the evening and night hours. The transition Royal University, on the London model (1882-1909) gave way to the Federal National University (Dublin, Cork, Galway, Maynooth) in 1909. With the new university in Belfast in the same year, the university question was looked on as settled; Trinity College, Dublin, remained intact throughout.

(3) Autonomous Systems of Education, 1920-7. Since the establishment of the Free State (1921-2) and of the Northern Ireland government (1920) considerable advances have been made. Administration and teaching in Northern Ireland, with a new Education Act, have tended to approximate to Scotland, as re-organized in 1918. Both in Dublin and in Belfast secondary and primary education have been extensively replanned, and the pressure of examinations on school finance has been altered. Compulsory education is now universal; technical schools are being completely overhauled; faculties of agriculture and dairying, on a liberal plan, have been set up (1926). In the Free State the Irish language has been made a chief educational instrument since 1922, with a view to its restoration as a spoken tongue. The older boards and separate systems for each type of school and school grants have been replaced by two ministers of education, whose heads are in the two cabinets. A complete system of medical inspection for schools was in working order all over Ireland before the end of 1928, as well as salary, increments, and pension schemes for registered teachers of all types and grades.

Education in Scotland. It is impossible to fix with any accuracy the date of the first establishment of schools in Scotland, but there are indications in the historical records that they existed from a very early period. Learning has in Scotland always been in advance of the arts and refinements of civilization, which in other countries usually precede letters. For the first foundation of her schools, as for the introduction of her earliest arts and industries, Scotland is indebted to the Church, more especially to the early Irish Celtic Church. As early as the twelfth century there is mention of schools existing in certain burghs in connexion with the religious houses in the neighbourhood. With the building of every cathedral church a school would spring up for the education of clergy and longo intervallo for the instruction of the choristers, and though the teaching of the latter was mainly intended to fit the scholars for taking part in the religious services, it was not confined to choral singing and chanting; for as the service of the Church was wholly in Latin, a knowledge of Latin was absolutely necessary for all who took part in the service, and the Latin grammar was therefore taught in the choral schools. Thus the cathedral and song schools of the Church easily developed into the grammar school of the burgh. We have no exact information as to the number of these burghal schools or the course of instruction pursued even at so late a date as the Reformation; but while art was still in its infancy, and all the appliances of domestic life were of the rudest, the value of knowledge and the desire for it was felt by the nation, and expressed by a series of Education Acts passed by the Scots parliament. The first official mention of national education is in 1496, when an act of parliament was passed requiring "through all the realm that all barons and freeholders that are of substance put their eldest sons and heirs to the schools, fra they be aught or nine years of age; and to remain at the grammar schools until they be competently founded, and have perfect Latin; and thereafter to remain three years at the schools of art and jure, so that they may have knowledge and understanding of the laws," under pain of a penalty of £20. In 1579 another act ordained that "song-schools be provided in burghs for the instruction of the youth in music." In 1621 an act exempts colleges and schools from payment of a taxation; and in 1633 an act declares that every "plough- or husband-land according to the worth" should be taxed for the maintenance and establishment of parish schools. In spite of these enactments, however, on the re-establishment of the Presbyterian Church it was found that the existing means of education were not sufficient to meet the wants of the people, and that many parishes were without schools. An act, therefore, "for settling of schools" was passed in 1696, which ordered the heritors (landowners) of every parish in the kingdom to "provide a commodious house for a school, and settle and modify a salary for a schoolmaster, which shall not be under one hundred nor above two hundred marks." This act was the legal basis of the parochial school system of Scotland, and this system continued in operation till the whole machinery of education was revised in 1872, when it was again found that the existing means of education were inadequate to the population. In the towns this was due in part to the influx of strangers caused by the increase of trade and manufactures. In the rural parishes, too, the heritors had in many instances so neglected their duty that there was no house for either the school or the teachers. The returns showed that 1,000 new schools were required, and that 54,671 children were without accommodation. [In point of fact the parochial system was functioning ineffectually and was not sufficiently elastic to meet the growing needs of the country. Accordingly the Education Act of 1872 was passed, by which two leading principles, put forward as ideals since the Reformation, were carried into effect, namely, that efficient provision should be made for the education of every child in the country, and that each child should be compelled to attend school up to a minimum requirement defined by law. Since 1872 this requirement has gradually been raised. The act of 1872 placed the management of the parish school in the hands of

School Boards elected by the ratepayers with power to levy a rate for education. In a fundamental point it differed from the English Education Act of 1870 in that it was not limited in its scope to elementary education, but was concerned with providing efficient education for the children of the whole people of Scotland. Thus certain burgh or grammar schools, most of which were giving an education beyond the elementary stage, came under the management of the newly-created school boards with the title of higher-class public schools. At first they received no State aid, but in course of time government grants were made to them. As the demand for higher education increased, the number of these schools was found to be insufficient and the school boards began to make further provision. Thus another type of school came into existence—the State-aided secondary school. In later years the distinction between these two types has tended to become one of historic significance merely. Since 1872 not a few parish schools have developed into State-aided secondary schools. Down to the Education Act of 1918 the great bulk of the schools in Scotland were managed by school boards, but by this act these bodies were superseded by education authorities elected ad hoc for counties and county-burghs. The act of 1918 is the most important Scottish Education Act since 1872. In particular, for the first time in Scottish history, the adequate provision of free secondary education was made compulsory by law. A further landmark in Scottish education since 1872 is the institution of the leaving certificate examination. Its present form is the result of a series of developments extending over nearly forty years. The first definite step was taken in 1888, when a uniform examination was held throughout the country in certain selected school subjects. In its inception this examination had no essential relation to the secondary-school course, since it was merely an examination in individual subjects; nor was it open to pupils other than those attending higher-class schools. In 1892 candidates from State-aided schools were admitted to it; while in 1902 the issue of leaving certificates for individual subjects was abolished and the group leaving certificate instituted. In 1925 day-school certificates—the higher for a three years' course and the lower for a two years' course—were instituted in place of the former intermediate and merit certificates respectively. The development of education in the Highlands, the provision of technical colleges, the institution of provincial committees for the training of teachers, the influence of the Scottish Education Department, and not least the relation between the schools and universities, are all features of significance in Scottish education in the twentieth century.]

Edward (EADWARD) THE ELDER, KING (b. 870, s. 899, d. 924), was the son and successor of Alfred. He had already distinguished himself in the wars against the Danes, and seems to have been unanimously chosen king on his father's death; but Ethelwald, a son of Ethelred, put forward his claim to the throne, and having failed to excite a rebellion in Wessex, fled to Northumbria, where the Danes made him their king. In 901 he got possession of Essex, and the next year ravaged Mercia. Edward, in return, invaded the Danelagh, and harried it. The Kentish men, against his orders, remained behind, and a battle ensued, in which the Danes were victorious, but their king, Eric, and Ethelwald were slain. In 903 Edward made peace with Guthrum, the son and successor of Eric. In 910 the Danes broke the peace, but were defeated by Edward with great slaughter between Tottenham and Wednesfield in Staffordshire. Edward now began, with the co-operation of his sister Ethelfleda (Æthelflæd) (q.v.), the "Lady of the Mercians," the systematic reconquest of the Danelagh. He himself operated in the direction of East Anglia, while Ethelfleda undertook the conquest of Danish Mercia. For the defence of the conquered territory a system of "burhs" or fortified centres was established, among the most important being Chester, Tamworth, Warwick, and Hertford. On the death of Ethelfleda in 917 Edward took possession of Mercia, disregarding the claims of his young niece Ælfwyn. Shortly afterwards "all the people in Essex, East Anglia, and the rest of Mercia submitted to him," and in addition the Welsh kings "sought him to lord." Finally, in 919, "the King of the Scots, and the whole nation of the Scots and all those who dwell in Northumbria, as well English and Danes, and Northmen, and others, and also the King of the Strathclyde Britons, and all the Strathclyde Britons, sought him to father and to lord." Edward had thus in some sort gained a supremacy over all Britain. Wessex, Kent, and Sussex were his by inheritance, and Mercia, Essex, and East Anglia by conquest from the Danes. Besides this, Northumbria, Scotland, Wales, and Strathclyde did homage to him as overlord. Edward died in 924, and was succeeded by his son Athelstan. He seems to have had three wives and a numerous family; three of his sons reigned after him, and of his daughters, one married Charles the Simple, King of the West Franks; another (Eadgifu) Louis, King of Arles; Eadhild married Hugh the Great, Duke of the French (the father by another wife of Hugh Capet); while Edith became the wife of the Emperor Otto I. Another daughter was given to a prince near the Alps, and another to Sitric, the Northumbrian king. There is some reason to believe that it was during the later years of Edward's reign that the territorial reorganization of the Midlands was effected, or at least begun; the conquered territory being divided for administrative purposes into shires upon the West Saxon model. [COUNTIES, THE ENGLISH.] Although the greatness of Alfred overshadows that of Edward, there can be no doubt that the latter was a man of great vigour and ability and of exceptional capacity as a soldier. According to Florence of Worcester he was fully his father's equal as a warrior and a ruler, and was inferior to him only in those literary labours which peculiarly distinguished Alfred among contemporary princes.

Edward (EADWARD) THE MARTYR, KING (s. 975, d. 978), was the eldest son of Edgar, whom he succeeded at the age of thirteen. His election was opposed by his stepmother, Elfrida (Elfhryth), on behalf of her own son, Ethelred. Edward, however, appears to have gained the support of Dunstan, and was accordingly elected. His short reign is unimportant, except for the banishment of Oslac, the Earl of Deira, who had been appointed by Edgar. His accession seems to have led to a reaction against the monastic policy of Edgar, but little can be certainly said on this point. He was treacherously murdered in 978, it would appear at the instigation of his stepmother, though the story of the tragedy having taken place at Corfe Castle, and the details of the crime, are only found in the later chroniclers. His cruel and untimely fate gained him the surname of the Martyr, though it cannot be affirmed that he was a martyr either to religion or to patriotism.

Sir C. Oman, "England Before the Norman Conquest."

Edward (EADWARD) THE CONFESSOR, KING (b. 1004?, s. 1042, d. 1066), was the younger son of Emma and Ethelred the Unready, and was born probably about 1004. This Emma—or, to call her by her English name, Edith—was the daughter of Richard Sanspeur, great-grandfather of William the Conqueror, who was therefore second cousin to Edward. The early days of Edward and his brother Alfred were spent in Normandy, at the court of their uncle, Richard the Good; for they had been carried there by Emma at the time of Sweyn's success in 1013, and did not return to their native land on their mother's marriage with Canute (1017). Hence the two young Athelings grew up to manhood abroad, and learnt to prefer the Norman-French customs and life to those of England. It is uncertain whether Edward had any share in the invasion of England that led to Alfred's death in 1036; but Robert the Devil seems to have made at least one effort for the restoration of his cousins a few years before this date. When Hardicanute (Harthacnut) succeeded his brother Harold, it was not long before he invited his half-brother Edward to return home, and thus be at hand to assume the throne should any misfortune happen to himself (1041). Accordingly, in the words of the "Chronicle," on Hardicanute's death, in June 1042, "all folk chose Edward, and received him for king," though the coronation did not take place at Winchester till Easter the next year. There seems to have been some opposition to Edward's succession—one party preferring the claims of a Danish pretender, Sweyn Estrithson, Canute's nephew—but the eloquence of Bishop Lyfing and Earl Godwin carried the day in favour of Ethelred's son. A year or two later, Magnus, King of Norway and Denmark, was preparing to make good his pretensions on England, but was prevented from carrying out his project by the attack of his rivals, Harold Hardrada and Sweyn (1045). It may have been for her connexion with Sweyn's party that the witan stripped Emma of her treasures (1043); while the dangers of this Danish element led, a year or two later, to the banishment from England of several great Danish lords, including Osgod Clapa (1046). From this time the new king's throne was secure.

Meanwhile, Edward had married Godwin's daughter Edith, and the power of the great earl's house was growing every day. At the time of Edward's accession there were four great earldoms, of which only one, Wessex, was in the hands of Godwin. Siward held Northumbria, Leofric Mercia, while another earl, whose name is lost, ruled East Anglia. But in 1043 Godwin's eldest son, Sweyn, received an earldom irregularly carved out of the western parts of Mercia and Wessex, including Hereford, Gloucester, Oxford, Berkshire, and Somerset; and his second son, Harold, that of the East Angles (1045). But Edward could never forget the land of his early life, and was constantly bringing foreigners over to hold rule in England. His nephew, Ralph of Mantes, was made Earl of Worcester and Hereford in succession. It was, however, by manipulating the ecclesiastical appointments that Edward found his readiest way of placing the strangers in high office. In especial, a Norman monk, Robert of Jumièges (q.v.), was nominated Bishop of London (1044), and some six years later Archbishop of Canterbury (1051); while another Norman, Ulf, was made Bishop of Dorchester (1049). But all the time these and many other Norman strangers were swarming into the land, the house of Godwin was becoming more and more the centre of the national party. In 1051 things came to a climax. In this year the king, who had a few months previously rejected the choice of the Canterbury monks and Godwin for the see of Canterbury, gave the great earl still further offence by requiring him to punish the men of Dover for vengeance they had inflicted on the insolent followers of Eustace of Boulogne, the king's brother-in-law. This Godwin refused to do; instead he brought a further charge against the king's foreign friends, complaining that certain Norman followers of Ralph of Mantes were harrying the surrounding country from their stronghold of Richard's castle. Godwin, being summoned to attend a meeting of the witan at Gloucester, gathered his own men and those of his sons at Beverstone, not far from Malmesbury, while the rival hosts of Siward, Leofric, and Ralph supported the king at Gloucester. The meeting-place was transferred to London, where Edward's party assembled in full strength. Sweyn was outlawed once more, and Godwin and Harold summoned to appear as criminals. Godwin found his forces melting away, and in these circumstances flight seemed the wisest course; Harold crossed over to Dublin, and Godwin to Flanders, whence they returned next year to drive out the Norman offenders with Archbishop Robert and Bishop Ulf at their head (1052). Next year, however, the great earl died, and was succeeded in his West Saxon province by his eldest living son, Harold; for Sweyn had died on his way back from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (September 1052). East Anglia was given to Leofric's son Elfgar. In 1054 Siward undertook his expedition against Macbeth, and proclaimed Malcolm King of Scots; and next year he died. His earldom was given to Harold's brother Tostig. In the same month Elfgar was banished from the kingdom, but soon returned to aid the Welsh in their foray upon Hereford. Harold was now the most prominent man in the kingdom, and to him was entrusted the task of beating back the invaders, though in the reconciliation of the leaders he seems to have had the co-operation of Elfgar's father, Leofric (1056)—apparently a token of some approaches to amity between the two great rival houses. On Leofric's death (1057) Elfgar succeeded to his Mercian earldom, and East Anglia was given to Harold's brother Gyrrh, while another brother, Leofwine, had Kent and Essex, and the other shires of south-east England. In 1063 Gruffyd of Wales once more invaded England. But Harold and Tostig united their forces for the purpose of harrying his land; the English soldiers were bidden to adopt the arms and tactics of the Welsh, and before the year 1064 was out Gruffyd was dead, and his kingdom divided between two native princes, who swore fealty to Edward. In 1065 Northumberland rose in rebellion against Tostig, and elected Leofric's grandson, Morkere, as its earl. Morkere, in combination with his brother Edwin, who had been Earl of Mercia since Elfgar's death, appeared in arms at Northampton, perhaps meditating a division of the kingdom, and certainly declaring that the Northumbrians would no longer support the tyranny of Tostig. Edward would have pushed matters to extremes, but Harold persuaded the Oxford gemot to confirm the wishes of the Northerners. Accordingly the Northumbrians were promised a renewal of Canute's laws, and Tostig was banished. This was the last important event in Edward the Confessor's reign. At the end of the year 1065 his great church of Westminster was consecrated, and on January 5, 1066, the king died. Edward had no children, and for many years Harold's position in the kingdom had been such that it was scarcely possible, in all the circumstances, to elect any other successor. Pious, meditative, and given up to religious exercises, Edward, as it has been often said, was more fitted for a Norman cloister than the English throne. His virtues earned him popular respect; but he was deficient in practical vigour, and during a large part of his reign the actual business of administration was managed by members of the house of Godwin.

Edward I, KING (b. 1239, s. 1272, d. 1307), was the eldest son of Henry III and Eleanor of Provence. At fifteen he married Eleanor of Castile, and soon afterwards his father gave him, as an appanage, Gascony, Ireland, the towns of Bristol, Stamford, and Grantham, the king's lands in Wales, and the earldom of Chester, where Edward gained his early experience of Welsh warfare. He sided with his father at the time of the Parliament of Oxford, 1258, and was carefully watched by the barons. Although hostile to the baronage, however, he was no enemy to reform, and in 1259 the party calling itself the "bachelorhood of England" (communitas bachelorie totius Angliæ) found in him a leader. He effected a rapprochement with Earl Simon, and the Provisions of Westminster were the result. But the alliance was short-lived; and on the outbreak of the Barons' War Edward espoused his father's cause and became the effective leader of the royalist party. He proved at first no match for his great antagonist. At Lewes (1264) his rash pursuit of the Londoners did much to cause the defeat of the royal army; and Edward was obliged to surrender to de Montfort, whose prisoner he remained until his escape from Hereford in May 1265. In that same year Edward won the decisive victory of Evesham in which de Montfort was killed. The pacification of the country during the next few years was due as much to his wisdom as to his energy. While he was active in reducing the strongholds of the Montfort party and in crushing freebooters, he successfully advocated a policy of conciliation, and in 1267 a final settlement was effected. In 1270 Edward departed on crusade, and distinguished himself by his bravery. In 1272 he narrowly escaped assassination. That same year his father died, and Edward was at once acknowledged as king. He heard the news on his way home. He landed in England and was crowned in 1274. Edward brought to the service of his people the invaluable experience he had gained during his father's reign. He profited by the example of Earl Simon's career; and strove to found a strong royal authority by associating with him in the work of government the loyal nobles and clergy, and by building up a body politic in which every class of the nation should have its part. He knew the needs of his people and set himself to meet them by good laws. His education had implanted in him French ideas and tastes, which encouraged his innate love of power. The legal turn of his mind made him take advantage of subtleties which favoured his wishes, but he prided himself upon a strict adherence to the letter, if not always to the spirit, of his motto pactum serva. His policy was extraordinarily comprehensive. His kingly pride, his love of order, perhaps too his love for his people, caused him to strive for supremacy in this island; but at the same time he did not neglect his French possessions. Immediately after his return to England he set himself to amend the evils of the civil wars. In 1275 parliament passed the first Statute of Westminster, a sweeping ordinance against administrative abuses; and at the same time put the ancient and great custom on wool, wool-fells, and leather upon a statutory basis. Shortly after his landing Edward had instituted an inquiry into the baronial immunities and jurisdictions, which constituted a serious obstacle in the way of orderly government. The returns to this inquiry are embodied in the Hundred Rolls, and its results inspired the Statute of Gloucester (1278), which empowered the royal officials to traverse the land demanding by what warrant (quo warranto) the lords of franchises exercised their powers. The attempt to insist in all cases upon documentary proof of royal delegation was unavailing; but Edward, though obliged to compromise, was at least successful in preventing the possibility of any further growth of private jurisdictions. The Statute of Winchester (q.v.), passed in 1285, dealt another blow to feudalism. It brought up to date Henry II's Assize of Arms by reorganizing the national militia and employing it for the maintenance of internal order. That Edward's policy was always consciously and consistently anti-feudal is, however, improbable. In 1279 we find him attempting to safeguard the rights of the feudal baronage and of the Crown as supreme landowner in the Statute of Mortmain (de Religiosis) (q.v.), which forbade the granting of land into the "dead hand" of corporations. This statute, though couched in general terms, and against which, under Archbishops Peckham and Winchelsea, Edward waged a determined conflict, was primarily directed against the Church, whose jurisdictional claims he challenged some years later in Circumspecte Agatis. In 1285 the second Statute of Westminster (de Donis Conditionalibus) was passed, facilitating the creation of entailed states, and thereby perpetuating some of the worst features of mediæval landholding. Five years later came Westminster III or Quia Emptores (q.v.), which prohibited subinfeudation, and was devised, like Mortmain, to protect the interests of the feudal class. Its ultimate effect was, however, to hasten the decline of feudalism; since by removing all restraints on alienation, it made land a marketable commodity in the full sense of the term, and thus finally destroyed the rigidity of the old order.

If Edward's work as a lawgiver has earned for him the doubtfully apposite title of "The English Justinian," his achievements as an administrator undoubtedly entitle him to be regarded as "the founder of the mediæval constitution." During his reign the administrative system of the Crown was consolidated and the Wardrobe became the special school of the Edwardian statesmen. Simultaneously, the three great courts of common law—Exchequer, King's Bench, and Common Pleas—began to assume a definite form. But Edward's greatest work was the establishment upon sure foundations of the parliamentary system. He converted to the use of the Crown the expedient which had been employed by Simon de Montfort in 1265, and three years after his accession summoned an assembly which included not only the magnates, but also representatives of the shires, cities, and boroughs. The early years of his reign constituted a period of experiment which culminated in the so-called "Model Parliament" of 1295. In this assembly the lower clergy, as well as the knights of the shire and the burgesses, were represented, and from it the continuous history of our parliamentary institutions may be said to date. [PARLIAMENT.] Edward's external relationships were no less important than his domestic policy. He completed the conquest of Wales, which had proved too tough a problem for his Norman and Angevin predecessors. Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, who had been on the side of Earl Simon, was brought to submission in 1277. His brother David was his enemy and was favoured and rewarded by Edward. Subsequently, however, the brothers were reconciled, and in 1282 they rose against the king. Llewelyn was defeated and slain. David was captured and put to death as a traitor at Shrewsbury. By the Statute of Wales of 1284, the newly-conquered country was annexed to the English crown, and to it the English shire-system was extended, although local custom was allowed to persist unless it conflicted directly with English interests. In the case of Scotland, Edward's efforts at absorption were unsuccessful. On the failure of the heirs of William the Lion he was called upon to adjudicate upon the question of the succession to the Scottish throne (1291). He decided in favour of John Balliol; but took the opportunity of defining the relation of the Scottish to the English crown, and of reasserting that overlordship which had been recognized by the Treaty of Falaise (1174).

The ill-judged vigour with which he asserted his rights aroused, however, the indignation of the Scots, and soon resulted in open revolt. In 1296 Edward invaded and conquered Scotland, deposed Baliol, and ruled the kingdom as his own. Meantime, Philip IV of France had taken the opportunity to seize Gascony, and the Scots looked to France for help in their struggle with England. At this juncture a serious constitutional crisis occurred in England. Edward had made heavy demands on the wealth of the Church. In obedience to the bull Clericis Laicos (q.v.) issued by Pope Boniface VIII, Archbishop Winchelsey and the clergy now refused to submit to further taxation. The king responded by putting them outside the protection of the law. The merchants were irritated by Edward's heavy taxation and arbitrary seizure of their wool; the earls disliked his whole policy, which threatened seriously to lessen their power—all classes were, in fact, united in opposition to the royal authority. Edward commanded the constable and marshal to lead a force to Gascony, while he went to Flanders, and they flatly refused. The archbishop and the king were reconciled, and Edward set sail, but the position of affairs was so threatening that he was forced to grant the confirmation of the Charters, wherein he promised henceforth to levy no such exactions as had recently been imposed, save by common consent of the realm. This concession marks an important epoch in our constitutional progress. In 1300 by the Articuli Super Cartas the king confirmed his pledge afresh, but some irritation still lingered in men's minds, and found expression in the Parliament of Lincoln (1301), as a result of which he was compelled to issue a third and final confirmation.

In the meantime his conquest of Scotland had proved of short duration. Instead of reducing the Scots to submission he had succeeded only in rousing their national opposition. In 1297 a revolt took place in the lowlands under William Wallace, who defeated the English near Stirling. The revolt was crushed next year by the defeat of Wallace at Falkirk. The war, however, lingered on until 1304. Meanwhile, peace was made with France, and Edward married as his second wife Margaret, sister of Philip IV. In 1305 Wallace was taken and put to death. Edward now fully annexed Scotland and issued an ordinance, following the general lines of the Statute of Rhuddlan, for the settlement of its government. But in 1306 Robert Bruce, grandson of one of the claimants of 1291, who up to this time had adhered to Edward, revolted, killed the regent Comyn, and was crowned king at Scone. Bruce was defeated by the Earl of Pembroke, but still remained unconquered. Edward marched northwards against him, but, on his march, died at Burgh-on-Sands in 1307, in his sixty-ninth year.

The founding of our parliamentary system, the organization of the law courts, the series of great statutes, and the general progress of the constitution mark the reign of Edward as of the first importance. Last but not least among the achievements of the greatest of the Plantagenets must be mentioned his military reforms. In the course of the Welsh wars he laid the foundations of that paid professional force which in the fourteenth century finally ousted the obsolescent feudal host, and won for English arms a European reputation on the fields of Crecy and Poitiers.

Edward II, KING (b. 1284, s. 1307, d. 1327), was the fourth son of Edward I and Eleanor of Castile, but the death of his three elder brothers made him heir to the throne when an infant. He received the title of Prince of Wales in 1301. In 1297 he was appointed regent in his father's absence, and in this capacity issued the famous Confirmatio Cartarum (q.v.). In 1306 he was solemnly knighted by his father, whom he accompanied on his expedition to Scotland. During this expedition Edward I died, having on his death-bed entreated his son not to recall Piers Gaveston (q.v.), his comrade and favourite, who had just been banished, and to continue the war against the Scots. Both these requests, or injunctions, were disregarded; the Scottish expedition was abandoned, and Gaveston was not only recalled, but created Earl of Cornwall, and during the king's absence in France made "custos" of the kingdom. From this date till 1312 the barons were struggling against the favourite and the king's misgovernment. In April 1308 a parliament of magnates met and demanded the exile of Gaveston; but next year Edward recalled him and won over the barons by timely promises of amendment. His second tenure of power was, however, even shorter than his first. A baronial parliament met under arms in March 1310 and forced upon the king a comprehensive programme of reform. A committee of twenty-one lords was appointed, and these in 1311 drew up a series of ordinances which practically put the royal power into commission. In 1312 Gaveston was seized by the barons, and put to death. The revolution threw all power into the hands of Earl Thomas of Lancaster, the king's cousin, and the baronial party. The defeat at Bannockburn in 1314 destroyed what little influence Edward still possessed, and till 1321 Lancaster was supreme. In the meantime, however, Edward had found a new favourite in the person of Hugh le Despenser, and the high-handed conduct of Lancaster had alienated many of the more moderate barons from him. A middle party began to form under the leadership of Earl Aymer of Pembroke, and in 1318 the Treaty of Leak was concluded, through their intervention, between the king and Lancaster. Henceforward the power of Earl Thomas steadily declined. The rise of the Despensers led to a temporary revival of the baronial cause in 1321, and the favourites were exiled. Next year, however, the king's opportunity came. Availing himself of a dispute with Lord Badlesmere, he raised an army, and turning upon Lancaster defeated and captured him at Boroughbridge (q.v.). Lancaster was at once beheaded, the ordinances of 1311 were repealed, and the baronial party for the time was crushed. For the next few years the Despensers were supreme, and under their inspiration the royal authority was revived, and drastic administrative reforms were instituted. The greed and selfishness of the new favourites neutralized the good effects of their legislation, and precipitated a further revolution. It would seem that the queen was jealous of the power of the Despensers; at all events, she intrigued with Roger Mortimer (q.v.), now the leader of the barons, against her husband. She had been sent over to France to arrange a dispute between her husband and her brother, and, being followed by Mortimer and others, she collected troops, and in 1326 landed in England, where she was joined by many of the barons. The Despensers were captured and executed and the king himself taken prisoner, and shortly afterwards compelled to abdicate. The fate of Edward is somewhat doubtful, though it is generally accepted that he was secretly murdered in Berkeley Castle on September 21, 1327. The character of Edward II was singularly despicable. He was devoid of self-control, firmness, and dignity, and spent his time in the society of favourites and parasites. His reign is a miserable one; defeat and disgrace abroad, treachery and misgovernment at home: nowhere can we find conduct that is praiseworthy. The people, contrasting the irresolute and weak-minded king with his noble and brave father, were led to believe that he was no true son of Edward I, but a changeling, and not a voice was raised against his deposition. Edward II was the weakest of the Plantagenets, and showed none of the vigour and capacity for government which distinguished most of his family. "An utter want of serious purpose blasted his whole career." By his marriage with Isabella of France he had two sons, Edward and John, and two daughters, Eleanor and Joan.

eldest son of Edward II and Isabella of France, was born at Windsor. On the deposition of his father the young prince was appointed guardian of the kingdom (October 1326), and crowned early the following year. During his minority the government was entrusted to a council of regency, of which Henry of Lancaster was the chief. The administration, however, was really usurped by Queen Isabella and her favourite, Roger Mortimer (q.v.). But the latter was unpopular with the baronage, and had incurred general dislike by the treaty negotiated with the Scots in 1328, by which the independence of Scotland was recognized. In 1330 the king, who deeply resented Mortimer's arrogance, found no difficulty in forming a powerful combination against the favourite. Mortimer was accordingly seized at Nottingham, taken to the Tower (October 1330), and executed a month afterwards; while the queen mother was imprisoned at Castle Rising, where she passed the remainder of her life. Henceforward the government was in Edward's own hands. He immediately renewed the English attempts on Scotland, assisted Edward Baliol in his endeavour to drive out the Bruce dynasty in 1332, and invaded Scotland in 1333. In July of this year he inflicted a great defeat on the Scots at Halidon Hill (q.v.); reduced the south of Scotland to submission, and caused Baliol to be proclaimed king of the portion beyond the Forth. The country, however, was far from subdued, and Edward's nominee, Baliol, was driven from his throne, and obliged to quit the country till restored by the English. In 1336 Edward again led a great expedition into Scotland, and ravaged all the south-east of the country. Meanwhile difficulties with France were arising, chiefly because of the disputes between Philip of Valois and the Flemings, the interruption of the Anglo-Flemish trade, and the aggression of Philip in Aquitaine. In 1337 Edward engaged in an alliance with the Low German princes, and concluded a league with the Emperor Louis V, who next year at Coblenz appointed him vicar-general of the empire. In the late summer of 1339 Edward advanced into France, but the French retreated before him, and the campaign was a fiasco. Late in 1339 Edward came to terms with van Artevelde, the leader of the Flemish burgher party, with whom he had long been in negotiation; and at the beginning of the next year he laid formal claim to the French crown, at the instigation of his new allies. In 1340 the English fleet, commanded by the king, won the first real success of the war—a great naval victory over the French at Sluys, after which the army landed and laid siege to Tournay. A truce was concluded which brought to an end the German or Netherlandish phase of the war; and Edward suddenly returned to England to effect an administrative revolution by displacing the chancellor (Robert Stratford, Bishop of Chichester) and the treasurer (Roger Northburgh, Bishop of Coventry), and imprisoning several of the judges, under the impression that the corruption of the chief officials of the government had prevented his receiving the proper return from the taxes. Mistrusting clerical influence, Edward appointed a layman, Sir Robert Bourchier, chancellor. The Archbishop of Canterbury, John Stratford (brother of the disgraced chancellor and president of the council in Edward's absence), was, however, the chief scapegoat, and Edward launched a bitter attack against him. The archbishop demanded trial by his peers, and, in face of a widespread opposition, Edward was forced to acquiesce. He summoned a parliament, which extorted from him a statute embodying the most far-reaching principles of constitutional reform. In October 1341, however, the king revoked the statute, confessing that "he had dissembled as he ought" owing to the pressure put upon him. He did not renew his operations in France till 1342, when he again led an expedition against France, this time on behalf of de Montfort, who claimed the succession to the duchy of Brittany against Joan of Penthièvre. Nothing effectual, however, was done till 1346, when Edward landed at La Hogue, in Normandy, although, it would seem, his original purpose had been to join Henry of Lancaster in Gascony. After plundering and burning the rich countryside at will, Edward marched in the direction of Paris, designing to make his way thence to the Flemish frontier. But the French king, with a large army, was between him and Flanders on the right bank of the Seine. By a feint upon Paris Edward crossed the river, and advanced towards the Somme, which he also crossed near Abbeville, and then won the great victory of Crécy (August 6, 1346). Advancing to Calais, Edward blockaded the town, and captured it after a twelvemonth's siege. The exhaustion of his own kingdom was so great that the king was unable to follow up these successes, and he returned to England after concluding a truce, which was renewed from time to time until 1355. In that year the king himself led an army from Calais, but effected nothing, and was obliged to return home to repel a Scottish raid. He advanced into Scotland, laying waste the border districts with great cruelty. In France the campaign of the Black Prince in the south-west was signalized by the splendid victory of Poitiers, and the capture of the French king, John (September 19, 1356). During the truce that followed, the Scottish king, David, taken prisoner at Neville's Cross (October 17, 1346), was released, and peace was made with Scotland (1357). In 1358 preliminaries of peace were concluded with the captive King John in London, but the terms, which were excessively severe, were rejected by the French estates. In 1359 Edward again invaded France, and laid waste Champagne. In 1360 (May 8) peace was at last made at Brétigny, and the English obtained all Aquitaine, including the counties of Poitou, Saintonge, Périgord, Limoges, and Cahors, besides Calais and Ponthieu, and a sum of three million gold crowns as ransom for the French king. The treaty, however, was never carried out, and in 1369 the war, which had continued without interruption in Brittany, once more broke out in the south; the discontented Gascon subjects of the Black Prince (q.v.) appealing against him to the French king. With the later phases of the conflict Edward had little personal concern. Following upon the illness and death of the Black Prince the English fortunes steadily waned. Aquitaine and Guienne were gradually recovered by the French, so that at the end of Edward's reign little remained of all his conquests but Calais and Bordeaux.

The later years of Edward's reign were passed in a state of partial retirement from public affairs. Old before his time, and worn out by the fatigues of his toilsome career, Edward resigned himself to the influence of his mistress, Alice Perrers (q.v.), and allowed the government to be largely carried on by John of Gaunt. Of the struggles between the baronial and clerical parties, and between the reforming party in the Good Parliament, who looked to the Black Prince, and the Lancastrians, the king was an almost passive spectator. In 1376, when Edward the Black Prince died, the king was called upon by the parliament to take action against papal and clerical encroachments. This, however, he refused to do. The following year saw the influence of the Lancastrians restored, and a parliament elected under their influence, which reversed all the measures of the Good Parliament (q.v.). In 1377 the old king, who had now lost all consideration and influence, died almost alone, having been deserted by nearly all his relatives and attendants before his death. The splendid military exploits of Edward's reign in later times threw a false glamour round his reign. But though military glory was the ambition of his life, it can scarcely be said that he was a great general. His successes were due to the splendid fighting material at his command and to the defects of his opponents, rather than to his strategical or tactical ability. Nor can he be said to merit the name of statesman. He was great neither as an administrator nor as a legislator. His financial management was so bad that he was constantly overwhelmed by debt; his conquests were transient and ill-conceived; and he altogether failed to realize the gravity of the constitutional and social crisis which was coming to a head in his reign. And though anxious to shine as the ideal champion of chivalry, he was both cruel and treacherous.

Edward IV, KING (b. April 28, 1442, s. June 29, 1461, d. April 9, 1483), the son of Richard, Duke of York, and Cicely Neville, sister of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, was born in the castle of Rouen, when his father was governor of France. He was brought up by Sir Richard Crofte, in the castle of Ludlow. When the Duke of York advanced his claim to the crown in 1460, the young Earl of March was sent to gather troops on the Welsh borders. There he heard the news of his father's defeat and death at Wakefield on December 21. He hastened northwards, but was pursued by Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, on whom he turned, and inflicted a crushing defeat at Mortimer's Cross, near Wigmore, on February 2, 1461. The advance of Queen Margaret's lawless northern troops excited the fear of the Londoners. Edward, therefore, on marching to London, was hailed as king on March 4. Joined by his cousin Richard, Earl of Warwick, he hastened northwards, and met the Lancastrian army at Towton, where he won a bloody battle on March 29. He returned to London, and was crowned on June 29. The parliament, which met in November, recognized Edward IV as succeeding to the rights of Richard II, and attained Henry VI of high treason. The youth, the handsome appearance, the geniality, and the practical vigour of Edward IV made him at once popular, and gave every expectation of a prosperous reign. Queen Margaret, with foreign help, still held out in Northumberland; but the victories of Hedgeley Moor (q.v.) and Hexham (q.v.) in 1464, and the capture of Henry VI in 1465, seemed to secure Edward IV on the throne, and the Commons recognized the fact by granting him tunnage and poundage for life. But the young king imperilled his position by an imprudent marriage with the Lady Elizabeth Grey of Groby, the widowed daughter of a Lancastrian baron, Richard Woodville, Lord Rivers, who had married Jacquetta of Luxemburg, widow of his former master, the Duke of Bedford. This marriage displeased the Earl of Warwick and the Nevilles, who had planned a French alliance, which would have secured Edward IV's throne from foreign attacks in aid of the Lancastrians. The marriage was celebrated secretly in May 1464, and was not declared till September 29. Soon Edward IV showed an intention of raising his wife's relations to power as a counterpoise to the Nevilles, who tried to keep him dependent on themselves. The breach between the king and the Earl of Warwick rapidly widened, and in 1467 there was an open rupture. Warwick wished for an alliance with France, but Edward IV turned to Burgundy, and at the very time when Warwick was at the French court negotiating with Louis XI he promised the hand of his sister Margaret to the young Duke Charles the Bold. The king's brother, the Duke of Clarence, followed the usual policy of the heir presumptive, and sided with Warwick. The hopes of the Lancastrians revived. Edward IV's popularity had gone, and in 1469 there was a rising in the north of discontented peasantry, led by "Robin of Redesdale." The Duke of Clarence declared his alliance with the Earl of Warwick by marrying his daughter Isabella at Calais. Warwick and Clarence joined the malcontent commons in pressing for reforms. Edward IV was unprepared for resistance, and was made prisoner by Archbishop Neville. But Warwick saw that a division between the Yorkists meant the success of the Lancastrians. Edward IV was released, and a pacification was made. In March 1470 there was a rising in Lincolnshire, headed by Sir Robert Wells, which Edward IV put down with promptitude and sternness. He announced that he had gained proofs that Warwick and Clarence were implicated and were plotting against him. They fled to France, and entered into negotiations with Queen Margaret, who was induced by Louis XI to agree to a reconciliation, based on a marriage between the young Prince Edward and Warwick's daughter, Anne. Edward IV showed unexpected carelessness, and when, in September 1470, Warwick landed in England as the champion of the Lancastrian cause, was not prepared to meet him. Finding himself deserted on every side, he fled to Flanders, and a Lancastrian restoration was easily accomplished. Gathering a few troops, with the reluctant support of Charles the Bold, Edward IV landed on March 14, 1471, at Ravenspur, where Henry of Lancaster had landed in 1399. Like him, he declared at first that he had only come to claim his ancestral possessions, the duchy of York. Soon he was proclaimed king, and pressed on to Coventry, where Warwick was stationed. Warwick, advised by Clarence to await his arrival with reinforcements, refused to give battle. Clarence betrayed his father-in-law and joined his brother, who hastened to London. Warwick pursued, and a bloody battle was fought at Barnet on Easter Day (April 14, 1471), in which Warwick was slain. The victorious king then turned against Queen Margaret, who had landed at Weymouth. He overtook her forces at Tewkesbury, where he again conquered on May 4, and treated his captives with ruthless severity. On May 21 Edward IV returned in triumph to London, and on the same night Henry VI was reported to have died in the Tower. The king was now rid of his enemies. The Lancastrian claimants were destroyed, the powerful nobles had fallen, Edward was secure upon the throne, the people were weary of war, and there was no one to oppose the will of the king. Edward used his victory as a means of extortion. He gathered great sums of money, and his obsequious parliament granted him large supplies. He obtained money by benevolences and was a skilful beggar! One day he called on a rich widow, who gave him £20 for his pretty face, and doubled the sum when he gave her a kiss.

The professed object for which he gathered money was a war against France. He allied himself with Charles of Burgundy, and revived the old claim of Edward III on the French crown. In July 1475 he led an army to Calais. The expedition was a fiasco. The Duke of Burgundy was engaged elsewhere, and did not join him. He sent him a message to advance to St. Quentin; when Edward arrived there he was greeted by fire from the walls. Indignant at such treatment, he listened to the overtures of Louis XI, who was willing to pay a large sum for the friendship of England. The English nobles were open to the bribes of France, and a truce for seven years was concluded, on condition that Louis XI paid 75,000 crowns, gave Edward IV a pension of 50,000 crowns, and betrothed the dauphin to Edward's daughter, Elizabeth. The two kings met, August 29, on the bridge of Pecquigny, which was divided by a lattice-work into two halves. There the peace was sworn, and Edward IV returned with profit if not with glory to England. Edward's policy of peace was, however, wise for England. Commerce flourished, and the king himself was a successful merchant. He was given to pleasure, and loved magnificence. His court was disturbed by the quarrels of his brothers, the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester. Clarence was wayward, and at last Edward resolved to rid himself of his troublesome brother. Before a parliament, which was summoned in 1478, he accused Clarence of many offences, chiefly of plotting with the Lancastrians in 1470. Clarence was attainted, and met his death in the Tower. For the next five years there was no parliament. Edward preferred to raise money by stretching his prerogative to the utmost. The disturbed state of Scotland under James III gave Edward some hope of extending his power in that direction, and the Duke of Gloucester was sent with an army to help the Duke of Albany against the Scottish king. No permanent result was gained save that Berwick was restored to the English king. Nor was Edward more successful in his scheme for founding a strong dynasty by means of family alliances. He projected marriages for his daughters, but they all failed. Louis XI of France did not abide by the Peace of Pecquigny, but in 1483 contracted the dauphin to Margaret of Austria, rejecting the marriage with Elizabeth of England. Edward was stung by the feeling that he was regarded as an upstart by the courts of Europe. He showed signs of again reviving his military schemes, but was seized by an illness, the result of his evil living, and died on April 9, 1483, in his forty-first year. He was a favourite of learned men, cultivated, and magnificent. His personal qualities made him popular to the end. But he was cruel, extortionate, and profligate. The death of Clarence shows that he was without natural feeling, and had all the cold-heartedness of a selfish libertine. In the wickedness of his private character he is rivalled only by John amongst the kings of England.

Edward V, KING (b. November 1470, r. April 9—June 22, 1483, d. 1483), the eldest son of Edward IV, was created Prince of Wales in 1471, and in 1479 Earl of Pembroke. In 1482 he was sent to Ludlow, in the Welsh Marches, being under the guardianship of his uncle, Earl Rivers, and attended by other members of the Woodville party. He was at Ludlow when his father died, and almost immediately set out for London. On April 29 he reached Stony Stratford, where he was met the next day by the Duke of Gloucester, who had arrested Lord Rivers and Lord Richard Grey at Northampton. The king renewed his journey under Gloucester's charge, and reached London on May 4. The council proceeded to recognize Richard as protector, and the coronation was fixed for June 22. The young king was lodged in the Tower, his mother having taken sanctuary at Westminster on hearing of the arrest of Rivers and Grey. On June 13 Hastings was arrested and executed without trial, and a few days later Rivers and Grey were beheaded at Pontefract, whither they had been taken by Richard's orders. Shortly after this the queen was compelled to deliver up the young Duke of York to Richard, who sent him to join his brother in the Tower. The king's deposition seems now to have been determined upon. On June 22 Dr. Shaw, brother of the lord mayor, delivered a sermon at Paul's Cross, in which he insisted that Edward V and his brother were illegitimate, Edward IV having been married, or at all events betrothed, to Lady Eleanor Butler previously to his marriage with Elizabeth Woodville. On the 25th a deputation of nobles and citizens of London waited on Richard, offering him the crown, which he accepted, and the next day began to reign as Richard III. Meanwhile, the two young princes remained in the Tower, where, at some time between June and October, they were certainly put to death by their uncle's orders. The mystery in which this crime was involved has led many writers to doubt whether the murder actually took place, but it must be remembered that even on the supposition that Richard, Duke of York, escaped, Edward must have been murdered, and it would have been the height of folly for Richard III to have put one of his nephews to death and allowed the other to escape. Nor are the murderers likely to have done their work so badly as to have suffered the escape of a boy, who, even if not taken by surprise, would have been utterly unable to resist them. Gairdner, who thoroughly investigated the whole circumstances of the case, sums up the details of the murder thus: "Some time after Richard had set out on his progress (August 1483), he sent a messenger named John Green to Sir Robert Brackenbury, the constable of the Tower, commanding him to put his two young nephews to death. This order Brackenbury would not obey, and Green returned to his master at Warwick. Richard was greatly mortified, but sent one Sir James Tyrell to London, with a warrant to Brackenbury to deliver up to him for one night all the keys of the Tower. Tyrell thus took the place into his keeping, and engaged the services of Miles Forest, one of those who kept the prince's chamber, and John Dighton, his own groom, to carry out the wishes of the tyrant. These men entered the chamber when the two unfortunate lads were asleep and smothered them under pillows; then having called Sir James to see the bodies, buried them at the foot of a staircase." The details of the murder were obtained from a confession made by Sir James Tyrell in 1502, when he was imprisoned in the Tower on a charge of treason, and there is no reason for doubting its substantial accuracy; in addition to which, the story was corroborated by a discovery made in the reign of Charles II, when, under the staircase leading to the chapel in the White Tower, the skeletons of two young lads, whose apparent ages agreed with those of the unfortunate princes, were found buried.

Edward VI, KING (b. October 12, 1537, s. January 28, 1547, d. July 6, 1553), was the son of Henry VIII and Jane Seymour, and was born at Hampton Court. He was carefully educated under the attention of reforming divines, and became a zealous adherent of the new views of religion. By the will of Henry VIII he succeeded to the throne under the regency of a council of eighteen members, most of whom were Reformers; and, in defiance of the will, the king's uncle, Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, afterwards Duke of Somerset, obtained for himself the title of protector, with the practical control of the government. In religious matters the young king was willing to second the reforming projects of Cranmer, and willingly assented to the publication of the new liturgy in the Prayer Book of 1549 and the Act of Uniformity. As early as 1542 a plan had been set on foot for the marriage of Edward with the infant Princess Mary of Scotland; and it was partly in order to force this marriage upon the Scots that Somerset undertook the expedition in 1547, which culminated in the fruitless victory of Pinkie. The ill-success of Somerset's policy, both in home and foreign affairs, brought about his fall. The king, who had chafed at the studious and retired life to which the protector compelled him, easily yielded to the influence of the Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, and was probably no unwilling actor in the series of events which established the latter's ascendancy. Edward, though he now took a lively interest in public affairs, as his literary remains show, was still studious and much interested in religious matters. In 1552 Cranmer issued a revised liturgy, known as the Second Prayer Book of King Edward VI, and the Forty-two Articles, which were of a thoroughly Protestant tendency. [ARTICLES OF RELIGION.] Meanwhile Edward was failing. He was always delicate, and his health, it is said, had been greatly injured by Warwick removing him to Windsor in 1550. Convinced of the necessity of preserving the Protestant Settlement, he allowed himself to be persuaded by Northumberland to alter the settlement of the crown as arranged in Henry VIII's will, and to make a will excluding Mary and Elizabeth from the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey, the daughter of Henry's niece, Frances, Countess of Suffolk, and daughter-in-law of Northumberland, which was subscribed by the privy council, June 21, 1553. Then Edward failed rapidly, and on July 6 died; Northumberland being supposed by many to have hastened the end by poison. There is, however, no authentic evidence to confirm the suspicion. Edward would seem to have had much of the Tudor talent and some of the Tudor vices. His abilities were considerable. He was an accomplished scholar for his age, and his writings show a sagacity altogether beyond his years.

Edward VII, KING (b. November 9, 1841, s. January 22, 1901, d. May 6, 1910), was the eldest son of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge and spent much of his early life in foreign travel, visiting Italy (1859), Canada and the United States (1860), Germany (1861), the Balkans and Egypt (1862), France (1862), Denmark (1864), and Russia (1866). On March 10, 1863, he married Alexandra (q.v.), daughter of Christian IX of Denmark. Their eldest son, the Duke of Clarence, died in 1892 at the age of 28; their second son succeeded to the throne in 1910 as King George V (q.v.). In 1871 Edward VII suffered a severe attack of fever, from which he did not recover until February 1872. The national joy at his recovery completely destroyed the unpopularity into which he had fallen in 1870 as a result of his alleged implication in the Mordaunt divorce scandal. He visited Russia again in 1874, and in 1885 he went to Berlin on the occasion of the eighty-fifth birthday of the Emperor Wilhelm I. The Indian and Colonial Institute was founded by him (to commemorate Queen Victoria's Jubilee) in 1886. Two years later he was again in Berlin, and in 1894 he paid his third visit to Russia at the time of the death of the Tsar Alexander III. Meanwhile his second son, George, had married Princess Victoria Mary of Teck (1893), while his eldest and second daughters Louise and Maud, married respectively the Duke of Fife (1889) and Prince Charles of Denmark (1896). Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee was commemorated (1897) by his inauguration of the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund. In 1900 an attempt was made upon his life at a Brussels railway station, during the wave of British unpopularity which was sweeping over the continent as a result of the Boer War. Queen Victoria died on January 22, 1901, and the prince, who had always been kept by her in a position of filial subordination in which he could not "lead or guide or dictate to" her, became king, with a title different from any before held by British sovereigns—"by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." His coronation was postponed owing to his sudden illness, and did not take place until August 9, 1902. He began his reign by a series of state visits in 1903—to Portugal and Italy (April), to France (May), and to Austria-Hungary (August). The most important of these was the visit to France, which President Loubet returned in July, and which successfully dispelled a heavy cloud of Franco-British distrust and paved the way for the Entente of April 1904. The king paid visits also to Scotland and Ireland (1903-4), Kiel (1905), and France again in 1905 and 1908. In 1908 also he visited the Tsar of Russia a few months after the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907, to the satisfaction of France and the disapproval of the German Emperor, Wilhelm II. Edward VII and the Kaiser Wilhelm II were never on terms of personal cordiality. Meanwhile at home the king left the conduct of affairs to the prime minister and the cabinet more than Queen Victoria had done, on account partly of his ignorance of the diplomatic details of foreign and domestic policy, and partly of his many and wide interests outside matters of state. He lived in cordial relationship to his three prime ministers—Mr. Balfour (till 1905), Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman (till 1908), and Mr. Asquith (till 1910); was not disquieted by the fall of the Conservatives in 1905; took an interest in John Burns, the Labour cabinet minister; disapproved of woman's suffrage; feared the possible results of South African self-government; and was uneasy over the Lloyd George budget of 1909. He strongly deplored the raising of the House of Lords reform issue towards the close of his reign, but he abstained from comment when the text of the Commons' Parliament Bill was circulated in April 1910. He died on May 6, before the controversy reached its height, from the effects of bronchitis resulting from a cold which he had contracted at Biarritz in April.

Edward THE ATHELING (better known as Edward the Exile) (d. 1057) was the son of Edmund Ironside, and on the death of his father, in 1017, he was sent by Canute to the court of Boleslav of Poland, whence he was later transferred to Hungary. Here he lived under the protection of King Stephen, who married him to Agatha, a kinswoman of the Emperor Henry III. In 1054 Edward the Confessor sent for him as being the nearest heir to the throne, and he came to England in 1057, but died almost immediately after he had landed. He left three children—Edgar the Atheling, Margaret, and Christina.

Edward THE BLACK PRINCE (1330-76) was the eldest son of Edward III and of Philippa, and was born at Woodstock, June 15, 1330. He was created Earl of Chester in 1333, Duke of Cornwall in 1337, and Prince of Wales in 1343. When only sixteen years of age he was in nominal command of one of the divisions of the English army at Crécy, and throughout the French wars he played an important part. In 1355 he commanded the army which invaded south-eastern France. The next year, marching northwards, he met and defeated the army of King John (Poitiers, September 19, 1356). In 1361 he married Joan, the "Fair Maid of Kent" (q.v.), and in 1362 was created Duke of Aquitaine, and received as his patrimony the possessions of the English crown in the south of France, the government of which he assumed in 1363. In 1367 he undertook an expedition into Spain, to assist Don Pedro of Castile in regaining the throne of which he had been deprived by Henry of Trastámara, aided by the French. Edward crossed the Pyrenees at the head of a large army, and at Navarrete (Najera) the Black Prince won the third of his great victories, and completely defeated Pedro's rival, Prince Henry, with his French allies under du Guesclin. But the prince's army rapidly wasted away by sickness, and, with his own health fatally impaired, he was compelled to recross the Pyrenees. The burden of debt he had incurred compelled him to impose an unpopular hearth-tax upon his restive Gascon subjects, who appealed against him to the French king. Charles summoned the prince to Paris; but Edward returned a defiant answer and war was resumed between France and England in 1369. Next year Edward took Limoges by storm, and mercilessly put to death all the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex. This was his only conspicuous success, and it reflects small credit upon the victor of Poitiers. Edward's health was now rapidly failing and in 1371 he returned to England, where he took a prominent part in English politics as the champion of the constitutional policy against the corrupt court and Lancastrian party. He supported the reforming measures of the Commons in the "Good Parliament" (q.v.) of 1376, though by his death (June 8 of that year) the work was to a great extent undone. The prince was a gallant soldier, but his victories were probably due as much to the great superiority of his troops over the enemy as to his own generalship. Though full of the spurious knight-errantry of the day, he was mercilessly cruel in his campaigns. But in his later years he showed some understanding of the political difficulties in England, and was very popular with the commons.

Edward, son of Henry VI (1453-71), was the only child of the king by Margaret of Anjou. In 1454 he was created Prince of Wales; the Yorkists asserting that he was either a bastard or a changeling. In the parliament of 1460 he was disinherited in favour of Richard, Duke of York. After the battle of Towton he accompanied his mother to Scotland and thence to the continent. In 1470 he married Anne Neville, daughter of the Earl of Warwick, who, with the support of Louis XI and René of Lorraine, invaded England on his behalf. In 1471 he fell in the battle of Tewkesbury, or was put to death immediately afterwards; but the story that he was stabbed by Richard of Gloucester is unproved.

Edward, son of Richard III (1473-84), was the only child of this king and Anne Neville. In 1477 he was created Earl of Salisbury, and in 1483 Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, and appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In February 1484 the members of the two houses of parliament took an oath to support his succession to the throne, but two months afterwards he died.

Edward, PRINCE OF WALES (b. 1894), eldest son of King George V and Queen Mary, was born at White Lodge, Richmond. He entered the Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, in 1909, and in 1911 was invested with the Garter and created Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall. On the outbreak of the Great War in 1914 he concluded his university career at Oxford and joined the Grenadier Guards. During the war he served in Flanders, Egypt, and Italy. In 1919 he visited Newfoundland and Canada; in 1920, New Zealand and Australia; in 1921, India and Japan, returning in 1922. In 1925 he paid a visit to South Africa, returning to England by way of the Argentine. He was president of the British Empire Exhibition of 1924-5.

Edwin (EADWINE), KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (617-33), was the son of Ella, King of Deira. Having been exiled by Ethelfrith he took refuge with Redwald of East Anglia. After the death of Ethelfrith he obtained possession, as a result of the battle of the Idle, of the two kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia, the sons of Ethelfrith having fled to Scotland. He conquered the little British kingdom of Elmet, obtained suzerainty over Man and Anglesey, defeated and expelled Cadwallon of Gwynedd, extended his kingdom to the Firth of Forth, and founded the great northern stronghold of Edinburgh, which derives its name from him. His most powerful rival was Cwichelm of Wessex, who attempted his assassination. This project failed, and Edwin defeated him in 626; but Penda having made Mercia independent of Northumbria, in alliance with Cadwallon of Wales, who had returned from exile, defeated and slew Edwin at Heathfield in 633. Edwin's reign is chiefly important for the conversion of Northumbria to Christianity. His second wife was Ethelburh, daughter of Ethelbert of Kent, who brought with her as chaplain Paulinus, and their influence, aided by Edwin's escape from assassination and his victory over the West Saxons, was the means of his conversion. He was baptized at York by Paulinus, who became the first bishop of that see. So great was the peace and tranquillity of Northumbria during the height of Edwin's prosperity that, according to Bæda, a woman with her new-born babe might have travelled from sea to sea without sustaining injury. Penda's victory, however, exposed Northumbria once more to the horrors of anarchy, and Christianity was well-nigh extinguished.

Edwy (EADWIG), KING (955-8), was the son of Edmund, and succeeded to the throne at the age of fifteen, on the death of his uncle, Eddred. The account of his reign in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" is extremely meagre, and subsequent writers who attempt to supply details evidently write with strong prejudice. The early biographer of Dunstan tells us that the young king fell completely under the influence of Æthelgifu, a young widow of princely blood, whose daughter Elgiva (Ælgifu) he married. The alliance was probably uncanonical, and seems to have occasioned general discontent, as well as widespread suspicions of immorality. Dunstan, who opposed the marriage, was exiled, and punishment was meted out to all enemies of "the king's wife's mother." In 957, however, the general discontent found vent in a revolt. The Mercians and Northumbrians broke away and chose Edwy's younger brother Edgar (q.v.) as king; and Archbishop Oda pronounced the marriage of Edwy and Elgiva null and void. The next year Edwy died—whether murdered or not it is impossible to decide. Ethelweard tells us that "he was called by the common people the second Pankalus, meaning all-beautiful," and that he was "much beloved"; but by the majority of the monkish chroniclers he is depicted as a model of precocious vice. His lavish grants to monasteries show that he was not altogether hostile to the movement of ecclesiastical reform; but the memory of his services to the Church was obscured by his fatal quarrel with St. Dunstan. [DUNSTAN, ST.]

Egfrid (EGFRITH), King of Northumbria (670-85), was the second son and successor of Oswy, being preferred to his elder brother Alchfrid. The chief interest of his reign lies in his relations with St. Wilfrid (q.v.). He was defeated by Ethelred of Mercia (679) and compelled to surrender Lindsey. He undertook in 684 an expedition against the Scots of Ireland, but was slain by the Picts under King Bruide at the battle of Nechtansmere (685) (q.v.), which marks the end of the Northumbrian supremacy.

Egypt, RELATIONS WITH. The history of British interference in Egyptian affairs starts appropriately with the landing of a British force in 1801 during a quarrel with France about Turkey. Turkish domination followed European evacuation and Mehemet Ali relieved a half-century of misrule. In 1875 Great Britain bought four million pounds' worth of shares in the Suez Canal, and a consequent financial inquiry revealed the bankruptcy of the khedivate. France, Italy, and Austria were representative on the financial commission appointed by the khedive on the public debt, and Baring (afterwards Lord Cromer) became the British commissioner. Disturbances from 1879 culminated in the rebellion of Arabi against the khedive, when a British fleet bombarded Alexandria and Arabi surrendered at Tel-el-Kebir. British control dates from this interference. Trouble in the Sudan, where Hicks was defeated and Gordon's death at the hands of the followers of the Mahdi (1885) was followed by a punitive expedition under Kitchener (1898) and the settlement of the Sudan. Under Cromer Egypt flourished, her finances being restored and irrigation from the Nile systematically extended. The Anglo-French Convention of 1904 defined their relations to each other and to Egypt. After Cromer returned (1907) political agitation for self-government followed. Kitchener's regime (1911-14) was marked by economic reforms and the rise of the fellah to political consciousness. In 1913 a legislative assembly was granted. In 1914 a British protectorate was established, the hereditary sultanate being preserved. During the Great War martial law was proclaimed. In 1919 the Nationalists demanded autonomy and carried out a systematic agitation in Egypt and in Great Britain. On the fall of the premier, Rushdi (1914-19), disturbances broke out. In 1919 a British commission under Milner was appointed and reported in favour of a dualism in government, by which Egyptian independence and integrity were guaranteed by Great Britain, whose interest was to be consulted only in foreign affairs; the capitulations by which Europeans had been beyond the reach of Egyptian law were abolished, and two British officers were appointed to supervise the public debt and legislation as to foreigners.

Eldon, JOHN SCOTT, 1ST EARL (1751-1838). [SCOTT.]

Eleanor, daughter of King John (d. 1274), was married first to William Marshal the Younger, and in 1238, secondly, to Simon de Montfort. This latter marriage seems to have been a secret one, and quarrels soon arose between Henry and de Montfort concerning it. After the death of her husband at Evesham (1265), Eleanor retired to the nunnery of Montargis, where she remained till her death.

Eleanor of Aquitaine (1122?-1204) was the daughter of William, Duke of Aquitaine, and heiress to Poitou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Périgord, Angoumois, Guienne, and Gascony, besides inheriting claims to Toulouse. In 1137 she was married to Louis VII, thereby uniting the south with the north of France. With him she went on the Second Crusade (1147), but her conduct on the expedition and subsequently was so light that in 1152 she was divorced from Louis, though the nominal ground for the separation was consanguinity. In the same year she married Henry of Anjou, who, two years later, became King of England. From him she became gradually estranged, and in 1173 encouraged her sons to rebel against their father, for which she was seized and imprisoned, and remained in captivity, with but short intervals, for sixteen years. On her husband's death, she was released by Richard, and made regent of the kingdom in his absence; and during his reign she did all in her power to repress the ambition of John and thwart the designs of Philip Augustus. She supervised the collection of the ransom for Richard, and herself joined him in Germany. At Richard's death, she came forward again as John's chief adviser. She used her influence to exclude Arthur, and took command of the army that reduced Anjou to submission, and subsequently went to Spain to fetch her granddaughter, Blanche of Castile, who was betrothed to Louis VIII. To the last moment of her life she was engaged in political affairs, and shortly before her end was striving hard to keep to their allegiance the English barons, while Philip Augustus was attacking Normandy. Her death was followed by the rapid dissolution of the Angevin Empire.

Eleanor of Brittany (d. 1241) was the daughter of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Constance, Duchess of Brittany. After the death of her brother Arthur, she inherited his claim to the English crown, but was kept a prisoner by John in Bristol Castle, where she remained for many years, till she was permitted to retire to the nunnery at Amesbury.

Eleanor of Castile (d. 1290), wife of Edward I, was the half-sister of Alfonso X of Castile. At her marriage with Edward in 1254, her brother renounced his pretensions to Gascony. She accompanied her husband on his crusade, and legend said saved his life by sucking the poison from his wound, but the story is certainly apocryphal. She was crowned with him in August 1274, and, indeed, throughout her life seems seldom to have been absent from his side. Her virtue and amiable character made her greatly beloved by the people. The chroniclers relate that if the least complaint of oppression came anyhow to her ears, she endeavoured to redress the wrong, and that her large revenues were so administered that no oppression by her officers was possible. Archbishop Peckham, however, found it necessary on one occasion to intervene on behalf of some of her overburdened tenants; and she seems to have occasioned some scandal by her dealings with the Jewish usurers. She died at Harby, near Lincoln, in November 1290. Her body was conveyed to Westminster, and at each place where the funeral procession halted a richly-carved cross was erected. Thirteen in all of these crosses were raised, but only three, those at Northampton, Geddington, and Waltham, remain.

Eleanor of Provence, QUEEN (d. 1291), wife of Henry III, was the daughter of Raymond Berenger, Count of Provence. The marriage of Henry and Eleanor took place in 1236, and the young queen almost immediately obtained a complete ascendancy over her husband, which she used for the purpose of advancing her friends and relatives. Her uncle, Boniface of Savoy, was made Archbishop of Canterbury, and other important offices were conferred on the queen's numerous relatives, who drained the land by their rapacity and extortion. Still, the Provençal marriage was not without its good results. Provence was at this time the most cultured state in Europe; literature and the arts flourished, and the court was the chosen residence of the troubadours and scholars of Europe. Some of this culture found its way into England, but it hardly compensated for the great unpopularity which this influx of foreigners brought on the king and queen. A quarrel with the citizens of London over the abuse of her rights in the port of Queenhithe, and the rigorous exaction of "queen gold," only increased the general hatred of her. During the king's absence from England in 1253 she was appointed with Richard of Cornwall joint governor of the realm. In 1263 the hatred of the Londoners against her culminated, and when she attempted to join her son Edward at Windsor the mob attacked her and forced her back to the Tower. In the Barons' War, which she more than anyone had helped to bring about, she showed great determination and courage, but after the battle of Lewes had to take refuge in France. After the fall of de Montfort, she returned, and had her revenge on the citizens of London, who were fined 20,000 marks for their conduct towards her. A few years after Edward I's accession she retired to the convent of Amesbury, where she died in 1291.

See under HENRY III.

Elections, PARLIAMENTARY, are held in virtue of writs issued either by the Crown for a new parliament, or in cases of vacancy while the House is in session, out of Chancery by the Speaker's warrant by order of the House. These writs are addressed to the sheriffs. Until 1405 the sheriff had to make the return in person in forty days. The election was made in full county court, at the next meeting of the court after the writ was received. It appears that some persons were specially summoned to the election, for at the beginning of the fifteenth century the county court was no longer generally attended by great people. Much irregularity seems to have prevailed in the election of knights of the shire during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Sometimes a crowd of the lower class attended the court; sometimes the election was made by a few great people or their stewards; sometimes it was managed by lawyers or interested persons, and often the sheriff ordered matters as he liked. To secure the return being in accordance with the election, it was ordered by 7 Hen. IV, c. 15, that it should be attested by the persons electing in an indenture attached to the writ. The indenture, however, was only signed by a few of those who attended the court, and it seems that sometimes the electors chose certain of their number to exercise the common right of voting. When this was the case, the delegates signed on behalf of the whole body. Elections for cities and boroughs were formally made in the county court under the Plantagenet kings. The obligation of payment of members' wages caused the towns to be anxious to escape from representation. When the electors of a borough had made their choice, it was reported to the sheriff in the court. In case they failed to elect, he caused members to be chosen from them along with the knights of the shire. The ceremony which came in later times to be called the nomination, and to be incorrectly regarded as something different from a mere preliminary of the election, was the ancient election itself in the county court. If more than one candidate was proposed, the election was decided by a show of hands. As a seat in parliament became an object of ambition, the custom arose of taking a poll of other electors who might not at the time be present at the court. A poll was taken only when demanded, and it was at first incorrectly regarded as an act of grace on the part of sheriffs to grant the demand. There was no limit to the time during which the sheriff might keep open the court for the purpose of the poll, save the date on which the writ was returnable. Polling in the eighteenth century sometimes lasted for a month, and in cases in which great efforts were made to secure a seat, the whole period was filled with drunkenness and riot. The disgraceful scenes which marked the Westminster election of 1784 resulted in an act, 25

Geo. III, c. 84, limiting a poll to fifteen days, and ordering that the scrutiny of votes should be closed six days before the return was made. In the ninth year of George IV this period was shortened to nine days in the case of boroughs; by 2 Will. IV, c. 45, to two days both in borough and county elections, and by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 15 and 48 Vict., c. 10, to one day in both. By 35 and 36 Vict., c. 33, the Ballot Act [BALLOT, VOTE BY], a poll follows a disputed nomination as a matter of course, without being specially demanded. The use of voting papers in university elections, provided for by 24 and 25 Vict., c. 53, still continues.

Disputed Elections were, up to the time of Henry IV, decided by the Crown. From 1410 inquiry as to the accuracy of the sheriff's return was made by the judges, the ultimate decision still remaining with the Crown. The House gained the right of deciding these questions at the close of the sixteenth century. In 1553 a committee of the House decided against the validity of the election of Nowell, a prebendary of Westminster. It successfully upheld its right of judgment in these matters against the will of Queen Elizabeth in 1586, in the Norfolk election case; and in 1604, in the case of Sir F. Goodwin, it obtained from the king the admission that it was the proper judge of returns. This jurisdiction was exercised at first by committees specially appointed, and then by the Committee of Privileges and Elections. It became the custom to admit members who were either privy councillors or barristers to this committee, though not nominated to it. From this cause the committee, by the end of the seventeenth century, was held to be open; and for the sake of orderly management these cases were soon tried at the bar of the House. Election petitions were thus decided by a trial of the strength of contending parties, without regard to the facts of the case. To remedy this evil, the Grenville Act, 1770, provided for the election of a committee (by a mixed system of ballot and selection) for the adjudication of election cases. Although this act effected an improvement in the practice of the House, it still left election questions within the area of party politics, and by allowing either party to strike out a certain number of the names chosen by ballot, to commit the decision of these cases to the weakest men of both sides. By the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict., c. 125, these questions were placed under the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, as far as concerns the facts of an election which has been questioned by petition. Such petition must now, by this act, be presented to the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice, and the corresponding courts in Scotland and Ireland. A judge of these courts tries the petition in the county or borough to which it refers. After he has heard the case, he makes a report to the Speaker as to the validity of the election, the prevalence of corrupt practices, the knowledge of the candidate concerning such practices, and the names of those who are guilty of them. The House then acts on the report in the same way as it would have acted on the report of an election committee. It has thus not surrendered its constitutional right of deciding questions involving the right to its seats; but has merely made over the investigation of some of them to a court of law.

Corrupt Practices at Elections.—These, besides direct bribery, include treating and undue influence of various kinds. By the Corrupt Practices Act, 1868, if the judge reports particular persons as guilty of such practices, the report is laid before the attorney-general, who institutes a prosecution against them at his discretion, without the intervention of the House. If the report declares that such practices have extensively prevailed in a constituency, the House generally suspends the writ, and if the report is confirmed by further inquiry, disfranchises the constituency by act of parliament. The various acts which imply undue influence or corruption were carefully defined by the Corrupt Practices Act of 1883, and very stringent penalties enacted against principals as well as their agents found guilty of these practices. [BRIBERY.] The House is very strict as regards influence, and in 1641 and 1802 made declarations to the effect that any interference in election matters by peers was a breach of privilege. From the scope of the latter declaration Irish peers elected for a seat in the House are exempt. In practice, peers take part until the writ is issued, and frequently lend conveyances for voters. To secure the freedom of election, an act (10 and 11 Vict., c. 21) orders that soldiers shall be restrained in barracks during the day of a poll, except for the purpose of voting or of necessary duty.

Electors.—When the influence of feudalism on the constitution was destroyed, the lesser tenants-in-chief were merged in the general body of freeholders. In the parliament of Edward I the Commons consisted not of the lesser tenants of the Crown mentioned in Magna Carta, Art. 14, but of representatives elected by the freeholders in counties, by certain electors in boroughs, and by the clergy. In counties the original electors were those who composed the county court in which the election was held. By the end of the fourteenth century it seems that many came to, and took part in, an election who were not suitors of the court. While an act of 1406 restrained the undue power of the sheriff in making returns, it did not give the freeholders the sole right of election. This was not secured until 1430, (8 Hen. VI, c. 7), and was then limited to a part of them. This act declares that elections are wont to be made "by persons of small substance and no value," and limits the right of voting to resident holders of free land of the clear annual value of 40s.; and two years later it was enacted that the qualifying freehold should lie within the county. By these statutes the quality of tenure, and not the quantity of interest, was regarded. For instance, a life estate in a freehold above the specified value conferred a qualification, while no estate in copyhold could do so, even though it were one of inheritance; and copyholders were expressly excluded from the franchise by 31 Geo. II, c. 14. The franchise in cities and boroughs before 1832 was determined not by any general statute, but by special acts, by charters, or by usage. Thus in London the parliamentary franchise followed the municipal, and was exercised at different periods by representatives of the wards, by the common councilmen, and by the liverymen of the companies. The exclusive policy of corporations tended to restrict the franchise in most chartered boroughs, so that ultimately a co-optative oligarchy alone had any voice in the election. In some others it had a popular character, and, in default of any contrary usage or charter, belonged to inhabitant householders, or else, as in Bristol, which was a county of itself, to the 40s. freeholders. Borough franchise, indeed, was altogether a matter of local law. The representation of the clergy was the same in extent and mode as in the election of proctors for convocation (q.v.). University representation was established by James I, and in this case the right to vote has belonged to all who by their degree constitute the governing body of the universities, even though non-resident. By the Reform Act of 1832, 2 Will. IV, c. 45 [REFORM BILLS], the qualification was extended in counties so as to include (1) copyholds, of which persons were seised either in law or equity, either of inheritance or for life, of the clear annual value of £10, (2) leaseholds, for the unexpired portion of a term of sixty years of the annual value of £10, or of a term of twenty years of the annual value of £5, (3) an occupation qualification for a tenant of lands, etc., at a clear rent of £50, paid yearly. While, however, it preserved the qualification conferred (4) by freeholds of inheritance, it provided that freehold estates for life, of which the annual value was less than £10, should not confer a vote, unless there was bona fide occupation, or where such freeholds had been acquired by marriage, devise, etc. As regards cities and boroughs, the act retained some rights permanently, e.g., those of the freemen and liverymen of London, of freeholders and burgage tenants in cities which were also counties, etc. Some rights were retained temporarily, as those of freemen and burgage tenants in boroughs, of inhabitant householders, etc., and the franchise was extended in favour of the sole occupiers of any premises of the annual value of £10. In Scotland the county franchise was fixed (2 Will. IV, c. 65) at a £10 ownership, and included some classes of leasehold. The borough franchise included £10 householders. In Ireland at the time of the Catholic Emancipation Act, the qualification in counties was raised from a 40s. to a £10 freehold. In 1832 it was extended by the admission of certain leaseholds and £10 copyholds. By the Reform Act of 1867, 30 and 31 Vict., c. 102, the franchise stood thus— in counties, (1) the old 40s. freeholders in fee; (2) the holders of a life estate from 40s. to £5, if of freehold tenure and with occupation; (3) of any life estate above £5; (4) of the remainder of a lease of sixty years of the value of £5; (5) occupiers of land, etc., for twelve months, rated at not less than £12; (6) occupiers whose rent was assessed at £50. In cities and boroughs it was extended to (1) all resident householders or rated occupants of dwelling-houses, after payment of one year's rates; (2) all rated occupants of premises other than houses, of the value of £10; (3) all who had for twelve months been in the separate occupation of the same lodgings, which were, if unfurnished, of the yearly value of £10. The lodger franchise was, by 41 and 42 Vict., c. 26, declared to include an office, studio, shop, etc. A change of apartments in the same house was not held to be a change of lodgings. In Scotland, by 31 and 32 Vict., c. 48, the franchise was granted, in counties, to a £5 ownership and a £14 occupation. A household and a lodger franchise were also fixed in boroughs. In Ireland, by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 69, an estate in fee or for life of the annual value of £5, or an occupation of the value of £12, conferred a vote for a county, and a rated occupation of £8 for a borough election. By the Irish Reform Act, 1868, a household occupation rated at £4 and a lodger franchise of £10 were created in boroughs. In 1884 Gladstone introduced a Reform Bill applying to the whole of the United Kingdom, and assimilating the franchise in counties with that in boroughs. By this measure, which was followed in 1885 by a Redistribution Act, the franchise was granted to (1) all resident male householders or rated occupants of dwelling-houses; (2) lodgers; (3) certain persons not occupying separate tenements or apartments, but living in houses occupied by others, who were to vote under what was called the "service franchise." Disqualification under all the Reform Bills attached to females, aliens, infants, etc., to all peers except such Irish peers as had been elected to a seat, to certain revenue officers, to those in receipt of parochial relief, and to some few others. The disabilities of the police were removed in 1887. Irish Catholics were admitted to the franchise in 1793, on taking the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. In 1829 Peel carried a new form of oath, by which Catholics were enabled to vote without doing violence to their convictions. A further advance was made by the Representation of the People Act, 1918, which (1) based the franchise upon a six months' residence in a constituency or six months' occupation of land or premises of a minimum yearly value of £10, (2) accorded a further vote to holders of university degrees, (3) entitled women of 30 years and over to vote, and (4) regulated the amounts of election expenses. By this act the electorate was increased from 8,357,000 men in 1917 to 10,449,820 men and 7,831,583 women in 1923. This number was further increased by the Equal Franchise Act, 1928 [REFORM BILLS]. By 5 and 6 Will. IV, c. 36, all electoral oaths were abolished. Everyone claiming to exercise a right to vote must see that his name is registered in a list drawn up by the overseers of the parish in which his qualification lies. These lists are afterwards revised in open court by revising barristers, who decide on objections and claims. An appeal lies to the Common Pleas from the decision of these officers.

Persons Elected.—During the fourteenth century the terms of the writs which specified the condition of men who were to be elected were constantly varied. Efforts were made to procure the election of "belted knights," or at least of squires of good position, as county members, and of men of the higher class of burgesses for borough members; and to exclude sheriffs, lawyers, and "maintainers of quarrels." It was important that the representatives of the commons should be of a rank which would make them independent of Crown influence or of private advantage. Notwithstanding these efforts, it was often found impossible to secure men of the position required by the writs. The exclusion of the clergy in 1371 was the result of special circumstances. Lawyers were several times excluded (e.g., 1402) because it was thought they took advantage of their position as members to forward the interests of their clients. By 1 Hen. V, c. 1, residence was declared a necessary qualification. This statute was, however, constantly disregarded, and is expressly repealed by 14 Geo. III, c. 58. A qualification in real estate was adopted (by 9 Anne, c. 5), and was fixed at £600 a year for county, and £300 for borough members. By 1 and 2 Vict., c. 48, personality might be reckoned in making up the required sum, and now by 21 and 22 Vict., c. 26, all property qualification is abolished. Disqualification attaches to aliens, infants, etc., to all peers, except Irish non-representative peers, to clergy of the Church of England (by 41 Geo. III, c. 63), to Roman Catholic clergy (by 10 Geo. IV, c. 7), to sheriffs and other returning officers as regards their own sphere of office, to government contractors, bankrupts, and those convicted of felony or of corrupt practices at elections under the acts on that subject. Persons holding certain places of profit under the Crown, which do not include those of the various ministers and officials at the head of the great departments of the State, were disqualified by 6 Anne, c. 7. In most cases, pensions held during pleasure entail disqualification. The Catholic Relief Bill, 1829, admitted Roman Catholics to parliament on taking a special oath provided for such cases. Jews were shut out from the House by the terms of the parliamentary oath until 1858, when the oath was so altered that they were able to take it. [OATHS, PARLIAMENTARY.] By 29 and 30 Vict., c. 19, religious disabilities were removed, the sole condition of admission to the House of a member not otherwise disqualified being that he take the oath prescribed by that statute. From this obligation Quakers and some other religious bodies have been exempted, and by an act of 1888 the relief was extended to persons of no religious belief. [BRADLAUGH.]

Elfgar (ÆLFGAR), son of Leofric, was made Earl of East Anglia on the outlawry of Harold in 1051, but in the next year, Harold being restored, he lost his earldom. In 1053 he was reinstated through the generosity of Harold, who succeeded in that year to his father's earldom of Wessex. In 1055 he was banished, when he allied himself with the Irish Vikings and the Welsh, but was compelled to submit by Harold, who restored him to his earldom. On the death of Leofric he was made Earl of Mercia. In 1058 he was again outlawed and reverted to his former alliance with Gruffyd of North Wales, but he was again pardoned. He died probably in the year 1062, and was succeeded in his earldom by his son Edwin. His daughter Ealdgyth married (1) Gruffyd (Griffith) of Wales, and (2) Harold.

Elgin, JAMES BRUCE, 8TH EARL OF (1811-63). [BRUCE.]

Elgiva (ÆLFGIFU) was the wife of King Edwy (q.v.). She was apparently within the prohibited degrees, and Dunstan and Oda endeavoured to get Edwy to divorce her. At length, in 958, the marriage was annulled. Political faction probably contributed largely to her fall.

Eliot, SIR JOHN (1592-1632), a member of an old Cornwall family, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and studied law in London. In 1614 he entered the "Addled" Parliament as member for St. Germans, and at once rose into prominence as one of the foremost orators of the time. In 1623 Eliot came forward as one of the prominent champions of constitutional rights. In the parliament of 1625 he was strongly in favour of putting into execution the laws against the Roman Catholic recusants. In the second parliament of Charles I (1626) Eliot was the recognized leader of the constitutional party. He moved an inquiry into the mismanagement of the government, and was foremost in demanding that the conduct of Buckingham should be investigated. In consequence (May 11, 1626), he was imprisoned in the Tower, but set at liberty after a few days. In 1627 Eliot was one of those who, with Hampden and Wentworth, refused to contribute towards the forced loan levied by the Crown, and was imprisoned in the Gatehouse. In the parliament of 1628 he was again foremost in the attack on royal misgovernment, and bore the chief share in drawing up the Remonstrance and Petition of Right. [His three resolutions were read on March 2 while Finch, the Speaker, was held down in his chair.] On the dissolution of the parliament he was imprisoned in the Tower (March 1629). He was kept in confinement, and his health was broken by the harsh treatment he received, and on November 27, 1632, he died. During his imprisonment he wrote a treatise called "Monarchy of Man," which embodied his views on the theory of constitutional monarchy. He was one of the ablest as well as the most estimable of the popular leaders of Charles I's reign.

Elliott, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, 1ST BARON HEATHFIELD (1717-90), began his military career by serving as a volunteer in the Prussian army in 1735. On returning home he entered the ranks of the Engineers at Woolwich, from which he exchanged a few years later into the Horse Grenadiers. With these troops he served in Germany, and was wounded at Dettingen. After taking part in the expedition to Cherbourg and Havannah, he was appointed to the command of the forces in Ireland (1774), but, owing to some difference with the authorities at Dublin, he very soon resigned and returned to England, whence he was dispatched, as governor, to Gibraltar. In 1779 began the siege of that important fort, and for four years the governor's ability and endurance were taxed to their utmost. In every respect did Elliott show himself equal to the occasion, and he has been handed down to posterity as having conducted one of the most stubborn defences of modern warfare. The value of his services was recognized at home, though tardily. He remained at the post he had held so gloriously till 1787, when he returned to England and was raised to the peerage as Baron Heathfield. In 1790 he died of palsy, just as he was about to set out again for Gibraltar.

Elizabeth, QUEEN (b. September 7, 1533, s. November 17, 1558, d. March 24, 1603), the daughter of Henry VIII by his second wife Anne Boleyn, was born at Greenwich. On the death of her mother, she was sent to the castle of Hunsdon, where she and her half-sister Mary were brought up by Lady Margaret Bryan. Afterwards she shared the studies of her half-brother Edward, who became greatly attached to her. On the accession of Edward VI, she was committed to the care of Catherine, the queen dowager, who soon married Thomas Seymour, the brother of the Protector Somerset. Thomas Seymour showed that he nourished ambitious schemes, and he was suspected of using the opportunities which his marriage gave him of trying to win the affections of Elizabeth. Catherine died in 1548, and Thomas Seymour's conduct towards Elizabeth was one of the charges brought against him, and was the subject of a rigorous inquiry, in which the young girl conducted herself with great dexterity. Seymour was beheaded, and Elizabeth was closely watched at Hatfield. Here she pursued her studies under the direction of William Grindal and Roger Ascham, and acquired a reputation for learning. In the plot of Northumberland to secure the throne for the Lady Jane Grey, Elizabeth took no part, and on Mary's accession was treated by her with consideration. The imperial ambassadors doubted about Elizabeth, and Mary worked hard for her conversion to Romanism. Elizabeth judged it wise to give way, and on September 8, 1553, attended Mass. As Mary's marriage project with Philip of Spain advanced, her suspicions of Elizabeth increased, and in December Elizabeth left the court, and retired to Ashridge, in Buckinghamshire. Mary wished to marry Elizabeth to Edward Courtenay, but Courtenay refused. Wyatt's rebellion brought Elizabeth and Courtenay into suspicion. Elizabeth was arrested in February 1554, and sent to the Tower. Every effort was made to obtain evidence against her, but without success. In May she was released, but was committed to the care of Sir Henry Bedingfield, and sent to Woodstock. Philip of Spain, on his arrival in England, showed more consideration towards Elizabeth. He wished to marry her in such a way as to promote his own political plans. First, a marriage with the Duke of Savoy was proposed, and in April 1555 Elizabeth was summoned to Hampton Court, whence, at the end of the year, she went to Hatfield. It needed all her cleverness to escape the marriage with the Duke of Savoy, which would have sent her away from England. When this was abandoned, there came a proposal for Eric of Sweden, son of Gustavus Vasa, which was also refused. Elizabeth in her early days found herself surrounded by snares. She learned to trust no one, to act circumspectly, to assume an ambiguous attitude which did not commit her to anything definite, and to be prepared for any emergency. Mary on her death-bed, November 17, 1558, nominated Elizabeth as her successor, in the hope that she would maintain the Roman Catholic religion. Philip of Spain trusted that he would find in Elizabeth a complaisant ally, but she had already gained a large experience of the world and the difficulties which beset her. She never forgot that her position must be maintained by herself alone, and her interests were not those of any particular party or system. She never laid aside her skill in balancing herself between opposing parties and husbanding her resources so as to profit by their mistakes.

At her accession England was without money and without resources, and was engaged on the side of Spain in war with France. Philip II wished to maintain the English alliance, and offered his hand to Elizabeth. But the marriage with Philip needed a dispensation from the pope; and Paul IV was under the influence of France. He was ready to impugn the legitimacy of Elizabeth. Whatever doubts she might have had about her policy on her accession, she soon saw that the defence of Protestantism at home and peace with France abroad were necessary for her own security. Her first measures were directed to a religious settlement. In this matter she reverted to her father's plan: freedom of the English Church from the supremacy of the pope, and from beliefs and practices which were unknown to the primitive Church, but a retention of its Catholic foundation. This plan suited neither the Calvinists nor the adherents of the old faith. But Elizabeth appointed a committee of divines to revise the Prayer Book of Edward VI, and parliament in 1559 re-established the royal supremacy, approved the revised Prayer Book, and enforced its use by the Act of Uniformity. Many of the bishops refused obedience, and were deprived of their sees. The new Archbishop of Canterbury, Matthew Parker (q.v.), was the chief helper of the queen in carrying out her ecclesiastical policy, and a body of commissioners who afterwards grew into the Court of High Commission (q.v.) were appointed to exercise the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Crown. But the greatest danger that Elizabeth had to face was the fact that the next in order of succession to the English crown was Mary, Queen of Scots. The party in England that was favourable to the old religion would have welcomed her against Elizabeth. Mary was supported by the influence of the Guises in France, and it was possible that Philip of Spain might unite with them to put down heresy in England. Elizabeth was urged by parliament to marry, and she looked round for some foreign alliance. But she clearly saw the difficulties that beset her. If she married a Protestant, she would destroy the hopes of the Catholics in a peaceful accession of Mary; if she married a Catholic, her husband would either be some insignificant person, or her marriage would draw her into political combinations which would sacrifice the independence of her position. Many husbands were proposed, but she refused them all. It was thought that her personal preference was for Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; but she abstained from a marriage which would be unpopular and politically useless. She used marriage projects as means of political temporizing, to a degree which was often ludicrous. She encouraged in her court a fantastic devotion to her person, and gloried in the title of the "Virgin Queen." The progress of the Reformation in Scotland gave Elizabeth a means of strengthening herself against Mary. In February 1560 she entered into the Treaty of Berwick, by which she undertook to aid the rebel lords in expelling the French, who, under the queen regent, Mary of Guise, garrisoned Edinburgh. She was rewarded by the withdrawal of the French, and the agreement that Mary and Francis II should lay aside their pretensions to the English crown. In December 1560 Francis II died, Mary refused to sign the Treaty of Edinburgh, and in August 1561 landed in Scotland, the avowed agent of the policy of the Guises. For the next few years the history of England centres on the secret war which was waged with feminine astuteness between the two queens. Elizabeth wished Mary to resign her claim to the English succession, offered her an alliance, and agreed to recognize her as successor. Mary refused to give up her claim for a doubtful boon. She hoped to win back Scotland to Catholicism, and looked about for a husband who would help her. When, in 1565, she married Darnley, it was a great blow to Elizabeth, who aided Moray and the rebel lords, but afterwards disavowed them. The birth of a son to Mary still further strengthened her position; but the murder of Darnley and the marriage with Bothwell destroyed Mary's hold on Scotland, and relieved Elizabeth from some anxiety. Mary's flight to England in 1568 placed Elizabeth in a difficult position. She could not make common cause with rebels against their queen, and thereby give a dangerous example; she could not restore Mary to the Scottish throne against the wish of her subjects; she could not leave Mary at large in England to be a centre for Catholic plots; and she did not wish to send her to France, where she would be an instrument in the hands of the Catholic party. The "Casket Letters" (q.v.) were used to blacken Mary's character; she was refused an interview, and was kept in confinement in England. It was not a magnanimous policy, but it was characteristic of Elizabeth's caution. Still, Mary as a prisoner was powerful for mischief. There was a plan to marry her to the Duke of Norfolk, and there was a dangerous rising in the north in favour of the old religion. The Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland advanced to Durham, and ordered Mass to be celebrated in the cathedral. But the Catholics as a body did not rise; the rebellion was put down with severity by the Earl of Sussex, and England at the end of 1569 was again peaceful.

In 1570 Pope Pius V proceeded to the excommunication of Elizabeth, and religious strife was consequently aroused in England. Parliament in 1571 retaliated by repressive measures against the Catholics. It was declared high treason to call the queen a heretic or to name her successor. The Established Church was more vigorously set up as a standard of orthodoxy, and Catholics and Puritans alike were required to conform. The scheme for the liberation of Mary and her marriage with the Duke of Norfolk was revived by foreign aid.

A Florentine, Ridolfi, negotiated between the English conspirators and the pope and Philip II. Supplies were to be furnished from abroad, and the Duke of Alva, from the Netherlands, was to help with 10,000 men. The plot, however, was discovered by the vigilance of Burghley, who had succeeded in organizing the intelligence department of the government into great efficiency. The Spanish ambassador was dismissed from England; the Duke of Norfolk was imprisoned, and afterwards beheaded on June 2, 1572. Philip II was prevented by the affairs of the Netherlands and the doubtful condition of France from taking any steps against England for the time, and from 1572 to 1576 England was left in peace. In 1576 Philip II's half-brother, Don John of Austria, was sent as governor to the Netherlands. He was ambitious of invading England and marrying Mary of Scotland. He failed, however, to pacify the Netherlands, and his failure led to his untimely death through disappointment. To obtain foreign help, the Netherlands welcomed as their prince the brother of the French king, the Duke of Anjou. Negotiations were long continued for the marriage of the Duke of Anjou to Elizabeth, which would have marked an alliance of England and France against Spain. If Elizabeth could have been certain of securing this end, she would have consented to the marriage. As it was, she effected great coyness as a means of gaining time. Her doubts were justified. The Duke of Anjou failed in the Netherlands, because he tried to override the constitution. Elizabeth saw that there was no hope of a firm alliance with France. In England she was exposed to the incessant plots of the Catholic party, which tried to raise Ireland against her. In 1579 James Fitzmaurice, brother of the Earl of Desmond, landed with Spanish troops, and took possession of the fort of Smerwick, near Kerry. It was instantly besieged by the deputy, Lord Grey de Wilton, and was driven to surrender, whereupon the Spaniards were massacred by a body of troops under the command of Sir Walter Raleigh. Hatred of Spain had become a principle in the minds of Englishmen, and the Spanish attempt on Ireland was mercilessly put down. More active than soldiers were the Jesuit missionaries who, in 1580, were sent to England to revive the spirits of the Catholics. With unflinching boldness and great dexterity they travelled about England and organized the Catholic party. Chief of these Jesuits was Campion (q.v.), who was taken prisoner and put to death for conspiring against the queen. The Catholics were severely persecuted, and the Protestant spirit of England was quickened by perpetual suspicion. A plot to assassinate Elizabeth, of which Francis Throckmorton (q.v.) was the chief agent, was discovered in 1584, and again the Spanish ambassador was ordered to quit England. The sentiment of loyalty to the person of Elizabeth grew strong among the people, and a voluntary association was formed for her defence [ASSOCIATION TO PROTECT QUEEN ELIZABETH]. Its members undertook to prosecute to death all who should attempt the queen's life, or in whose behalf such attempts should be made. This was a threat against Mary, whose death was thus sure to follow immediately on the assassination of Elizabeth.

Meanwhile, the hostility between England and Spain was becoming more and more apparent. France, under the pressure of the religious wars, had admitted Spanish influence, and had withdrawn all appearance of help from the Netherlands. Elizabeth found it wise to send help to the Netherlands, but she sent as little as she could. She never believed that the Netherlands would make good their stand against the Spanish power, but with a niggardly hand she helped them to prolong their struggle. At the end of 1585 the Earl of Leicester was sent to Holland with English troops. Leicester did little more than besiege Zutphen, and Elizabeth negotiated with Spain, and was ready to betray the Netherlands if thereby she could have secured peace. Philip II, however, was irritated against England, both on account of the help sent to the Netherlands, and still more on account of the damage done to Spanish trade in the West Indies by the piratical raids of Sir Francis Drake. A Spanish invasion of England was imminent, and plots against Elizabeth's life were resolutely carried on. At the end of 1586 a plot, contrived by Anthony Babington, was discovered by the secretary, Sir Francis Walsingham. He allowed it to proceed till he had obtained evidence which implicated Mary of Scotland. Then Babington was executed, and a commission was appointed to try Mary, who was found guilty. For a long time Elizabeth hesitated to put Mary to death. At last she signed the warrant, but gave no orders that it should be carried into effect. Mary was beheaded in February 1587, and Elizabeth professed that the execution had been carried out without her knowledge. She tried with characteristic duplicity to free herself of personal responsibility, but England rejoiced that it was rid of one who was such a fertile source of danger and disturbance. Mary's death brought the Spanish invasion nearer. So long as Mary lived, Philip II was bound to fight in her name; on her death he put forward his own claim to the English crown. A raid of Drake on Cadiz, in April 1587, stirred Philip II to greater indignation. In May 1588 a large fleet, known as "the Invincible Armada," set sail for England. Its huge ships were ill-suited to the task. The preparations for a junction with ships from the Netherlands failed. The Armada was thrown into disorder by the smaller and swifter craft of the English. A storm completed its discomfiture, and England was saved from a landing on its shores. During the days of peril Elizabeth showed great courage, and addressed in stirring words the volunteers who gathered at Tilbury. She was personally brave, and knew how to deal with her people. The defeat of the Armada gave an impulse to English seamanship, which had been growing rapidly during Elizabeth's reign. Then for the first time the English showed those qualities which have secured for them the mastery of the sea. An aggressive war against Spain was rapidly planned, and the Portuguese were urged to revolt from Philip II. In 1589 an expedition was undertaken against Lisbon, which failed in its main object, but convinced the English that Spain was not such a formidable foe as they had thought. From this time English privateers cruised the Spanish Main and crippled the Spanish trade. Sir Walter Raleigh was energetic in urging schemes of colonization in opposition to Spain. In 1584 he colonized Virginia, which he called after the Virgin Queen. In 1592 he penetrated to the Isthmus of Darien, and in 1595 to Guiana. Though little was done at the time, the way was prepared for future efforts. Spain was beaten back both in France and in the Netherlands, and Elizabeth, in her old age, was inclined to peace. But the martial ardour of England was aroused, and the Earl of Essex was eager to distinguish himself. In 1596 an expedition was made against Cadiz, which was sacked by Essex. Next year he and Raleigh set out on what was known as "The Island Voyage," which was a failure, owing to quarrels between the two commanders. Elizabeth and Burghley were more and more desirous for peace. But troubles broke out in Ireland, where Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, gathered together the tribes of Ulster, and surprised the fort of Blackwater. In Ireland, Elizabeth found occupation for the energy of Essex, whose ambition was boundless and whose popularity was great. But Essex, contrary to his orders, entered into negotiations with Tyrone, and concluded peace. When he returned to England in 1599 he was called to account for his conduct. He had many enemies, and was disgraced, being confined as a prisoner in his own house. At last, trusting to his popularity, he made a desperate rising, in the hopes of getting the queen into his hands. The people refused to follow him. He was taken prisoner, found guilty of high treason, and beheaded in February 1601. Elizabeth sorely felt the necessity of putting Essex to death, and never quite recovered from her grief. As she grew old she missed the homage of her people. The expenses of the Irish war forced her to apply to parliament for money, and parliament attacked the royal grants of monopolies. Elizabeth gave way with good grace, and her last years saw the defeat of Tyrone's forces by Lord Mountjoy, in 1602. Elizabeth had a growing feeling of lack of sympathy between herself and the new generation which she had fostered. Her last days were unhappy, and she died on March 24, 1603, after indicating the King of Scotland as her successor.

Elizabeth lived in perilous times, and the fortunes of England were curiously interwoven with her personal security. She found England discouraged, disunited, and poor; she left it with a strong national spirit, prosperous, and resolute. Her policy was shifty, but her means were scanty. She knew how to choose wise advisers, but she never entirely trusted them. She knew how to play upon human weakness, and she was better served at smaller cost than any other sovereign. England, in her reign, made great advances in every way, and then first assumed the chief characteristics which still distinguish it. Though many of Elizabeth's doings were unworthy, she never forgot the interests of her people, and she never lost their affection. It is her greatest praise that her objects were those of her people, and that England prospered under her rule.

Elizabeth Woodville, QUEEN, wife of Edward IV (1437?-92), was the daughter of Sir Richard Woodville (afterwards Earl Rivers) by Jacquetta of Luxemburg, widow of John, Duke of Bedford. She married first, about 1452, Sir John Grey, son and heir of Lord Ferrers of Groby. He was killed in 1461, at the second battle of St. Albans, leaving her with two sons, Thomas, afterwards Marquis of Dorset, and Richard. The Woodvilles and the Greys were alike strong partisans of the Lancastrian cause, and on the accession of Edward IV the widow of Sir John Grey was deprived of her inheritance, and obliged to remain at her father's house at Grafton in Northamptonshire. Here she made the acquaintance of Edward IV, who privately married her in 1464. The public announcement of the marriage at Michaelmas had political consequences of first-rate importance. [EDWARD IV.] The queen's numerous relations were advanced by Edward as a counterbalance to the power of the Neville connexion. During the period of Lancastrian supremacy, on the flight of Edward IV and the restoration of Henry VI (1470), Elizabeth took refuge in sanctuary, and here her son Edward was born. On the death of her husband she had once more to take sanctuary. In 1484 she was induced to leave her retreat, and went, with her remaining children, to Richard. After the battle of Bosworth Elizabeth gladly wedded her daughter to the victor Henry, herself retiring to the abbey of Bermondsey with a small pension.

Elizabeth of York, QUEEN, wife of Henry VII (1465-1503), was the daughter of Edward IV and Elizabeth Woodville. She was betrothed, under the Treaty of Pecquigny (1475) (q.v.), to the dauphin of France, and later her uncle, Richard III, is reported to have contemplated marrying her. In 1406, however, she was married to Henry VII, to whom she had been promised as early as 1484, when he first contemplated the dethronement of Richard. Henry was determined not to appear to owe his crown to his wife, and it was probably for this reason that her coronation was delayed until the end of 1487. The queen's goodness, beauty, and liberality earned her popularity; and although, according to Bacon, Henry was towards her "nothing uxorious," she seems to have exercised a beneficent influence upon him.

Ella (ÆLE) (d. 517?) is traditionally regarded as the founder of the kingdom of Sussex. He is said to have come (in 477) with his three sons, Cymen, Wlencing, and Cissa, to Cymenesora, which has been conjecturally identified with Keynor in Selsey. He fought a great battle with the Britons, the issue of which was doubtful. Having obtained reinforcements, he captured the great fortress of Anderida (q.v.) in 491, and firmly established himself on the narrow strip of coast between the Downs and the sea. Ella is said to have reigned forty years, and to have been succeeded by his son Cissa (q.v.). Bæda writes of him as the first of the Bretwaldas (q.v.), or wielders of the imperium.

Ellandune, THE BATTLE OF (825), was fought between the Mercians, under Beornwulf, and the West Saxons, under Egbert, and resulted in a total rout of the former. It has been identified with Allington, near Amesbury, in Wiltshire, but was more probably Ellingdon (now Wroughton) near Malmesbury.

Ellenborough, EDWARD LAW, EARL OF (1790-1871). [LAW.]

Elliot, GILBERT, 1ST EARL MINTO (1751-1814), after having filled the office of president of the board of control, was appointed governor-general of India in 1806. His first task was to deal with the Vellore Mutiny (q.v.), his next to establish order in India, and secure the frontiers of the company's territories by treaties with foreign powers. Marching an army into Nagpur, he compelled Amir Khan to retire. The pirates of Kolapur and Sawuntwarri were attacked and overawed. The growth of the power of Ranjit Singh (q.v.) made him desirous (1808) to check it in the east, and to form an alliance with him. He sent an embassy to Lahore, and after some difficulty succeeded in concluding the Treaty of Amritsar (q.v.), of perpetual amity between the British government and the state of Lahore. About the same time (1810) a treaty was concluded binding the sovereign of Persia to resist the passage of any European force through his country to India, and the government of England to furnish aid in case Persia should be invaded from Europe. Having thus established order and security at home, Lord Minto turned his attention to the hostile colonies of the enemy and his allies. Macao and the Chinese colonies of Portugal were occupied (1809), but were subsequently abandoned, owing to the firmness and threats of the Chinese government. The islands of Mauritius and Bourbon were captured (1810), thus cutting off a great resort for French privateers. The Dutch colonies in the Spice Islands and Java were captured after a gallant defence (1811). Minto was raised to an earldom, and recalled (October 1813).

Elmet was the name of a little British kingdom situated between Leeds and York, which retained its independence till it was conquered by Edwin, and annexed to Northumbria about 625.

Elphinstone, ARTHUR, 6TH BARON BALMERINO (1688-1746), was a noted Jacobite. He early entered the army, and held command of a company of foot in Lord Shannon's regiment under Queen Anne; but on the accession of George I he resigned his commission. Elphinstone took part in the Jacobite rebellion of 1715, and fought at the battle of Sheriffmuir. He escaped to France and served in the French army until 1733. He was one of the first to repair to the Young Pretender's standard in 1745. Early in 1746 he succeeded to the title of Balmerino on the death of his brother. Taken prisoner at the battle of Culloden, he was tried for high treason before the lord high steward's court in Westminster Hall, found guilty, and executed. He maintained his principles to the end, and his last words were, "God bless King James."

Elphinstone, MOUNTSTUART (1779-1859), was sent to India as a writer in 1795. In 1801 he was appointed assistant to the resident at Poona. He was present at Assye, and after the war he became British resident at Nagpur. In 1808 he was sent on a mission to Kabul, and on his return two years later was appointed resident at Poona. He fought the battle of Kirki in 1817, when Bajirao (q.v.) attacked the British residency. In 1818 he was appointed commissioner of the Poona territory; and he became governor of Bombay in 1819. In 1827 he returned to England. Seven years later he was offered the governor-generalship, but refused. The rest of his life was uneventful, and he died peacefully in his eightieth year.

Ely, THE ISLE OF, was originally an oasis in the midst of the marshes of Cambridgeshire and the fen land. It owes its chief fame to the great abbey which was founded there by St. Etheldreda in 673. In 970 it was re-founded by Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, as a Benedictine community, having been, a hundred years previously, destroyed by the Danes. It was here that Hereward held out against the Conqueror, until the island was finally taken in 1071. In 1109 Ely was made the seat of a bishopric by Henry I. After the battle of Evesham and the surrender of Kenilworth, some of the barons escaped to Ely, but their stronghold was taken by the lord Edward in 1267.

Emancipation, CATHOLIC. [CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION.]

Emancipation, NEGRO. [SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF.]

Emigration, in its restricted sense, is used for the departure of persons from a country with a highly organized society and thick population to settle in one with abundance of uncultivated soil. The word is opposed, nevertheless, to colonization, which implies rather the first settlement in a new land, whereas emigration signifies that the country of which it is the object has already made some advance in civilization. Hence emigration in its proper sense cannot be said to have systematically begun in England previous to 1815, on the termination of the great war with the French Empire. In that year the number of emigrants was only 2,081; in the following year it had increased to 12,510, and it was 34,987 in 1819. The average annual number of those who emigrated in the ten years from 1825 to 1834 was 50,304; from 1835 to 1844 it was 75,923, thus showing a steady rise, though there was a drop during the first half of the latter decade. During the five years ending 1853 the average rose as high as 323,002, an exceptional rate, probably due to such extraordinary causes as the Irish famine, the gold discoveries in Australia and California, and the development of the resources of America through the adoption of free trade in England. The average sank to nearly a half during the Crimean War, and in 1860, when the struggle between the Northern and Southern States was raging, the total was only 91,770. In 1870 it was 256,940; in 1879 it was 217,163, and 332,294 in 1880, the increase being chiefly of Irish emigrants. In 1893 the number was 307,633, which depression in the colonies and America reduced by one-half in 1896 (these figures include foreigners in transit via British ports). The twentieth century saw a sudden increase in numbers. The countries to which our emigration is chiefly directed are British North America, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. The first of these was in favour until 1835, after which the outbreak of the Canadian rebellion, the preference of the enormously increasing number of Irish emigrants for American institutions, together with other and more general causes, turned the scale; nor is it probable that even the legislative restrictions on immigration into the States will soon equalize numbers which in 1894 were respectively 159,431 and 23,633. It should be observed that the Scots emigrate less readily than the other inhabitants of the British Isles; the numbers in 1892 were 133,815 English, 52,902 Irish, and 23,325 Scots. The fact that emigration was pioneered by the movements of whole communities driven forth by religious persecution, and bound for unknown and uncivilized lands, is the main cause of the tendency of earlier emigration to base itself on organized schemes. Thus Wakefield's scheme of combined emigration had its prototypes in the Pilgrim Fathers, and afterwards in the ill-fated Darien expedition. Now, however, such precautions are generally unnecessary, except when dealing with a pauperized and helpless class like the Western Irish. All that need be done is to provide for the safe and cheap transit and reception of individuals. This first responsibility was placed in 1831 in the hands of the Emigration Commission, part of whose duties was to distribute useful information, which is now done by the Emigrants' Information Office. It was regulated by law in various Passengers Acts providing for the comfort and protection of emigrants, the first of which was passed in 1835, and those now in force in 1855 and 1863. The welfare of settlers is watched over in the Dominions and the United States by government immigration agents, who supply all information free of cost. State emigration has been frequently adopted as a relief for pauperism, notably by the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834, and the Irish Land Act of 1881. On the other side, the Dominions have offered advantages in order to secure manual labour. The graver dangers of the introduction into the Dominions of inferior races, such as the Chinese into Australia and British Columbia, have been met by legislation. The problem is no longer merely one of numbers. With self-government the great Dominions have changed from a policy of reckless invitation to one of selective subsidization. Australia, for example, besides tending to exclude all but European emigrants, demands that emigration shall not lower the standard of living. Emigrants must either be skilled workers or farmers with capital. South Africa alone, with the ever-present fear of its colour problem, tends to encourage the influx of Britons qua Britons. After the war of 1914-18 the Imperial government passed the Empire Settlements Act of 1922, by which any settlement scheme in the Dominions was to be helped financially to the extent of 50 per cent. All the Dominions have settlement agencies in London and many philanthropic and government organizations co-operate with them.

Statistical and general information can be obtained from the "Statesman's Year Book," the "Colonial Office List," the "Imperial Institute Year Book," and the handbooks and circulars published by the Emigrants' Information Office.

Emmet, ROBERT (1778-1803), was an Irishman whose unhappy fate inspired some of the finest of the "Irish Melodies" of Thomas Moore. Emmet was in sympathy with the objects of the Society of United Irishmen, and for complicity in the rebellion of 1798 he was expelled from Dublin University. He then withdrew to the continent, but returned in 1802, and in 1803, at the head of an undisciplined mob, attempted to seize the Arsenal and Dublin Castle. He was captured, condemned for treason, and executed.

Empire, RELATIONS WITH THE. Cut off from the Roman Empire by the English conquest, Britain began again to have dealings with the "world state," when Christianity and political consolidation had renewed civilization and intercourse with the world. The Mercian overlords of the eighth century corresponded on equal terms with the great house that was soon to restore the glory of the Cæsars. Charles the Great's jealousy of Offa led to his support of the exiled Ecgbert of Wessex, whose accession to the West Saxon throne must have strengthened the relations of the two powers, and who may have found in the Carolingian Empire a model for imitation. The presence of learned men like Alcuin in Charles's court had a similar tendency. The correspondence of Ethelwulf with Louis the Pious, whose granddaughter he afterwards married, kept up the connexion. Athelstan's sister's marriage to Charles the Simple, and his support of Louis "Ultramarinus," continued the dealings with the Carolingian house, even when empire had almost stepped from it. English dealings with the Saxon emperors were still more intimate. Henry the Fowler married his son Otto to Athelstan's sister, and Giesebracht points out the similarity of Henry's power in Germany and that of the West Saxon overlords in England, and even suggests conscious imitation. With the acquisition of the imperial dignity, Otto aspired to a far higher power than his father. But if Henry copied Athelstan, the second coronation of Edgar at Bath as "Emperor of Britain" suggests that that monarch aspired to rival Otto's crowning by John XII. The assumption of imperial titles by the great early English kings shows that they aimed at least at absolute equality in dignity with the emperors. It is remarkable that in such circumstances good relations were maintained. The innumerable coincidences of law and usage between England and the Empire, though in the main instances of parallel development rather than of influence, may in some cases illustrate the effects of this constant intercourse. The Norman Conquest allied England with the papacy, but the continuity of the national tradition soon tended to reunite English king and Roman emperor in a common hostility to the Hildebrandine papacy. The contest of William I and William II with Anselm is the English reflection of the Investiture contest. But the superior prudence of the English monarch avoided that direct breach with the Church which was, perhaps, inevitable in Germany. Even marriage alliances, such as that between Matilda and Henry V, did not result in joining England with the Empire in its extreme measures, but rather led to the Concordat of Worms, which the agreement between Henry and Anselm had anticipated. With Henry II began another period of still closer relations. Henceforth the imperial alliance became one of the permanent traditions of our mediæval foreign policy. Henry married his daughter to Henry the Lion, and instituted close friendship with the Guelfic house without impairing his friendly relations with the rival Hohenstaufen on the imperial throne. In fact, Frederick Barbarossa's contest with Alexander III necessarily produced close relations with Henry, engaged in his struggle with Becket. Only the prudence of his advisers prevented Henry from being bound by his ambassadors to support Barbarossa's schismatic pope. The Third Crusade was entered into by Frederick as by Richard I, although the English monarch had given a home to his nephew Otto after the fall of Henry the Lion had driven him from Germany. Hence the jealousy of the Emperor Henry VI, Richard's captivity on his return, and the humiliating surrender of the imperial crown of Britain to the German Emperor. Henceforth, hostility to the Hohenstaufen emperors became the great principle of Richard's and John's foreign policy. But the battle of Bouvines (1214) put an end to the hopes of the Guelfic line, and the house opposed to England became undisputed emperors. Gradually the strong bonds of connexion were renewed, and the sister of Henry III became the bride of Frederick II. All England watched with keen interest that emperor's struggle with the papacy, though Henry himself was too much bound by his papal connexion and personal religious scruples to give him any help. But so long as his nephew remained alive as Frederick's heir, Henry refused to join in the papal crusade against the Hohenstaufen. His acceptance of the Sicilian throne for Edmund of Lancaster occurred only when his sister's son was dead. But the great connexion between England and the Empire in this reign is the election of Richard of Cornwall, Henry's brother, as King of the Romans. Though never master of Germany, Richard was yet the most powerful of the claimants during the Great Interregnum. His influence led directly to the close commercial dealings between England and the Hansa. He obtained for his brother great privileges for the steelyard, and imported Harz miners to work the tin mines of his Cornish earldom. But with the fall of the Hohenstaufen the glory of the Empire had departed; though in its weakness, as in its strength, it adhered to its English connexion. Rudolf of Habsburg had a scheme for renewing the middle kingdom in conjunction with Edward I. Adolf of Nassau served as a hireling in the army of that same monarch; Louis of Bavaria was closely allied with Edward III. They married sisters, and had in the French king and the Avignon popes common objects of hostility. At Coblenz, in 1338, Louis made Edward imperial vicar. But the quarrel for the Hainault succession broke up a friendship which Louis's weakness made unprofitable to England. Even then he found in the Englishman, William of Ockham, a warm defender of his theoretical claims. The Luxemburg house now acquired the Empire, and their alliance with France brought a new coolness between England and the Empire which was not fully ended till Richard II married Wenzel's sister, Anne of Bohemia. [BOHEMIA, RELATIONS WITH.] The friendship of Sigismund and Henry V, their common religious and European policy, was a fitting crown to the mediæval dealings of England and the Empire; for after Sigismund's last assertion of the universal power of the Empire at Constantine, that splendid theory ceased to have any practical working. England continued the friend of the nominal emperors, but it is with the rulers of hereditary dominions, not with the nominal emperors, that these dealings really occurred. [BURGUNDY, RELATIONS WITH.] Charles V, who for a time aspired to a renewal of the imperial power, inherited not only the imperial, but the Burgundian and Spanish alliances of England, and was thus united to her by a triple bond. Even this was sundered by the Reformation, though the old imperial alliance may be regarded as renewed in the dealings of England with the German Protestants. With the rise of Louis XIV the Anglo-Imperial alliance was renewed, and continued with few breaks till the end of the Empire in 1806. [AUSTRIA, RELATIONS WITH.]

Empson, Sir Richard (d. 1510), was the son of a tradesman at Towcester. He devoted himself to the law, and came under the notice of Henry VII, who employed him in public duties, and especially in financial affairs. Together with Dudley, Empson was the chief agent of the illegal or quasi-legal extortion of Henry's reign. He incurred great unpopularity in consequence, and was executed with Dudley at the beginning of the next reign. [DUDLEY, Sir Edmund.]

was consolidated in 1801, provided that the consent of three-fourths of the freeholders and copyholders of the manor was necessary, that the common should be divided among them in proportion to their holdings, the lord being awarded one-sixteenth. He had also the power of vetoing enclosures. The General Enclosure Act of 1845 established a new principle, that of local inquiry through Enclosure Commissioners, so that the poor could make known their grievances; it also set apart certain portions of land for recreation and garden allotments. Passed, however, before the nation had adopted the doctrine of free trade, it tended to promote rather than check enclosure; the land set apart for recreation was miserably inadequate, and the great commons and forests were threatened everywhere. Accordingly a Society for the Protection of Rural Commons was formed by Henry Fawcett, and one for the Preservation of Commons near London by Charles Shaw-Lefevre (Viscount Eversley). The exertions of the former were successful in preventing the parliamentary sanction of enclosures between 1869 and 1876, and the necessity of such a step was proved by the fact that the area of common land in England and Wales was not, as was imagined, 8,000,000 acres, but only 2,632,000. The question of urban commons was not decided until after a violent struggle in the law courts, owing to the fact that while the right of a village to its green was recognized by law, that of a town to its common was not. The crucial case was that of Epping Forest, over which the Crown has several important forestal rights, which had, until about 1840, prevented enclosure. When the neighbouring landlords began to appropriate the land, an old man named Willingale resisted them on behalf of the villagers of Loughton, and his cause, taken up by the corporation of London, resulted, in 1874, in a complete overthrow of the landlords' pretensions. Soon afterwards a royal commission decided that the enclosures were illegal, and that the forest should be restored to its original condition. In 1878, therefore, an act was passed, directing that Epping Forest should be preserved for ever, open and unenclosed, for the benefit of the people of London. The corporation of London were made its conservators—and subsequently of all common lands within twenty-five miles of London. Finally, the Commons Act of 1876 substituted regulation and improvement in place of the enclosure of common lands, and laid down the principle that no enclosure should be sanctioned by the commissioners without distinct evidence that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants generally. Engagement, THE, December 26, 1647, was the name given to a compact made at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, with the Scottish Commissioners, by which Charles I engaged to support the Covenant and the Presbyterian party, and to repress heresy; the Covenanters, on their side, promising to assist him against the Parliament. An act of oblivion and the complete union of the two countries was to follow the restoration of peace.

Englefield, THE BATTLE OF (871), fought between the English, under Ethelwulf, ealdorman of Berkshire, and a detachment of Danes, resulted in the victory of the former—Sidroe, one of the Danish jarls, being slain. Englefield is a village in Berkshire, about six miles west of Reading.

English Conquest of Britain, THE. A close connexion is discernible between the differing forms of Roman power in the island and the history of this great movement. From the cessation of that power in its temporal form sprang the conditions that gave it birth; with the introduction of the spiritual form it entered upon a new stage, whose beginning may be taken as marking not merely its complete success, but its virtual ending. As an historical landscape, therefore, it may be said to lie between the year 410, the probable date of the cessation of the official connexion between Britain and Rome, and 597, that of the arrival of St. Augustine. But these dates enclose the darkest period of British history; next to nothing that is trustworthy has been recorded of the details of the conquest; and notwithstanding the huge contributions that genius and scholarship have made to the subject of late years, the fraction of solid, or even probable, fact remains extremely meagre. Our best authorities differ widely regarding the value and interpretation of the fragmentary and confused accounts that tradition preserved among the conquerors. The study of archæology has recently thrown much new light upon the period; but anything like an exact account is still impossible. Modern authorities seem agreed that no formal evacuation of Britain by the Romans ever took place. The province was denuded of troops as a result of the rebellions of Magnus Maximus (383-8) and Constantine (407-11), and such was the disorganization of the empire as a whole that the legions were never replaced. The Romanized Britons, left to their own resources, seem at first to have worked with some success the military and political organizations inherited from the Romans. Of the system of defences that Rome had created the most valuable was the line of fortresses that kept guard upon the "Saxon Shore" (q.v.), along which the most persevering, relentless, and formidable enemies of Britain, the Saxons, had been prowling in their "keels" for generations, plundering and ravaging the neighbouring lands. The liberated Britons naturally continued upon this harassed frontier the vigilance their Roman masters had before observed; and the office of Dux Britanniarum is thought to have been retained. Soon, however, the prospect darkened. The awful crisis in the history of the island which Roman valour and skill had so long kept back again approached, and the necessary warlike vigour and civic virtue for coping with it were no longer forthcoming. After a brief quiescence, the old inveterate foes of Romanized Britain swarmed again to the attack; the Picts from the North, the Scots from Ireland, descended on her towns and fields, and spread slaughter and ruin wherever they went. Above all, the German "Nook" sent forth in new abundance its untiring bands of hardy and merciless adventurers—called Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, but soon to bear the common name of English—who sailed up and down the eastern coast, and landing at unguarded places, pillaged and plundered almost unchecked. Then the loose-jointed political and military organization of the Britons fell to pieces. In the period which had elapsed since the withdrawal of the legions, Celtic influences had reasserted themselves. The local magistrate of the Roman period had become the tribal chief. Civil discord paralysed the state; the struggles of rival chiefs—"tyrants," as they are called by Gildas—the rage of factions, wasted the strength of the people; and famine and pestilence thinned their ranks. The fitful efforts of isolated chieftains to stem the torrent of calamity having proved unavailing, it would seem that the southern Britons were tempted to try the course of making allies of one class of their assailants against the other, and applied to the Saxons for help against the Picts and Scots. The Saxons came to their help, nothing loath, and so got within the defences of the Saxon Shore, secured their footing in the land, and after driving back the Picts and Scots, quickly found a pretext for turning their arms against their hosts, and wrested from them a considerable share of the soil they had come to defend.

Whether such was the actual form of the event or not, we may accept as an historical fact that in the middle of the fifth century (450, 449, or earlier), an alien race of German origin seized upon a part of south-eastern Britain with the fixed purpose of keeping it, and thus set an example which, cheerfully and promptly followed by their kinsfolk, led to the complete transfer from a substantially Celtic to a substantially Teutonic population of the greater part of the country that is now called England. Later records give us a few names of men and scraps of incidents belonging to this momentous process, but their authenticity is extremely doubtful. According to our written evidence, Kent, the first-fruits of German cunning and daring, was conquered and occupied by Jutish warriors between 449 and 473; Sussex by Saxon between 477 and 491; Wessex by Saxon and Jutish between 495 and 519; and in part simultaneously with these, in part after them, and till about 550, the other communities and states of the same origin—Middlesex, Essex, East Anglia, the miscellany of settlements that ultimately coalesced into Mercia, and Deira, and Bernicia—were founded, some by Saxons, some by Angles, and some by both. But shadowy and uncertain as is our knowledge of the foundation of the southern settlements, of the foundation of the northern settlements we know nothing. The first sight that we get of these is after they have become fully established and powerful organizations. Within a century after their first landing in force the terrible strangers had got into their exclusive possession the eastern half of the island south of the Forth. The whole of this land was won by the edge of the sword. The conquest was ferocious in character; fields of slaughter, sackings of cities, massacre and depopulation, spoiling and burning of homesteads, leading into captivity, every conceivable shame and horror that can befall a race make the history of eastern Britain during this time; the indistinct lamentations of the vanquished, the more definite traditions of the victors, concur in proving this. From the British side Gildas exclaims, "Some were caught in the hills and slaughtered, others were worn out with hunger, and yielded to a life-long slavery. Some passed across the sea . . . others trusted their lives to the clefts of the mountains, to the forests, and rocks of the sea." From the English side we learn such facts as that, in 473, "the Welsh fled the English as fire"; that in 491 the South Saxons "slew all that dwelt within" Anderida, "nor was as much as one Briton left alive"; that in 508 Cerdic and Cynric "slew a British king and five thousand men with him." And the name "Flame-bearer," given in Welsh literature to a Bernician king (Ida or Theodric), is fearfully expressive. Not that the career of the conquerors was one of unbroken success. Now and then the frenzied resistance of the Britons checked, perhaps even beat back, the advance of the English. History records the valiant deeds of one Ambrosius (q.v.), who emerged as leader of the Britons towards the end of the fifth century. The historicity of Arthur, who figures so prominently in later legend, is more doubtful; but that a great British rally took place at the opening of the sixth century is beyond question. [ARTHUR.] The battle of Mons Badonicus (516 ?), whatever its site, whether gained by Arthur or another, was undoubtedly a defeat for the English, and secured the Welsh a breathing-space of some length. But neither devoted courage nor flashes of success could save British civilization from the ruin that was coming upon it like a fate; the onward march of the ruthless German swordsmen was arrested, only to begin anew after a time with undiminished ferocity. This fresh advance, which began about 560, and carried the West Saxon arms to the Severn and the Dee, has this special interest: that the persons and events that belong to it are unmistakably historical. Whatever misgivings we may have about Hengest, Cissa, and Cerdic, we cannot but feel confident that Ceawlin really lived, and that his victory at Deorham (577) was a real achievement. It had its complement in the triumph of Ethelfrith of Bernicia over the Welsh princes of the north at Chester (613), which marked the virtual completion of the work of settlement. "The lands which were added to the area of permanently settled Saxon or Anglian soil after 613 were but of limited extent compared to those which had already been occupied."

The manner of the conquest is described by Stubbs as follows: "The conquest of Britain was the result of a series of separate expeditions, long continued, and perhaps, in point of time, continuous, but unconnected, and independent of one another. It was conducted by single chieftains, who had nothing in common with the nation they attacked, and who were about neither to amalgamate with them nor to tolerate their continued existence." This last statement has been seriously challenged by later historians. The school which postulated the utter effacement not merely of the British nation, but even of the British population throughout the conquered districts has been largely discredited. The more reasonable view now prevailing is that a not inconsiderable portion of the conquered must have been spared and that their descendants ultimately mixed with the descendants of the conquerors; that, in fact, modern England is not an exclusively Teutonic, but largely a Celtic, nationality. But of the substantial effacement of Romano-British civilization there can be little doubt. A widespread work of destruction had been accomplished before the era of settlement commenced; and the conquerors, untouched by Roman influences, had neither comprehension of nor sympathy for the institutions of the conquered. Their "Romanization" was destined eventually to be accomplished through the medium of the Church, which in 597 took up the task abandoned by the Empire in 410.

Englishry, PRESENTMENT OF, was a system introduced by William the Conqueror, whereby if a man were found murdered and could not be proved to be English, it was assumed that he was a Norman, and the hundred was fined accordingly. It fell into disuse about the time of Richard I, the two races having mixed to such an extent that it was impossible to say who was an Englishman and who was a Norman. It was not, however, finally abolished till 1341 (14 Ed. III, st. 1, c. 4).

Entente, THE TRIPLE, was formed between Great Britain, France, and Russia as a result of (1) the Franco-Russian treaty of 1894, (2) the Anglo-French agreement of 1904, and (3) the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1907, which united the three powers in common protection against the Triple Alliance which had already been cemented between Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy in virtue of the Dreikaiserbund of 1872, the Dual Alliance of 1879, and the accession of Italy in 1882. The entente had a difficult beginning. Great Britain and France laboured under a long tradition of mutual enmity. By the opening of the present century their rivalry was apparent in many spheres of world politics: in Tunis and the New Hebrides (1887), in Siam (1893), in Egypt since the period of dual control (1876), in the Congo region, in North Africa and Morocco, and in the Newfoundland fisheries. Similarly a coolness existed between Great Britain and Russia on account of rivalry in India, Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet, and as a result also of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance of 1902 and the Dardanelles and Dogger Bank incidents during the Russo-Japanese War (1904-5). But the interaction of political ambitions—international rivalries in Africa and the Far East especially—led first to an alliance between France and Russia in 1894 as a safeguard against the Triple Alliance, and afterwards, in virtue of Great Britain's growing realization that she could neither ally with Germany nor, on the other hand, suffer herself to fall into isolation, to the two ententes. Rivalry in Africa, Armenia, the Far East, and world commerce prevented a rapprochement between Great Britain and the Triple Alliance. The alternative policy—of reconciliation to France and Russia—was, therefore, inaugurated early in the century. Of the two ententes, that of 1904 with France was greatly facilitated by the reciprocal visits of King Edward VII to Paris and M. Delcassé to London in 1903, and that of 1907 with Russia was hastened by the financial needs and the democratic reforms of St. Petersburg. Between France and Britain the Moroccan, Siamese, and Newfoundland questions were settled; between Russia and Britain the Pact of Petersburg established an understanding in Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet. The achievement of the Triple Entente meant that Europe was henceforth divided into two camps, into either of which the smaller nations might enter at a moment of international crisis, with a consequent danger of universal war. These conditions endured for seven years, during which the Eastern question and Anglo-German rivalry held first place in European politics. [See articles on relations with FRANCE, GERMANY, RUSSIA.]

Erastians, THE, were so called because they held the views of the Swiss theologian Erastus (1523-83) on the inability of the Church to exercise discipline by censure, excommunication, etc.; its province being, according to their theory, confined to teaching. There never was an actual sect of Erastians in England; but their ideas on Church government were advocated by many leading divines, and in the Westminster Assembly (1643-9) were represented by the powerful eloquence of Whitelocke, Lightfoot, and Selden. A proposition, however, condemnatory of their doctrines was carried almost unanimously, and, though the "Chapter of Church Censures" in which it occurs was never formally ratified by parliament, Erastianism failed from that time to take deep root. The word frequently occurs in the history of the disputes which resulted in the secession of the Free Church of Scotland, and is sometimes used by English High Churchmen—in both cases with reference to those who deny the Church the right of self-government. Errol, FRANCIS HAY, 9TH EARL OF (d. 1631). [HAY.]

Erskine, JOHN, 6TH EARL OF MAR (d. 1572), the uncle of Moray, regent of Scotland, was governor of Stirling Castle, where he had the charge of the infant James VI. In 1571 he repulsed an attack upon Stirling by the queen's party, and shortly afterwards, owing to the death of Lennox in the fray, he was elected regent, an office which he filled with moderation and ability until his death (October 29, 1572). He was perhaps the only person in the kingdom who could have enjoyed the office of regent without envy, and have kept it without loss of reputation.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Erskine, JOHN, 7TH EARL OF MAR (1558-1634), son of the regent, made an unsuccessful attempt (1578) to obtain possession of the young king, James VI. In 1582 he was one of the leaders of the Ruthven Raid (q.v.), and had in consequence to take refuge in England, where he resided for some time at Newcastle, in company with other "banished lords." He was one of those who attempted to go to the rescue of the king in the Gowrie conspiracy (q.v.). In 1601 he was sent as ambassador to Elizabeth; he accompanied James VI to England, and became one of his privy councillors and lord high treasurer of Scotland (1616).

Erskine, JOHN, 11TH EARL OF MAR (1675-1732), entered public life early in Queen Anne's reign as a Whig, but soon joined the Tory party. His trimming policy obtained for him the nickname of "Bobbing John." He joined the Whigs in advocating the Scottish Union, and in 1706 became secretary of state to the Duke of Queensberry at the last session of the Scottish parliament. In 1710 he became secretary of state and manager for Scotland under the Tory administration. On the accession of George I he was deprived of office, and at once plunged into Jacobite intrigues. The Pretender's standard was raised by him at Braemar on September 6, 1715. He was at once joined by Tullibardine, heir of the Duke of Atholl, the Gordons and other clans, and was at the head of 12,000 badly-armed men. A detachment under Brigadier Macintosh was sent to surprise Edinburgh, and was ultimately defeated at Preston. At Sheriffmuir Mar encountered the royal troops under Argyll, and after an undecided battle Argyll withdrew from the field. In January 1716 the Pretender, after long delay, appeared in Scotland. But his presence infused no energy in the army. They withdrew from Perth to Montrose, and thence Mar and James Edward stole off to France, deserting their followers. Mar continued in favour with the Pretender, and succeeded in inducing him to dismiss Bolingbroke from his councils [ST. JOHN, HENRY]. In 1724 he retired into private life.

Erskine, THOMAS, LORD (1750-1823), the third son of the 10th Earl of Buchan, was educated at the High School, Edinburgh, and St. Andrews University. At the age of fourteen he entered the navy, but after four years he exchanged into the army. After seven years in his new profession, he left it to enter at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1778 both took his degree and was called to the bar. His first brief was held in defence of Captain Baillie, a naval officer who had been doomed by the ministry for daring to expose the abuses permitted by the admiralty. Erskine's fame was made at once, and was confirmed in the following January by his brilliant defence of Admiral Keppel in court-martial, which was followed soon afterwards by his equally powerful speech on behalf of Lord George Gordon. In November 1783 he was returned to parliament for Portsmouth, and did his utmost in support of Fox's India Bill. His fame is specially connected with his constant efforts to establish the rights of juries in libel cases. In 1794 he made a bold stand against the doctrine of constructive treason which it was attempted to lay down in the trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall. For the next twelve years he was recognized as leader in the courts at Westminster, and in all State trials was to be found retained for the defence. In parliament he was a firm supporter of Fox, and followed him in his temporary retirement from the House. Addington offered him a place as attorney-general in 1801, but Erskine declined it. On the accession to power of the Fox and Grenville ministry in 1806, Erskine received the chancellorship. During his short tenure of that office he had the satisfaction of announcing the passing of the bill for the abolition of slavery. For the fifteen years after retiring from office in 1807, he took little part in politics. On the trial of Queen Caroline, he broke away reluctantly from his long-standing friendship with the Prince Regent, because he felt bound to support the cause of a woman whom he considered to be innocent and injured.

Escheat (from the Norman-French eschet; escheoir, to fall) means the reversion of land to the lord. It could happen in two ways: (1) per defectum sanguinis, through want of heirs; or (2) per delictum tenentis, through the crime of the tenant, in cases of felony; the distinction between it and forfeiture (q.v.) being, that the first was regarded as a natural event, the second as the direct consequence of an illegal act. It affected tenants in fee-simple only. During the Middle Ages it was not unusual for the estates of some great noble to fall to the Crown. They then either continued in the possession of the king, retaining their identity, and being administered as a unit, or they were granted out again as an hereditary fief. In the first case, the sub-tenants were protected by Magna Carta (c. 43) from being treated as tenants-in-chief to the Crown, and need only pay such dues as they would have owed to their mesne lord. The wanton bestowal of escheated lands upon favourites and relations was a frequent charge against weak kings like Henry III and Richard II, while Edward II in 1309 was accused of depriving of their lands men who had a perfectly good title, a practice which the royal officers of Henry VII carried to a state of great perfection. In Escheat propter delictum the land passed to the lord, subject to the right of the Crown to "year, day, and waste" (Magna Carta, c. 32). After being modified by several statutes in the early nineteenth century, the whole law of escheat for felony, together with the king's right to possession for a year and a day, was abolished by the Felony Act of 1870. Escheat propter defectum is now most common in cases of bastardy. The land passes to the sovereign, except in the case of copyhold estates, which go to the lord of the manor.

In Scotland there was escheat for debt as well as for treason; it was abolished in 1737. Single escheat, however, by which the prisoner's movables are forfeited to the Crown, still exists as a punishment for crime.

Essex, KINGDOM OF. In Celtic and Roman times the district lying to the north of the lower course of the Thames was inhabited by the tribe of the Trinobantes. In this region the Romans founded many of their most important towns, such as Camulodunum, Londinium, and Verulamium; and towards the end of the period of their rule it formed part of the domain of the "Comes Littoris Saxonici," or Count of the Saxon Shore. When the Roman power was weakening, Essex seems to have fallen an easy prey to the Teutonic invaders; but there is no record left to tell us of the exact process or time of this invasion. It seems probable, however, that the attack was made by way of the Stour, the Blackwater, and the Colne, rather than up the Thames valley; and we know that the conquest was achieved by Saxons, and not by Anglian tribes, such as colonized the neighbouring counties to the north. The East Saxons do not seem to have spread far inland, being, in all probability, checked in their onward course by the great wood district lying to the west, whose relics still survive in Hainault and Epping Forest. In the same manner the South Saxons' progress was barred by the Andreadesweald, and for this reason neither Sussex nor Essex ever developed into one of the great kingdoms. But the East Saxons, though they do not appear to have ever had a Bretwalda, as the South Saxons had, were in one respect happier than the South Saxons; for it was into their hands that the great town of London fell. We read in Bæda that by the year 604 it was the "Metropolis" of Sebert, King of the East Saxons, and about the same year it became the seat of Mellitus, who was appointed bishop of the district by Augustine. Bæda tells us how, on the death of Sebert (616), the country relapsed into paganism, from which it was not converted till many years later. Mellitus was driven to Gaul, and seems to have returned only to occupy the metropolitan see of Canterbury, leaving London without a bishop till 654. On the accession of Sigebert, who had been baptized by Finian, Bishop of Lindisfarne, Cedd, brother of St. Chad, was invited to undertake the office of Bishop of the East Saxons, the see of London was renewed, and before the century was out an East Anglian king (Sebbi) had exchanged his crown for the garb of a monk in London. By this time the East Saxons seem to have been in greater or less subjection to Mercia; and though a late legend speaks of their largely increasing their bounds to the north and west, this kingdom seems to have for the future fluctuated between Mercian and West Saxon rule. At last, after the battle of Ellandune (825), the "Chronicle" tells us how the East Saxons "turned to Ecgbert, because they had formerly been forced from his kinsmen unjustly." The old line of East Saxon kings seems to have died out in the person of Sigered, and the people were more willing to have a Saxon than an Anglian ruler. But Essex was not as yet thoroughly merged in the West Saxon kingdom; on Edgar's death it was detached from Wessex, and given, with Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, to Athelstan (839). We have now reached the times of the Danish invasions. When East Anglia was overrun, and St. Edmund martyred by these marauders, Essex seems to have shared the fate of its northern neighbour, and some years later, by the Treaty of Chippenham (878) (q.v.), was, together with London, left in the hands of Guthrum. Later on we find the Essex Danes taking a prominent part in the invasion of 893, and next year the whole Danish army that had already harried North Wales retired by way of Northumberland and East Anglia to the Isle of Mersea, on the Essex coast. With Edward the Elder, however, the tide began to turn against the strangers; in 911 he built two burghs, one to the north and one to the south of Hertford, and in midsummer of the same year brought his army to Maldon, while the fortress of Witham was building; "and a good deal of the folk submitted to him who were before under the power of the Danish men." In 916 the inhabitants of Kent and Surrey, aided by many East Saxons, wrested Colchester out of the hands of the Danes, though not without destroying the town. However, before the year was out Edward had repaired the fortress and permanently taken the district into his power, for the army of East Anglia swore fealty to him at the same time. Towards the end of the century (991) Essex was once more exposed to the ravages of the Danes, and when Ethelred promised them tribute in 1011, Essex is mentioned as one of the districts they had overrun. When England was divided between Canute and Edmund Ironside (1016), Edmund received East Anglia and Essex, together with the district south of the Thames—a sure proof that there was not a very large number of Danes settled in the two first-mentioned provinces. From this time the history of Essex belongs to that of England generally. In the days of Edward the Confessor it formed a part of Harold's East Anglian earldom, and towards the end of the reign part of Leofwine's anomalous earldom, which included Kent, Surrey, and much besides.

Sir C. Oman, "England Before the Norman Conquest." [T. A. A.]

Essex, THE EARLDOM OF, does not appear to have come into being before the middle of the twelfth century. In 1140 Stephen created Geoffrey de Mandeville (q.v.) Earl of Essex, and four years later he secured an amplification of his charter from the Empress Maud. From him the earldom passed successively to his two sons. They dying childless, it was allowed (1199) to Geoffrey Fitz-Peter (Fitz-Piers), the justiciar, husband of a grand-niece of the first earl. Geoffrey again had two sons who succeeded him, but left no issue; and the title was conferred in 1236 upon a son of a sister of the last earl, Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, in whose family it continued until Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Northampton, Hereford, and Essex, died (1372), without male issue. [BOHUN, THE FAMILY OF.] The latter's elder daughter and co-heiress, Eleanor, then carried the title to her husband, Thomas of Woodstock, son of Edward III, and afterwards Duke of Gloucester. He was murdered in 1397, and his lands and goods were declared forfeit. This sentence was reversed after the accession of Henry IV, and the estates were divided among the three daughters of the former duke. In 1461 the title was revived in favour of Thomas, Lord Bourchier, Count of Eu, son of the eldest daughter Anne, who, alone of the three sisters, left male heirs. With the death of his grandson (1539) it became extinct, and was immediately regranted to the famous Thomas Cromwell. On Cromwell's attainder, in 1540, his honours became forfeit, and in 1543 the earldom was given to William Parr, brother of Queen Catherine Parr, and husband of the only daughter of the last Bourchier, Earl of Essex. Parr was afterwards created Marquis of Northampton (1546), but attainted in 1553. In 1572 the earldom of Essex was once more revived in favour of Walter Devereux, 2nd Viscount Hereford. His son Robert was attainted in 1601, but the honours were restored three years later to his son, Robert, on whose death without issue (1646) the title became extinct. Finally, in 1661, Arthur Capel, 2nd Baron Capel, was created Earl of Essex and Viscount Maldon, and by his descendant the title is at present held. [BOURCHIER; CAPEL; CROMWELL; DEVEREUX; PARR.]

Essex, HENRY BOURCHIER, EARL OF (d. 1483). [BOURCHIER.]

Estates, THE COMMITTEE OF THE, was appointed by the Scottish parliament of 1640 in place of the Lords of the Articles, to act in permanence during the recesses, both in the camp and at the capital. It was given full power to carry on the war against the king, to levy taxes, borrow money, and deal with all questions relating to the peace and order of the kingdom. It consisted of representatives of each of the three estates, which were now defined to be the nobility, barons, and burgesses; but included also some who were not members of parliament. The last committee of this period, appointed in 1651, was captured by Monck a few months later, and its members were sent as prisoners to London. It was summoned to meet again in 1660, but in the next year parliament revived the Committee of the Lords of the Articles. The convention which met at the time of the Revolution of 1689 also appointed a Committee of Estates, in accordance with the precedents of the Great Rebellion.

R. S. Rait, "The Parliaments of Scotland," 1924.

Estates of the Realm is a term frequently used to designate the two Houses of Parliament. According to popular doctrine, mediæval society was organized into the three orders or estates of clergy, nobles, and commons—those who prayed, those who fought, and those who worked—and the English parliament was carefully planned to represent and reflect all three. Modern investigations have shown the fallacy of this view. Although it is true that representatives of Church, baronage, and commons all found a place in the parliaments of the Middle Ages, the bicameral form which that assembly assumed sharply differentiates it from true systems of estates such as the representative bodies of Scotland or France. The "House of Lords" was compounded of both the first and the second "estates," and contained in addition an official or conciliar element which belonged to neither; while the Commons included, besides the burgess class, the knights of the shire or lesser barons who belonged properly rather to the second than to the third order. The term "estate" was, in fact, during the Middle Ages exceedingly elastic in its application; and it is not until the fifteenth century, when, as a result of the conquests of Henry V, England was peculiarly susceptible to the influence of French analogies, that we find the first official reference to parliament as consisting of "tres status." Thereafter the expression passed gradually into popular use, until, with its adoption by the nineteenth-century historians, it acquired a recognized place in current historical terminology.

A. F. Pollard, "Evolution of Parliament," 1920.

Estates of Scotland, THE. In Scotland the representative assembly of the nation had more in common with the French than with the English parliament. It was, "in its origin and throughout its history, definitely and avowedly a parliament of estates." To describe it as an assembly of the three estates of clergy, barons, and burgesses is, however, strictly accurate only in the early period of its history. The lesser clergy, as in England, soon ceased to attend; while in the seventeenth century, with the disappearance of the bishops and abbots, the clerical estate ceased entirely to be represented. Meanwhile, the estate of tenants-in-chief had broken up in the fifteenth century into the hereditary lords of parliament, and the commissioners of the shires. Thus, in the last years of its existence, the Scottish parliament was composed only of two groups representing the original estate of the barons, and one group representing the original estate of the burgesses. It included also an official element: the great officers of state attending ex officio from the sixteenth century onwards, and the judges of the Court of Session from their formal institution in 1532. The historical council of the Scottish kings can be traced back with certainty only to the reign of David I (1124-53); although there are some faint indications that it was already in being under his predecessor Alexander (1107-24). The technical term curia regis does not appear before the time of William the Lion (1165-1214), while the word parliament first occurs in the records in 1293, although in a context which suggests that both the expression and the institution were already familiar. The assemblies of this period were, however, purely feudal in character. In the appeal to Edward I of England to adjudge the crown, and in the Treaty of Brightham of 1290, the "community" is mentioned as having a voice in the affairs of the nation; but this cannot be accepted as proof of the existence of any form of popular representation. The parliament held by Robert Bruce at Cambuskenneth in 1326 is traditionally regarded as the first in which the representatives of the third state had a place. It is not clear, however, that burgesses actually sat in that year, although a body of burgh commissioners took part in a national financial agreement made while parliament was in session. It was more probably under David II (1329-71), when the technical term "the three estates" first occurs, that the principle of burgh representation was admitted. By 1424 the third estate had become an essential element in all parliaments, and in all full assemblies of the great council of the realm. But since the burgesses had an assembly of their own in the Convention of Royal Burghs, which developed in the fifteenth century from the court of the Four Burghs of Edinburgh, Stirling, Berwick, and Roxburgh, and which had sovereign authority in all burghal disputes and questions, they were disposed to shirk parliamentary attendance. The number of commissioners to be sent by each burgh remained undetermined throughout the Middle Ages, and was eventually fixed by the convention in 1619 at one only, an exception being made in the case of Edinburgh, which was required to send two representatives. In theory all tenants-in-chief of the Crown were bound to attend the meetings of parliament, but in practice it became increasingly difficult to secure their presence. James I, therefore, in a statute of 1428, drew a distinction between the greater barons, who were to be individually summoned as hereditary Lords of Parliament, and the lesser tenants-in-chief, who were to be exempt from attendance on condition of electing two commissaries in each shire to represent them. This statute never became fully operative, but the principle was re-enforced by the County

Franchise Act of 1587, which established a representative system in the shires and conferred the franchise on all tenants-in-chief holding land to the annual value of forty shillings. In spite of this measure, however, there was no regular attendance of the commissaries of the shires in parliament until late in the reign of James VI. The county franchise was widened by statute in 1661 and again in 1681. The commissaries and the members for the burghs were paid for their attendance. An act of 1641 fixed their pay at £5 Scots per day during their attendance and their journey to and fro.

All the work of the Scottish parliament was done by permanent commissions and committees, the practice of debating in full parliament being unknown. When the estates met they elected a committee composed of members from each of the three divisions. To this committee the work of discussing and maturing the measures to be passed was handed over. The estates did not sit while the committee was at work. When the bills were ready they met and passed them. This committee was called the Lords of the Articles. An early form of this practice of delegation is found in the reign of David II (1367), when it was adopted to enable the members to go home to get in the harvest. By the reign of James III (1460-88) it had become established as a regular part of parliamentary procedure. There was no fixed rule for choosing the Lords of the Articles, either as regarded their number or the mode of their election. This uncertainty led to a struggle between the estates and Charles I. The Lords of the Articles then numbered thirty-two, and an attempt was made to rob the majority in the estates of its power against the Crown by adroit management in their election. Eight bishops were first elected; they in their turn chose eight barons, and barons and bishops together chose eight commissaries and eight burgesses. Thus the whole committee were picked partisans of the bishops, who were themselves entirely amenable to the royal will. The estates protested, each division claiming in 1639 the right to elect its own delegates. This matter of the election of the Lords of the Articles was again fought over in 1689. The parliament which had put William on the throne demanded the right of discussing measures in plain parliament, after the English fashion. The king at first refused to agree to this, and offered to increase the number of the Lords of the Articles to thirty-three, and to leave the estates perfect freedom of choice; but the estates were firm in their demands. William yielded, and an act of 1690 finally abolished the Lords of the Articles.

The estates were formerly the highest court of justice in Scotland. They possessed and exercised jurisdiction in both criminal and civil cases, and professed to give "remed of law" in cases of appeal against the justiciars and sheriffs. To manage this judicial business a committee, called the Lords Auditors of Complaints, was appointed from 1341 onwards, but its powers lasted only while parliament was sitting, and it proved incapable of dealing with the vast number of cases which came before it. Under James I, therefore, a court (later known as "the Sessions"), comprising the chancellor and selected members of the three estates, was appointed to supplement the work of the auditors; but its functions were transferred, before the end of the century, to the Lords of the Council. The inconveniences arising from the fact that the council followed the king, combined with the old problem of congestion of business, soon, however, necessitated further reform; and in 1504 a "daily council" was established to sit continuously at Edinburgh, or in some other fixed place. Finally, in 1532 a permanent and professional Court of Sessions was established by parliamentary authority, to exercise its judicial functions in all civil actions.

The history of the Scottish parliament ends with the Act of Union of 1707, which provided for the representation of Scotland in the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain. The influence it exercised on the national fortunes was at no time comparable to that exerted by the English parliament. The representative system on which it was based was narrow and defective, while the practice of delegation of functions made it peculiarly susceptible to royal control. It has been well said that "the thoughts and deeds which give its nobility and its greatness to Scottish history must be sought elsewhere" than in the annals of its parliamentary institutions.

Ethandun, THE BATTLE OF (878), was the great victory of Alfred over the Danes after his retirement to Athelney. This led immediately to the treaty with Guthrum at Chippenham. [ALFRED.] Ethandun is usually identified with Edington, near Westbury, Wilts.

Ethelbald (ÆTHELBALD), KING OF MERCA (716-57), was descended from one of the brothers of Penda. He was persecuted by Ceolred, and took refuge in the marshes of the fenland. On the death of Ceolred, he was chosen king, though not perhaps without opposition. His reign was distinguished by several contests with the Welsh. Though he failed to subdue Northumbria, he reduced Wessex, under Ethelheard and Cuthred, to vassalage, and assumed the title of "Rex Britannie," with the overlordship of all England south of the Humber. His later years saw, however, a reversal of his fortunes. He was defeated by Cuthred of Wessex at Burford, in 752, and again, in 757, at Seckington, where he is supposed to have been slain by his own bodyguard.

Ethelbald (ÆTHELBALD), KING OF THE WEST SAXONS (858-60), succeeded his father, Ethelwulf, against whom he had successfully rebelled in 856. Ethelwulf made over Wessex to him, but retained until his death Kent, Sussex, and Essex, and a general suzerainty. Ethelbald's marriage with his stepmother, Judith, is the solitary fact we know about him with certainty, as there is a gap in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" at this period.

Ethelbert (ÆTHELBERHT), KING OF THE WEST SAXONS (860-6), succeeded his brother Ethelbald. He had already ruled for some years as sub-king of Kent and Essex. The "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" tells us that "he held the kingdom in good order and great tranquillity." Most of his reign was occupied in repelling the incursions of the Danes, who in 860 were strong enough and bold enough to attack Winchester, the royal city of the West Saxon kings. In 865 the invaders wintered in Thanet, and Kent suffered heavily from their inroads.

Ethelbert (ÆTHELBERHT), KING OF KENT (560?-616), ranks as the third Bretwalda, succeeding in that dignity to Ceawlin of Wessex. At first he appears to have been subject to his more powerful neighbour, by whom he was defeated at Wibbandun (? Wimbledon) in 568. In 591, however, Ceawlin was overthrown at Woddesbeorge (? Wanborough in Wilts), and his imperium passed to his adversary, the King of Kent, who became suzerain of all the Teutonic states of Britain save Northumbria. Ethelbert's marriage with Bertha, daughter of Charibert, King of Paris, is a most significant event in his reign, as it led indirectly to the coming of St. Augustine and the conversion of Ethelbert to Christianity (597). The earliest code of Anglo-Saxon laws bears the name of Ethelbert of Kent.

Ethelfleda (ÆTHELFLED) (d. 917) was a daughter of King Alfred. She was married to the ealdorman Ethelred, and, together with her husband, ruled over Mercia. She was of great assistance to her brother Edward in recovering north-eastern Mercia from the Danes, and joined him in rebuilding Chester and other ancient towns that had fallen into decay, and in establishing a system of "burhs" or fortified centres for the defence of the conquered territory. In 915 her troops defeated the Welsh at Brecon. Her husband died in 910, and she left only a daughter, Eilfwyn (Ælfwyn), whom Edward deprived of the government of Mercia, and immured in a nunnery. Ethelfleda's title of "The Lady of the Mercians" is expressive of the power she possessed, and of the relations in which she stood to Edward. Her position is unique among Anglo-Saxon princesses, and suggests that she was a woman of strong personality, and of exceptional capability.

Ethelfrith (ÆTHELFRITH), KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (593-617), was the son and successor of Ethelric. He married a daughter of Ella of Deira, and incorporated that state with his own kingdom of Bernicia, having driven Edwin (q.v.), the infant son of Ella, into exile. He was a far-sighted and successful king. He defeated the Scots at Deegsastan (Dawstone) in 603, and the Britons, and captured the city of Chester (613). Bæda tells us that he destroyed the monastery of Bangor Yscoed, and put all the monks to death, asserting that as they prayed for his defeat, they were, though unarmed, fighting against him. Ethelfrith, having learnt that his brother-in-law, Edwin, had taken refuge with Redwald of East Anglia, demanded that he should be given up; and on his request being refused, war ensued, in the course of which Ethelfrith was defeated and slain at the battle of the Idle.

Ethelheard (ÆTHELHEARD), KING OF WESSEX (726-40), succeeded his brother-in-law, Ine. He was descended from Cerdic, but belonged probably to a distant branch of the royal house. His election was opposed by the Atheling Oswald, but unsuccessfully. His reign was an unfortunate one; the British recovered something of what they had lost, and the Mercians captured Somerton (733), (perhaps the Somerton in Somerset), and probably also the land of the Chilternsetas; and Wessex was obliged for some years to own the Mercian overlordship.

Ethelhun (ÆTHELHUN), called the "Proud Ealdorman," rebelled against Cuthred of Wessex in 750, but was defeated, and pardoned. In 752 it was chiefly owing to his bravery that the West Saxons won the battle of Burford.

Ethelnoth (ÆTHELNOTH), Archbishop of Canterbury (1020-38), had been one of the chaplains of Canute, and was one of that king's chief advisers. It is to him that we must attribute much of Canute's civil and ecclesiastical policy. He was a man of large views, and being himself a secular, did much to improve the position of the secular clergy. During Canute's absence from England he was one of the regents of the kingdom, and to him the king addressed his famous letter describing his visit to Rome. On Canute's death, in 1035, Ethelnoth refused to crown Harold, and prohibited any of the bishops doing so.

Ethelred (ÆTHELRED) I, KING OF THE WEST SAXONS (866-71), was the son of Ethelwulf, and succeeded on the death of his brother Ethelbert. His reign is important for his great struggle with the Danes. At first the invading host attacked the tributary provinces. In 866 they descended on East Anglia. Northumbria, disputed between rival kings, fell an easy prey in the next year, and York passed permanently into Danish hands. The invaders next turned upon Mercia (868). The West

Saxon monarch, hastening to the relief of his vassal, Burhred, was unable to dislodge the invaders from Nottingham, which they had seized; but early next year they withdrew to harry the north once more. In 870 East Anglia was completely conquered, and its king, Edmund, put to death. In 871 the Danes attacked Wessex, the last stronghold of the English. They made Reading their headquarters. Thence they sallied forth, and no fewer than nine pitched battles ("folk-fights"), besides numerous smaller engagements, were fought between the Danes, led by Bægsceg and Hælfdene, and the English, under Ethelred and his brother Alfred. The most important of these fights took place at Ashdown (q.v.), where the English were completely victorious; but in many of the other battles the Danes got the upper hand. In the midst of the struggle Ethelred died, probably of wounds sustained at Marton (or Marden). He was succeeded by his brother Alfred. [ALFRED; DANES.]

Ethelred (ÆTHELRED) II, KING (978-1016), commonly called the "Redeless," the son of Edgar by Elfrida, was born in the year 968, and succeeded on the murder of his half-brother Edward. During the early part of his reign the government was in the hands of his mother and her party. Dunstan crowned the young king, but appears to have spent most of the remaining years of his life in retirement. We read of incursions of the Danes from the very commencement of the reign, but it was not till after the death of Dunstan, in 988, that attempts at settlement were made. In 991 East Anglia was attacked by a fleet under Olaf Tryggvason, and the great battle of Maldon (q.v.) fought, in which the brave ealdorman Brihtnoth was slain. In this year too, by the advice of Archbishop Sigeric, the fatal plan of buying off the invaders was adopted. In addition to foreign enemies, Ethelred had to contend against treason at home, his two favourites, Elfric, ealdorman of Mercia, and Edric Streona, frequently betraying his plans to the Danes. After repeated raids on England, Olaf of Norway, who had now joined forces with Sweyn of Denmark, was again bought off in 994. A short interval of peace followed, but in 997 the Danes resumed their attack. Devon and Cornwall were ravaged in that year; in 998 Dorset and Hampshire, and in 999 Kent, were harried. During a further brief interlude in 1000 Ethelred led an army into Cumberland, doubtless to punish the Irish and Scandinavian settlers there for assistance given to the invaders. The resumption of the Danish raids found the English no better prepared than before. In 1002 £24,000 are said to have been paid in danegeld. The year is one of great importance in English history. In the first place it saw the marriage of Ethelred to Emma, sister of the Norman duke, and the beginning of that association of Normandy with England that culminated in the Conquest of 1066-72. In the second place it saw the disastrous massacre of St. Brice's Day—an attempt to safeguard the king by exterminating the Danish mercenaries—which, so far from achieving its purpose, merely led to a renewed invasion in force under Sweyn. He captured Exeter and Salisbury in 1003, and in 1004 attacked East Anglia, where for the first time he met with effective resistance. In 1006 "the great fleet came to Sandwich, and did all as they were wont; they ravaged and burned and destroyed wherever they went." Once more they were bribed to leave England. In 1008 Ethelred got together a fleet to oppose the Danes, but quarrels among the commanders and a great storm ruined this project, and the last chance against the invaders was gone. In 1009 London was ineffectually attacked, and in the next few years the Danes carried their ravages far and wide from their base in Kent, until "at length there was no head man who would assemble forces, but each fled as he best might; nor at the last would even one shire help another." In 1012 Archbishop Alfheah, who had been captured in the previous year, was martyred at Greenwich. In 1013 Sweyn made another great attack on England. The north at once submitted to him, and by the end of the year he was master of the whole country, and was acknowledged king, and Ethelred fled, with his wife and children, to his brother-in-law's court in Normandy. But Sweyn's death, in February 1014, enabled Ethelred to return. With the aid of his son Edmund he drove out Canute, who had been chosen king by the Danish portion of the inhabitants. But Canute returned in 1015, and ravaged Wessex; next year he passed into Mercia and Northumbria, which submitted to him. While he was preparing for the final conquest of Wessex, Ethelred died (April 23, 1016). Of Ethelred the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" says, "he held his kingdom with great toil and great difficulties the while that his life lasted." A modern historian has said that Ethelred rendered his greatest service to his people in dying; but even his death came too late to save the crown of England for his house.

Ethelred (ÆTHELRED), KING OF MERCIA (675-704), was the son of Penda and brother of Wulfhere, whom he succeeded. He married Osthryth, sister of Aldfrid of Northumbria. He defeated Lothere of Kent in 676, and ravaged the whole of that kingdom. After a great battle fought on the Trent in 679, he compelled Egfrid of Northumbria to restore the province of Lindsey to Mercia. He resigned the crown in 704 in favour of his nephew, Cenred, and became a monk in the abbey of Bardney, where he died some years later.

Ethelred (ÆTHELRED), KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (774-9 and 790-6), was the son of Ethelwald Moll, and a man of notoriously evil life. In the fifth year of his reign he was compelled to abdicate and fly the country, but the death of his supplanter Elfwald and the bad government of Osred, his successor, afforded an opportunity for his return. He attempted to strengthen himself by the murder of Elfwald's infant sons, and of his rival Osred, whom he captured in 792, but in the sequel was himself assassinated by some of his thegns.

Ethelwald (ÆTHELWALD) Moll, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (759-65), succeeded after the murder of Oswulf. His parentage is unknown, but very probably he was one of the thegns who assassinated Oswulf. Civil war distracted his reign, and he was eventually deposed and compelled to retire to a monastery.

Ethelwald (ÆTHELWALD) was the son of Ethelred I, and had been set aside as a minor in 871 in favour of Alfred. On Alfred's death he rebelled against Edward the Elder, and seized Wimborne and Twyneham; but on the approach of Edward he fled to the Danes in Northumbria and was received by them as king. In 901 he subdued Essex, and persuaded the East Anglian Danes to invade Mercia, but in 902 he was slain in a skirmish.

Ethelwulf (ÆTHELWULF), KING OF THE WEST SAXONS (839-58), was the son of Egbert, whom he succeeded. His reign was occupied in great measure in repelling the incursions of the Danes, by whom he was defeated in 842 at Charmouth, and who, in 851, captured Canterbury and London, and drove out the Mercian king. Ethelwulf marched against them, and routed them at Aclea (? Oakley, near Basingstoke); and in 853 he assisted Burhred, King of Mercia, against the North Welsh, "and made them all obedient to him." In 855 the Danes, for the first time, wintered in England, and in this year Ethelwulf made a pilgrimage to Rome, whither he had already sent his youngest son, Alfred, two years previously. On his way home he married Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, King of the West Franks, and grandson of Charlemagne. During his absence, Asser tells us, his eldest son, Ethelbald, conspired against him, and Ethelwulf, on his return, to avoid a civil war, gave up Wessex to him, retaining Kent, Sussex, and Essex, and a general suzerainty over the rest of his dominions for himself. Ethelwulf is best known for his famous "Donation," which is often erroneously said to have originated the system of tithes (q.v.). In reality, it was merely the tenth part of his private estate that was concerned. Apparently he booked the land to various subjects, lay or ecclesiastical, on the understanding that it should be applied to religious purposes.

Eustace (d. 1153), the second son of King Stephen, was heir-apparent to his father by the death of his elder brother, Baldwin. Stephen was extremely anxious that Eustace should be crowned king in his lifetime, thus ensuring the succession to him, but this the pope refused to allow, on the ground that no innovation was permissible while the crown of England was in dispute. Eustace died in 1153, and thus the way was open for the compromise between Stephen and Henry II, which was effected by the Treaty of Wallingford (q.v.). Eustace married Constance, sister of Louis VII of France, but left no children.

Eutaw Springs, THE BATTLE OF (September 8, 1781), was the last serious engagement in the American War of Independence. On the departure of Lord Rawdon for England, Colonel Stewart had succeeded to the command at Charleston. Greene was too strong and too unembarrassed to remain any longer quiet, and he descended from the Santee Hills, with the intention of driving the British into Charleston, and there blockading them. Stewart met him at the Eutaw Springs. At first the British were repulsed along the whole line, but they finally drove the Americans from their positions, and remained masters of the field. Their loss, however, was 700 men, and Stewart was too much weakened to reap any results from his victory. He was compelled to fall back to Charleston Neck, and to look on while Greene overran South Carolina and Georgia.

Evelyn, JOHN (1620-1706), the diarist, served in several official positions during the reign of Charles II. He was one of the council for the management of the plantations (1671), and a member of the board of trade, and in 1695 he became treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. He wrote several works on horticulture, architecture, and general literature. His "Diary," together with his letters, was first printed in 1818, and has been frequently republished. Evelyn's memoirs are of great value for their sketches of persons and society during the latter half of the seventeenth century.

Evesham, THE BATTLE OF (1265), was fought during the Barons' War between Prince Edward and Simon de Montfort. The quarrel with the de Clares and the escape of Prince Edward had arrayed a formidable band of enemies against de Montfort. The royalists were in the Welsh Marches, whither Simon set out against them; but by the capture of Gloucester they cut off his retreat, and having routed the younger Simon at Kenilworth on August 1, Edward marched to Evesham, where de Montfort was waiting for his son. The earl was taken by surprise, and on the morning of August 4 woke to find the town surrounded by the royalist forces. He at once perceived that he had been completely out-generalled. "God have mercy on our souls," he cried, "for our bodies are the lord Edward's!" In vain he attempted to force his way through to Kenilworth, and at length all he could do was to draw his troops round him in a compact ring, and await the attack of the royalists. His son Henry fell at his feet, and at last the earl himself rushed into the thickest of the fight, and was hewn down. With him died also his companion Peter Montfort, the baronial justiciar Hugh Despenser, and many other men of mark. The royalists refused quarter, and terrible havoc was made of the baronial forces. "Such was the murder of Evesham," exclaims Robert of Gloucester, "for battle none it was!" The royalists had distinguished themselves by red crosses on their arms, and the few who fell in action owed their death to neglect of this precaution, being killed by their own comrades in mistake.

Exchequer was the name of the court in which, after the Conquest, the financial business of the country was transacted. The name arose from the chequered cloth, like a chess-board, which covered the table of the court. The chequers were probably useful in counting money, for which purpose counters were used as late as the reign of Edward II. The organization of the court dates from Henry I, and it seems to have been originally merely a specialized financial committee of the Great Council. Its principal officers were the great officers of the state and household, with certain others, councillors or judges, appointed by the king, who were called Barons of the Exchequer (Barones Scaccarii). The court was generally held at Westminster, but was not fixed there in the twelfth century. Henry II restored the court, and a full account of it as it existed in his reign is contained in the work called "Dialogus de Scaccario" (q.v.). By the thirteenth century the sheriffs made half-yearly payments (the profer) at Easter and Michaelmas, and had their accounts audited once a year. These accounts were rendered in two divisions: the visus compoti, or statement; and the summa, or balance, with vouchers. At a later date there was a third stage known as the final view, when arrears were cleared off. All the revenue from the ferm or rent of the counties, the danegeld, pleas of the Crown, aids, and other feudal dues, were thus brought into the Exchequer. The accounts with the sheriffs were kept by tallies, or pieces of wood inscribed and notched. These were divided down the middle, and one half was kept by the sheriff and the other by the court. Payment of the ferm of the counties was made in money instead of in kind by the reign of Henry II. Besides the receipt of revenue, the business of the Exchequer included jurisdiction in cases which affected the revenue; it recorded agreements, charters, and feoffments; and it sometimes seems to have acted as a political council of state, especially in matters of foreign treaties. When the office of justiciar became extinct, the place of president at the Exchequer Board, which formerly belonged to the justiciar, was taken by the treasurer. By 4 & 5 Will. IV, c. 15, the whole position of the Exchequer as regards the receipt of revenue was changed. For this purpose its organization consists of a board, at the head of which is an officer called the comptroller-general. All revenue is paid into the Bank of England to his account, and all payments made by the Exchequer are made in virtue of warrants from the treasury.

The Exchequer must also be considered with reference to jurisdiction. No small part of its judicial business was lost by the separation of the Court of Common Pleas from the King's Bench (Magna Carta, art. 17). It still retained jurisdiction in revenue cases, and in the pleas of all who were in any way connected with the court. Special leave was also given to implead in the Exchequer as an indulgence. Like the other courts, the Exchequer drew business to itself wherever it was possible. This usurpation of jurisdiction was made a subject of complaint, and by the Articuli super cartas (28 Ed. I, c. 4) it was provided that no common pleas except those of privileged persons should be heard in that court. From the reign of Edward II a regular series of chief barons begins. With this separate organization, however, the usurpation by the Exchequer of jurisdiction properly belonging to other courts continued. It drew jurisdiction to itself by means of a writ of quo minus, in which it was suggested that the plaintiff was indebted to the Crown, and needed payment from the defendant to enable him to pay the king. Courts of Exchequer were set up in Scotland and in Ireland, when those countries were united to England as regards legislation. The fiction of the writ of quo minus was abolished by 2 Will. IV, c. 39—the Uniformity of Process Act—and a proper jurisdiction was given to the Exchequer. An equitable jurisdiction also pertained to this court, which was extended by the same means as those used in its common-law side. While, however, the barons were the judges on the common-law side, the treasurer and chancellor of the Exchequer presided in equity cases. The appointment of the chancellor dates from the reign of Edward II. In his oath of office he bound himself to use the seal of the Exchequer for no writs of other courts while the Chancery was within twenty miles. The last case in which the chancellor exercised judicial functions was in 1735. The equity business of the Exchequer was transferred to the Court of Chancery by 5 Vict. c. 5. The Court of Exchequer has now become, by the act of 1873, the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice. The chancellor of the Exchequer has now no judicial functions, and is the member of the cabinet who is at the head of the financial administration and acts as minister of finance.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber was erected as a statutory court by 31 Ed. III, c. 12, to decide cases on writs of error from the common-law side of the Exchequer. Its judges were the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, and the justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas. This court was reorganized by 27 Eliz., c. 8, which may indeed be more properly said to have created a new court, having jurisdiction in appeal from the King's Bench. By 1 Will. IV, c. 70, a new court was erected, for the judgments of each common-law court were made subject to revision by the judges of the other two courts sitting in the Exchequer chamber. The appellate jurisdiction of this court was transferred to the new Court of Appeal, founded by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, s. 18).

Excise, THE, is generally defined as a duty charged before their sale on goods which are manufactured and consumed at home (as distinct from customs-duties levied at the ports upon imported goods); but it is sometimes used of any tax laid upon the retail trade. It is generally supposed that this tax was first levied in England by the Parliamentary party in the time of the Civil War. It was not until July 22, 1643, when an excise was imposed in imitation of the Dutch, by an ordinance of both Houses, and afterwards by the king's rival convention at Oxford, that it became a recognized source of revenue. The first articles levied upon were ale and beer, salt, alum, saffron, starch, silks, and other items of food and clothing. Feeling was strongly aroused against the innovation; particularly in 1647. But under the Commonwealth it was treated as an ordinary source of annual revenue. After the Restoration half the produce of the excise was assigned to the Crown in compensation for the surrender of the revenues derived from feudal tenure, whereby the burdens of the rich were transferred to the whole nation. James II obtained from his first parliament extra excise and custom duties, valued at £900,000 a year, but only £300,000 of this, taken from the excise, was granted to William and Mary, although the revenue granted to Charles II was continued. At the same time parliament declared the excise to be "the most easy and indifferent levy that could be laid upon the people." This view was not shared by the nation at large, and in 1693-4 a struggle was waged in parliament between Sir Edward Seymour and Sir John Lowther on the question of the excise on salt, leather, and soap. The excise long continued to be a most obnoxious tax, the popular prejudices, caused partly by the practice of letting out the duties in farm, and partly by the obscurity of the statutes bearing on the subject, being even entertained by men like Blackstone and Dr. Johnson. Sir Robert Walpole, in 1733, found these prejudices fatal to his Excise Scheme (for which see Lord Morley's life of Walpole, 1888). He wished to conciliate the country gentlemen by diminishing the land-tax to one shilling, and for that purpose imposed a duty on salt. When the new tax was found to fall short by two-thirds of the required amount, he proposed—not indeed, as had been reported, a general system of excise—but the substitution of excise duties for customs duties on wine and tobacco. By this means smuggling would be lessened, while by a system of warehousing without tax for re-exportation, London would become a free port. The opposition, however, raised a most violent outcry against the measure, and the general dislike to it was so great that it was thought an attempt to enforce it would have been met by armed resistance in some localities, the ministerial party dwindled rapidly away, and Walpole was compelled to withdraw the bill based upon his resolution. The excise was defended as making the poor man contribute to the cost of a benefit which he shared, and as distributing the burden of taxation equally. It was denounced by its opponents as an infamous tax on the necessities of life of the poor. Subsequent ministries increased the amount of the excise duties, partly to decrease drunkenness (for instance, in 1746 a tax of 20s. a gallon was laid on spirits, and in consequence smuggling increased a hundredfold), and levied them on a large number of commodities. This was especially the case during the great struggle with Napoleon, when the excise included taxes on nearly every conceivable article of home manufacture and consumption—licences to permit persons to carry on certain trades or to shoot game; post-horse duties, duties on sales by auction, and other imposts. A great many of these duties have, however, since been abolished, and others have been transferred to the customs. The excise is now almost confined to British spirits and malt liquors. The management of the excise has also been simplified, notably in 1823, when the separate boards for the three kingdoms were abolished, and in 1848, when the board left Gresham House and was merged with those of stamps and taxes into the Inland Revenue Board at Somerset House.

Exclusion Bill, THE, was first brought into the House of Commons in May 1679. It disabled the Duke of York, as a papist, from succeeding to the crown, should he outlive his brother, and proposed that the crown should descend to the heirs of the Duke of York on Charles's demise, in the same manner as if the duke was himself dead. It met with considerable opposition in the Commons, but eventually passed by 207 votes to 128, upon which Charles dissolved parliament. He was, however, soon obliged to summon it again (October 1680), and the Exclusion Bill was again passed by the Commons; but the Lords, chiefly through the influence of Halifax, rejected it by 63 to 30 (November). In January 1681 the Commons voted that no supplies should be granted till the Exclusion Bill was passed, and refused to entertain Halifax's proposal, by which James was to rule only in name, a regent being appointed on his accession to the crown. Again the parliament was dissolved (January 16, 1681), but not before the Commons had voted that the opponents of the Exclusion Bill were traitors bought with French money. In the parliament which met at Oxford in March 1681 the Commons insisted on the passing of the Exclusion Bill. But this parliament was in like manner dissolved, and Charles summoned no more parliaments during his reign, and consequently, the Exclusion Bill fell through. A great deal of opposition to the measure arose from the fear that Shaftesbury and others were desirous of making Monmouth king.

Exeter was probably a hill-fort of the Celtic inhabitants of Damnonia. Its ancient name Caer Wisc became Isca, or Isca Damnoniorum in Latin, and Exanceaster in Anglo-Saxon. Conquered by the English at an uncertain date, the city was strongly fortified by Athelstan. It was several times besieged by the Danes in the reigns of Alfred and Ethelred II, and captured by Sweyn, owing to the treason of its governor, Hugh the French, in 1003. It was created an episcopal see by Edward the Confessor in 1046. In 1067 Exeter was besieged and captured by William the Conqueror. Baldwin de Redvers held it for Matilda in 1136. In September 1497 it was unsuccessfully besieged by Perkin Warbeck, and in 1549 it successfully stood a great siege against the western insurgents. Throughout the Civil War, Exeter was for the most part Royalist. It was captured by Prince Maurice in 1643, and remained in the hands of the king's adherents till nearly the close of the war, when it was retaken by Fairfax (1646). It was the first important place in England reached by William of Orange, who entered the city November 9, 1688. The cathedral, which was commenced by Bishop William of Warlewast in 1112, or perhaps earlier, was not completed till late in the fifteenth century.

Exeter, PEERAGE OF. In early times the Earls of Devon were sometimes styled Earls of Exeter. The first distinct peerage deriving its name from the city was the dukedom of Exeter, conferred, 1397, upon John Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, third son of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent (son-in-law of Edmund Plantagenet, Earl of Kent), in 1399; however, the duke was degraded, and his honours became forfeit. In 1416 Thomas Beaufort, youngest son of John of Gaunt, was created Duke of Exeter for his life. Afterwards, in 1444, John Holland, son of the 1st duke, was created duke, having been restored in blood and honours twenty-seven years earlier. The dukedom, however, again became forfeit on the attainder of his son Henry, 1461. In 1525 Henry Courtenay, Earl of Devon, was made Marquis of Exeter, but was attainted in 1539. His son Edward was restored in blood but not to the marquissate of Exeter. In 1605 Thomas Cecil, 2nd Baron Burghley, was created Earl of Exeter, and the honour still remains in his family, Henry Cecil, 10th earl, having been advanced to a Marquissate of the same style in 1801. Exhibitions in England. (1) The first modern exhibition was held in London in 1756 by the Society of Arts, and renewed in 1761. It was followed by a series of minor exhibitions.

(2) The first exhibition on an international scale was the Great Exhibition of 1851, the idea of which was developed by Whislaw, the secretary of the Society of Arts, and energetically taken up by the Prince Consort, under whose auspices a Royal Commission was issued in January 1850. The Great Exhibition was opened by Queen Victoria in Hyde Park on May 1, 1851. It attained a success beyond all expectation, and remained open until October 15. The buildings of glass and iron were subsequently removed to form the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Other international exhibitions in different parts of the world followed during the next few years, including one at Dublin in 1853. A second international exhibition was held in London in 1862 (May–November) after being postponed for two years on account of the War of Italian Liberation.

(3) Smaller and less comprehensive exhibitions soon began to multiply. A series was held at South Kensington until 1874, and again from 1883 till 1886. Exhibitions were held at Newcastle in 1881, Perth in 1882, the Crystal Palace (International) and Edinburgh in 1884, at Edinburgh again in 1886 (International), Newcastle and Manchester (International) in 1887, Glasgow (International) in 1888, the Crystal Palace (Mining) in 1890, Chelsea (Military and Naval) in 1891–2, the Crystal Palace (Electrical) and Liverpool (Naval) in 1893, Glasgow (International) in 1901, and Dublin in 1907. Meanwhile the annual exhibitions had begun at Earl's Court (1887–91); they were renewed in 1895. A Franco-British Exhibition was held in London in 1908, and an Anglo-Latin Exhibition in 1912.

(4) Since the Great War several important exhibitions have taken place in Europe; notably those at Strasburg (1919) and Rio de Janeiro (1922), and the colonial exhibitions of France (1922) and Great Britain (1924–5). The British Empire Exhibition at Wembley (April 23–November 1, 1924, and May 9–October 31, 1925) was held with a view to fostering inter-imperial trade and understanding, and developing empire raw material.

Exton, SIR PIERS, is supposed to have been a relative of Sir Nicholas Exton, who was lord mayor of London in 1386 and 1387. Exton is said to have murdered Richard II in Pontefract Castle, but the whole circumstances of Richard's death are too obscure to allow us to charge him with the crime with any degree of confidence.

Extradition is the surrender of fugitives from justice by one state to another. No systematic usage in this matter prevailed until the present century. Perhaps the only early treaty containing a provision as to extradition was that of 1174, between William of Scotland and Henry II, wherein it was agreed that persons guilty of felony in England taking refuge in Scotland should be given up, and vice versa. But the other mediæval treaties usually quoted—e.g., the "Intercursus Magnus" with Burgundy in 1494—appear to have contained nothing more than general promises not to harbour rebels. The question of extradition seems to have been first investigated by Grotius and the jurists of the seventeenth century, who laid down the principle that states were bound, either by the law of nations or by reasons of "comity," to give up fugitive criminals; but the earliest distinct statement of English common law was the declaration of the Court of Exchequer in 1749, that "the government may send a prisoner to answer for a crime wherever committed." Yet such dicta, though recognizing the duty of extradition, were of slight authority, and action upon them could have been prevented by an appeal for a writ of Habeas Corpus. England for the first time bound itself by treaty at the Peace of Amiens in 1802, in which it was agreed with France that fugitives charged with forgery, fraudulent bankruptcy, or murder should be surrendered. During the early part of the nineteenth century the law of extradition was rapidly developed in the United States, owing to the need of some arrangement between the States forming the Union and between the United States and Canada. In England, however, the history of extradition really begins with the treaties of 1842 with the United States, and of 1843 with France. In 1852 a new convention was made with France, and in this, for the first time, exception was made in the case of persons charged with political offences. Each of these treaties had been confirmed by act of parliament, the constitutional doctrine being that, though the Crown could make extradition treaties, the executive could not carry them out without statutory authority. On the other hand, "it may be regarded as certain that England will not surrender fugitives except under a treaty." The Extradition Act of 1870 (amended 1873, 1895, and 1906) empowered the executive to carry out extradition treaties made in accordance with its provisions, viz., that no fugitive should be surrendered for a political offence, nor tried for any but the crime for which he was demanded. Under this statute extradition treaties have been made with almost every European state, and with some others.

Factory Legislation. The great development of English industry towards the end of the eighteenth century, unaccompanied by any State regulation or supervision, led to gross and widespread neglect of the commonest precautions for the preservation of the health of the workers. In the last century a long series of acts was passed designed to protect the health of labourers in factories and workshops, and especially of women and children. The Health and Morals Act of 1802 (42 Geo. III, c. 73) was passed at the instance of Sir Robert Peel the elder, and attempted to protect the interests of the pauper children who were supplied in large numbers by the Poor Law authorities to the cotton-mill owners in the north. "Theoretically these boys and girls were apprenticed to their new masters; in practice they became their property, and when one millowner became insolvent his apprentices were put up for sale as part of his stock" (Heaton). It provided for the cleansing and ventilation of cotton factories; but the scandals of the apprentice system had produced the act, and it was mainly directed to limiting the hours of apprentices' work to twelve a day, the prohibition for them of night work, with some arrangements for their clothing, education, and moral well-being. The provisions of this measure were evaded. Finally, as a result of the tireless efforts of Robert Owen (q.v.), the Second Factory Act of 1819 (59 Geo. III, c. 56) was passed on the recommendation of a committee of the House of Commons, appointed in 1816. Its operation was limited to cotton-mills. By it children under nine were not to be employed at all. Between nine and sixteen, they were not to work over twelve hours a day, and night work was prohibited. In 1833 Lord Althorpe's Act (3 & 4 Will. IV, c. 103) became law. It introduced shorter hours for "children" (i.e., those between nine and thirteen), and made their education out of work hours compulsory. The provisions confined by earlier acts to cotton-mills were made more general, and a new departure was made by some provision for the welfare of "young persons" (i.e., those between thirteen and eighteen). Inspectors were appointed to see the acts carried out, as the justices had proved but inefficient executors of previous legislation. But a more general law was still wanted, and Sir Robert Peel's Factory Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 15), was passed. Lord Ashley's long and philanthropic agitation had won two victories over the government in the House of Commons in favour of a ten hours' limit to the labour of women and children. At last, Peel agreed to accept a twelve hours' limit, and the amended bill of Lord Ashley thus became law. Its provisions were that the working hours of children under thirteen should be diminished to six and a half hours per day; that the time during which they were to be under daily instruction in schools should be extended from two to two and a half hours in winter, and three hours in summer; that the labour of persons between thirteen and eighteen, and of adult women (now first brought under the Factory Acts), should be limited to twelve hours a day; that a certificate of baptism should be produced, if demanded, to prove that the child was really of the age required by the law; that the amount of the fines imposed for the violation of the law should be diminished, but that they should be inflicted for each person improperly worked, instead of for each offence, which might include several persons; and that machinery should be guarded, to prevent accident. Inspectors were appointed to carry out the act. In 1847 John Fielden, member for Oldham, introduced and carried a bill which limited the labour of young people between the ages of thirteen and eighteen to twelve hours a day, allowing two hours out of the twelve for meals; and he further proposed that the same restriction should apply to females above eighteen years of age. The principle of State regulation of the labour of women and children was thus fully recognized. The piecemeal method of English legislation rendered it now necessary for the friends of the Factory Acts to get supplemental statutes passed to include the unprotected industries. Among these were the Mining Act of 1842, which entirely prohibited female and child labour in mines. In 1845 Lord Ashley's Print-works Act was passed. In 1850 a thorough measure for supervising mines was passed (Coal and Iron Mines Act). Not till 1860 were bleaching and dye-works included in the acts; not till 1867 were all factories included in the scope of the Factory Acts Extension and Workshop Regulation Acts (30 & 31 Vict. c. 103 and 146); and even here small exceptions required subsequent legislation, and the mistake of the act of 1867 in entrusting the working to local authority had to be corrected in 1871 by its transference to government inspectors. In 1878 was passed Sir R. A. (afterwards Viscount) Cross's Factory and Workshop Act (41 Vict. c. 16), repealing, consolidating, and amending all prior acts. There was further legislation in 1891 and 1895. In 1901 an act was passed consolidating, with amendments, all previous acts.

In 1886 Sir John Lubbock's Shop Hours Act, amended 1892, limiting the hours of labour for young persons in retail shops, was passed, and a Shop Assistants (Seats) Act in 1899. Legislation covering "domestic workshops" was passed in 1891 and 1895, providing for the inspection of out-workers' homes. The regulation of laundries was made effective by an important act passed in 1907 which brought other hitherto unregulated institutions within the meaning of the Factory Acts. Subsequent legislation has paid special attention to the protection of workers in dangerous trades, and great advance has been made in regulative legislation by administrative order under statutory permission. The setting up of an International Labour Organization under the League of Nations has already influenced the factory laws in this country. An act of 1920, governing the employment of women, young persons and children, raised the minimum age for industrial employment to fourteen years. Further statutory changes are pending which will probably abolish the now unnecessary distinction between factories and workshops.

Fairfax, FERDINANDO (1584-1648), 2ND BARON (of Cameron, in the peerage of Scotland), son of Thomas Fairfax, 1st baron, of Denton, Yorkshire, married Mary, daughter of Lord Sheffield, in 1607. He represented Yorkshire in the Long Parliament, and was appointed, in September 1642, commander-in-chief of the Parliamentary forces in the northern counties. After some successes he was obliged to retreat into the West Riding before the superior forces of the Earl of Newcastle, and suffered a severe defeat at Adwalton Moor, near Bradford (June 30, 1643). With the remainder of his troops he made his way to Hull, which he successfully held against Newcastle's army, until he forced them to raise the siege (September 2-October 11, 1643). He took part in the battle of Marston Moor, and on the capture of York by the combined army (July 1644) was appointed its governor. He resigned in consequence of the Self-Denying Ordinance, and died March 14, 1648.

Fairfax, THOMAS, 3RD LORD (1612-71), son of the preceding, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and married Anne, daughter of Lord Vere (1637). He served in the royal army against the Scots, and was knighted by the king for his services. When the Civil War began he acted as his father's lieutenant in Yorkshire. On January 23, 1643, he recaptured Leeds, and on May 21 Wakefield, making on the latter occasion 1,400 prisoners. After the defeat at Adwalton Moor, at which he was present, he made his way to Hull, but during the siege joined Cromwell in Lincolnshire with his Yorkshire horse, and helped to gain the battle of Winceby (October 11, 1643). On January 29, 1644, he defeated the king's Irish troops at Nantwich, and reconquered the county of Cheshire for the Parliament. On April 10 he defeated Lord Bellasis, the governor of York, at Selby, taking 1,600 prisoners. He took part in the siege of York, and commanded the right wing of the Parliamentary horse at Marston Moor, and after the rout of that wing joined Lord Manchester's division. After the victory he was occupied in reducing the Yorkshire fortresses. These successes led the House of Commons to appoint him commander of the New Model Army (January 21, 1645). He took the field at the end of April 1645, with the intention of relieving Taunton, but was recalled from the West to besiege Oxford. On the news of the king's capture of Leicester, he raised the siege of Oxford (June 5), and overtook and defeated Charles at Naseby (June 14). Then he turned westward again, relieved Taunton, defeated Goring at Langport (July 10), and captured Bridgwater, Bristol, Tiverton, and other Royalist strongholds. With the defeat of Sir Ralph Hopton at Torrington, early in 1646 (February 16), the subjugation of the West was completed, and the surrenders of Exeter (April 9), Oxford (June 20), and Raglan (August 17) brought the first Civil War to an end. In the quarrels which took place next year between the army and Parliament, Fairfax, after labouring hard to effect a reconciliation, cast in his lot with the army, and shared the responsibility for the expulsion of the eleven members. On the outbreak of the second Civil War, Fairfax defeated the Kentish Royalists at Maidstone (June 2, 1648), and after ten weeks' siege obliged those who had taken refuge in Colchester to surrender. He seems to have been willing to approve of the trial and deposition of the king, but he refused to sit in the High Court of Justice, and on June 25, 1650, resigned his command rather than invade Scotland. During the Protectorate he took no part in public affairs. In Richard Cromwell's parliament he represented Yorkshire, and after the dissolution of that assembly was appointed by the Rump a member of the council of state (May 1659), but did not act. When Monk marched into England Fairfax raised volunteers, was joined by a large part of Lambert's forces, and occupied York. He openly declared for a free parliament, and for the restoration of the king (January 1660), thus exercising an important influence in bringing about the Restoration. His death took place in 1671. He was an able general and an honest man, but had none of the qualities of a statesman, so that, to use the phrase of Clarendon, he was throughout "overwitted" by Cromwell.

Falconberg, MARY, COUNTESS OF (1637-1712), was the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell; she was married in 1657 to Thomas Belasyse, Viscount (afterwards Earl of) Falconberg. Always attached to the Church of England, she exerted herself in favour of the Restoration. During Charles II's reign she frequently appeared at court.

Falconberg, WILLIAM NEVILLE, LORD (d. 1463). [NEVILLE.]

Falkirk was the scene of two important battles: (1) Between the Scots and the English, July 22, 1298. This was fought in the valley between the town of Falkirk and the River Carron, and resulted in a victory for the English, who were commanded by Edward I, the earl marshal, and Anthony Beck, Bishop of Durham, over a far inferior Scottish force, led by Wallace and Sir John Grahame, the latter of whom was killed. Wallace had arranged the Scottish pikemen, on whom he mainly relied, in four circular bodies, connected by archers. The front was defended by palisades, and by a morass beyond them. Behind the main body was marshalled the cavalry, to prevent retreat. Well might Wallace say, "I have brocht you to the king, hop gif ye can." The first attacks of the English, led by the earl marshal, failed through the English becoming entangled in the morass. The Bishop of Durham then attempted a flank charge, to avoid the bog, but was equally unsuccessful. A third attack by the king in person changed the fortunes of the day. The circles were broken by the English archers, and the mounted knights completed the destruction of the enemy. The Scottish army was completely shattered, and Wallace, though he escaped from the field, remained a hunted fugitive for the short remainder of his life.

(2) Between the royal troops of George II and those of the Young Pretender, the former under General Hawley and Lord George Murray (January 17, 1746). The English left and centre failed to gain the upland of Falkirk Muir, though the right wing routed the Scottish left. Neither side had strength enough to take advantage of its success. The battle resulted in the defeat of the English.

Falkland Castle, in Fifeshire, was the scene of the Duke of Rothesay's murder in 1402. In 1592 Lord Bothwell made one of his numerous attempts to seize James VI while he was in the castle.

Falkland Islands, THE (6,500 sq. m.), together with the uninhabited island of South Georgia (1,000 sq. m.) form the most southerly colony of Great Britain. The two large islands of East and West Falklands together with about two hundred others now have a population of 3,593. Sighted by John Davis in 1592, and passed by Sir Richard Hawkins two years later, they were visited in 1598 by Sebald de Wert, who called them Sebald Islands. In 1690 Strong, an English captain, named Falkland Sound. In 1764 de Bougainville, a French explorer, found the islands uninhabited and set up a colony of Acadians which was three years later bought by Spain. Meanwhile, Commodore Byron had taken possession for Great Britain and formed a settlement at Port Egmont, whence it was expelled in 1770 by the Spaniards: war was just avoided and the islands restored by Spain to Great Britain. Great Britain ignored her barren sovereignty until the formal occupation by the Republic of Buenos Ayres (1820) and the American destruction of that settlement (1831) forced England to resume occupation in 1832 in order to protect the whale fishery. In 1851 the Falkland Islands Company was granted a royal charter and bought out the 600,000 acres granted in 1845 to Mr. Lafone. In 1867 grazing leases were offered by proclamation to attract settlers, and within a year all the available land was occupied, largely by Scots shepherds. The islands were administered by naval officers until 1843, when a civil administration was instituted. They form, with the dependencies of South Georgia, South Orkney, South Sandwich, South Shetland, and Graham's Land, a Crown colony administered by a governor, assisted by an executive council of three official and one non-official members, and a legislative council of the above three officials and two unofficial members, all appointed by the Crown.

Falkland Islands, THE BATTLE OF THE (December 8, 1914), was a naval action fought in the early days of the Great War, between British and German squadrons under Admirals Sturdee and Von Spee respectively. Sturdee had been sent out on November 5 by Lord Fisher to avenge the battle of Coronel (q.v.). He fought with eight vessels; and Von Spee, unsuspectingly approaching Port Stanley, lost all his ships except the Dresden (which was subsequently sunk on March 14, 1915).

Family Compact, THE, is the name applied to various treaties between the Bourbon Kings of Spain and France during the eighteenth century. The first compact began in 1733, and being specially directed against British trade led, in 1739, to a war between Spain and Great Britain. The second compact, known also as the Treaty of Fontainebleau, was concluded in 1743, and contemplated a French declaration of war on Great Britain. The most famous compact was the third, of 1761, the object of which was to associate Spain with France in the Seven Years' War. Pitt had timely warning of the agreement, and the refusal of George III to sanction an attack on Spain led to Pitt's resignation. But when the compact became known, war was inevitable.

Famine, THE COTTON, is the name generally given to the distress among the cotton operatives in Lancashire, in 1862-4, due to the stoppage of their raw material by the blockade of Southern ports in the American War of Secession. Great efforts at relief were made: in April 1863 the gifts for this purpose, in money and kind, were estimated by the chairman of the Central Relief Committee at more than £2,000,000. By 1864 the distress had been overcome.

Famine, THE POTATO (Ireland). In 1847 a failure of the potato crop caused the superabundant cottier population of Ireland to experience severe distress, which, coming after several years of scarcity, soon became as serious as an absolute famine. Despite the repeal of the Corn Laws and the exertions of State and private benevolence, many perished, and more escaped by emigrating to America. Among the political consequences of the famine was the revolutionary movement of Smith O'Brien (q.v.) in 1848, but more important was the social and economical revolution which the famine effected. The diminution of the population from eight millions to not much more than five; the disappearance of cottier tenancy in many parts of Ireland; great changes in the ownership and cultivation of land; the introduction of the "English system" of competition and free contract; the raising in some degree of the standard of living; and the creation of a new set of grievances, while old ones were removed—all flowed from the potato famine.

Famines, INDIAN. The irregularity of the rainfall of a tropical climate, hostile invasion, plagues of locusts, storms, imperfections in the system of transport, and excessive export of grain, have been the many causes of Indian famine. A dense and poor population, whose increase is checked by no prudential restraints, and which has few manufactures as a refuge when agriculture fails, must always be liable to experience the worst forms of such scarcities. The removal of the old positive checks on population by the strong government of the English has, if anything, increased the tendency to famine, though better organization of relief has made their effects often less disastrous. But in the early years of English rule in India (notably in 1770, 1781-3, and again in 1790-2) there were severe famines. The experience of these years led to the beginning of those remedial measures, permanent irrigation works and railways, for instance, which have in recent times made famines much less terrible, although they still recur with disastrous frequency.

"Famosus Libellus" was the title of a document sent by Edward III in 1341 to all the bishops and chapters in the kingdom, containing a recapitulation of the charges which the king had brought against Archbishop Stratford.

Farm. An early form of rent, originally a food rent. "Firma was but a latinization of feorm, the Anglo-Saxon word for food." An eleventh-century manor might pay to its lord a firma unius noctis, provisions for one night's lodging for the lord. Lands held in firma in Domesday were the king's demesne lands, and these he taxed, except in a few instances, with a money equivalent of the original food rent. The word "farm" seems in the course of time to have been used more and more for a money payment of a regular kind by an intermediary between the king and the original source of revenue. Thus the firma comitatus (farm of the shire) was the machinery by which the sheriff paid to the king a composite sum, while he himself collected the individual rents either from the manors or from sub-farmers, to whom he sold part of his collecting rights. We meet the expression again when the burgesses of the various royal boroughs arrange with the king to exclude the sheriff from their mutual revenue relations and to compound themselves for tolls, profits of justice, and other dues by a fixed money rent paid to the Exchequer. If fixed in perpetuity this firma burgi (farm of the borough) became a "fee-farm," a word which was generally adopted for the rent of lands and tenements held perpetually and heritably. In early mediæval times the farming system was not only largely employed in the collection of the king's rents, but it also played an important part in the administration of his tenant's lands.

Farnham Castle, the residence of the bishops of Winchester, overlooking the town of that name in the S.W. angle of Surrey, was built by Henry de Blois, destroyed by Henry III as adulterine, but rebuilt subsequently. It was governed by Denham for Charles I, and captured by Waller in 1642, when its fortifications were finally demolished.

Fast Castle, a famous stronghold on the coast of North Berwickshire near St. Abb's Head, was besieged in 1409 by Patrick Dunbar, and was the place to which the participants in the Gowrie Conspiracy (q.v.) proposed to carry off James VI.

Fastolf, SIR JOHN (d. 1459), was an English soldier of some reputation under Henry V and in the struggles for the retention of France under Henry VI. In 1429 he was thoroughly beaten at Patay by the Maid of Orleans. In the "Paston Letters" we have copious accounts of his private life; these show him to have been hard, grasping, and litigious. It has been suggested that he was the prototype of Shakespeare's Falstaff, with whom, however, he has little in common, except it be in the resemblance between their names, and in certain details of their careers.

Fauconberg, Thomas, The Bastard of Falconbridge or Fauconberg (d. 1471), was an illegitimate son of William Neville, Lord Fauconberg (q.v.). In 1471 he landed in Kent to make a last attempt in favour of Henry VI. He got together some men, and forced an entrance into London, with the design of liberating Henry from the Tower. But when he burned Aldgate and the eastern suburbs, the citizens rose against him, and he was compelled to retire. This attempt made it necessary for Edward to put Henry to death.

Favourite, a word of ill-omen in English history, is generally used to designate a person who, having ingratiated himself with the sovereign, uses his power unworthily and for his own ends, who unduly influences his master, and who, without sharing ministerial responsibility, becomes practically the chief minister of the realm. We can hardly consider such men as Edric Streona (q.v.) in the light of favourites, and besides, the Anglo-Saxon constitution did not afford much opportunity for the favourite. The Norman kings were too wise to endanger their position by favouritism, and the same may be said of the early Plantagenets. Flambard and Falkes de Breauté (q.v.) are unworthy instruments in the hands of unscrupulous kings, and the power of such creatures is not derived from the mere favour of royalty. The real beginning of favouritism in England may be seen in the Poitevins and Savoyards who thronged to the court of Henry III, and of whom the unknown satirist of the day says:

"A paltry set of curs is troubling all the land—Drive out or let them die, that base ungodly band."

Edward II's favourite, Piers Gaveston (q.v.), is typical of the class—handsome, brave, and high-spirited, armed with all the accomplishments of the age, but arrogant, self-seeking, and utterly reckless of consequences, whether to himself or to his master. The opposition was heightened by the fact that he was a foreigner, but the same objection cannot be urged against the Despensers, who succeeded Gaveston in Edward's affections. Here the opposition was personal, and was directed also against those influences which tended to separate the king from his barons. But the displacement of the Despensers and their weak-minded master only brought on the scene a far more criminal favourite than any that had appeared before. For nearly four years England was under the rule of Roger Mortimer (q.v.), whose criminal intrigue with the queen was the chief source of his power. At the end of Edward III's reign the king fell for a time under the influence of a worthless woman, Alice Perrers (q.v.), who abused her power, not only by obtaining lands and possessions for herself, but by interfering with the course of justice. The next reign was that of a young prince who made a bold attempt to govern by ministers of his own choice; but favouritism crept in, and de Vere must fall into the same category with the Despensers, even if de la Pole does not deserve the title of favourite. Henry VI and his queen, by the power they gave to Suffolk and Somerset, alienated the nobles, and laid themselves open to the charge of favouritism, an accusation which their antagonists were only too glad to take up. The influence of such a woman as Jane Shore (q.v.) in the time of Edward IV was probably not very great, though Richard III thought it worth while to make a severe example of her. The Tudors were far too able and far too determined to desire or need the aid of favourites, and the relations of Leicester and Essex to Queen Elizabeth were rather of a personal than of a political character. James I's nature needed some friend to lean upon, and he found his favourite first in Somerset, and, subsequently, in Buckingham. Charles II was too astute to injure his position by favouritism, and the secret advisers of James II, such as Father Petre, based their influence on religious rather than on personal grounds. The Dutch followers of William III were unjustly stigmatized as favourites, a name more deservedly applied to the Duchess of Marlborough and Mrs. Masham in the next reign, or to the venal mistresses of the first two Georges. Constitutional government made favouritism impossible. Bute was stigmatized as a favourite, but George III's effort to make him supreme in the councils of the nation was mainly part of that king's persistent policy to nominate his own ministers. Favouritism may now be considered extinct, and the methods of government have become of such a character that its revival is hardly likely. [F. S. P.]

Fawkes, Guy (1570–1606), was the agent and most famous conspirator in the Gunpowder Plot. A Yorkshireman by birth, he became a Catholic, and having wasted his patrimony, served with the Spanish army in the Netherlands, whence he returned to attempt to carry out the well-known conspiracy with which his name is inseparably connected. He was executed in 1606. [GUNPOWDER PLOT.]

Fealty (Lat. fidelitas) is, as its etymology shows, a promise of fidelity, made by one man to another. As used in a technical sense in feudal law it differs from homage, in that it had no necessary connexion with the holding of land, and from allegiance, which comes to be regarded as due to the sovereign only, and was a national, not a feudal obligation. The oath of fealty was taken at the time of doing homage (although it could be exacted in many cases in which homage was not exigible), and when not taken to the king, in words something like these—"Hear you this, my lord A, that I, B, from this day forward will bear you faith of life and limb, saving my faith to the king and his heirs (i.e., saving the oath of allegiance which was taken by every subject), and the services which belong to you for the fees and tenements I hold of you, lawfully will perform to you, as they become due, to the best of my power, so help me God and the saints." On the continent generally and in palatinate jurisdictions in England, the oath of fealty would be taken absolutely without any saving clause reserving duty to the monarch as above. [FEUDALISM.]

Fearchar Fada (i.e., the Tall), a chief of the Dalriadic tribe of Cinel Loarn, is said to have endeavoured unsuccessfully to throw off the yoke of the Britons and Angles, in 678, in which year three battles were fought. In 683 he joined forces with Brude, king of the Picts, and advanced with greater success against his enemies. In 685 Egfrid of Northumbria was defeated and slain by Brude at Nechtansmere. Fearchar Fada died in 697.

Feckenham, JOHN DE (d. 1585), last abbot of Westminster, was under Henry VIII an Anglican, and Bonner's chaplain. He was imprisoned throughout the reign of Edward VI, and rewarded by Mary with the abbacy of the revived monastery of Westminster. He is described as "a man full of tender and gentle humanity," and all parties speak well of him. He attended the first parliament of Elizabeth, but was deprived and imprisoned, and though regaining partial liberty in 1574 by partial conformity, was again imprisoned till his death.

Feilding, BASIL, 2ND EARL OF DENBIGH (d. 1674), son of William Feilding, and Mary, sister of the Duke of Buckingham, was ambassador in Italy from 1634 to 1638. When the Civil War began, he took the side of the Parliament, in opposition to his father and family, and commanded a regiment at Edgehill. In June 1643 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the associated counties of Warwick, Worcester, Stafford, and Shropshire, and exercised his trust with zeal and vigour till the passing of the Self-denying Ordinance. He represented the Parliament at the Treaty of Uxbridge (1645), and in other negotiations. Though he refused to take part in the king's trial, declaring that he would "rather be torn in pieces than have any share in so infamous a business," he became a member of the first two councils of state of the Commonwealth. A zealous Presbyterian, he assisted his party in bringing about the Restoration, and exerted his influence on the side of moderation after that event. He was created Baron St. Liz in 1663.

Felony. The original meaning of this word is still obscure; but it is probably derived from the Latin fell or fel meaning gall, hence an offence which is venomous or poisonous. In its original use it applied only to those offences which involved a breach of the obligations between lord and vassal; but in later English law it came to cover all the more serious crimes which, being breaches of the king's peace, fell within the jurisdiction of his courts. The feudal conception of felony left its mark on English law in the rule that the felon's land escheated to his lord. Subsequently we find a distinction drawn between felonies and misdeameanours, though no clear definition of either word is possible. Not all crimes which involved forfeiture were felonies. Misprision of treason, for instance, ranked only as a misdeameanour. If felony is defined as a crime punishable with death, it excludes petty larceny, which was never capital, and includes piracy, which was never felony. Felony was substantially a name for the more heinous crimes, and originally all felonies were punishable by death, except petty larceny and mayhem (i.e., maiming), which came by degrees to be treated as a misdeameanour. If a crime was made a felony by statute, the use of the name implied the punishment of death, subject, however, to the rules as to benefit of clergy. Thus, broadly speaking, felony may be historically defined as the name appropriated to crimes punishable by death, misdeameanours being a name for all minor offences. Since, however, milder punishments have within the last century been substituted for death, and the Felony Act of 1870 has abolished forfeiture, the distinction between felonies and misdeameanours has become of little practical importance.

Felton, JOHN (d. 1628). A dismissed officer of the army who, partly from private wrongs, partly from fanaticism, assassinated the Duke of Buckingham in 1628, at Portsmouth. He was hanged at Tyburn on November 28.

Fenian Conspiracy, THE. The name is said to be derived from Fion or Finn MacCoul, the Fingal of Macpherson's Ossian. The Fenians formed at one time a sort of standing militia in Ireland. The Fenian "brotherhood" was formed in Ireland and the United States by John O'Mahony, to liberate Ireland from the connexion with England and establish a republic. Secret drillings in connexion with this society began to take place frequently in 1864, but the society is supposed to have been formed as early as 1858. On September 15, 1865, the Irish government of Lord Wodehouse at last became possessed of information convincing them of the treasonable character of these proceedings. In consequence, between the 16th and 30th of that month, sixty-five persons were arrested in Dublin and about twenty in Cork, while O'Donovan Rossa, who was one of the conspirators, also had his paper, the Irish People, confiscated. James Stephens, the "Head Centre," was arrested, but was enabled to make his escape. A commission had been sitting since November in Ireland to try the prisoners, and many of them, including O'Donovan Rossa, were convicted of treason felony, and sentenced to periods of penal servitude varying from five to ten years. Important discoveries of documents had also been made. In May 1866 the American Fenians made a raid into Canada, but were promptly repulsed. Late in the autumn large stores of arms were seized, and the garrison of Ireland largely increased; but no blood was shed. In 1867 the rebellion so long threatened seemed at last to be breaking out. On February 11 came an attempt to surprise Chester, and on the 12th an outbreak in Kerry. The defence of Kilmallock police barracks, however, showed the feebleness of the movement. In March followed an attack on the barracks at Tallaght; it was repulsed, and 208 prisoners were brought into Dublin. The spirit of the Fenians in Ireland was now quite broken; thus 1,000 men who held the market-place at Drogheda fled at the approach of a few policemen. In May a special commission began to sit to try the rebels, and many of them were convicted. None were, however, executed. On September 18 an attack was made on a police van at Manchester, and on December 13 followed the attempt to blow up Clerkenwell prison. In Ireland, in 1868, attacks on isolated martello towers became frequent, and the Habeas Corpus Act was again suspended till March 1, 1869. In 1870 a Fenian raid into Manitoba was driven back by the militia, and in 1871 a similar attempt was roughly put down by United States troops, General Grant having issued a proclamation against the Fenians. In January 1871 most of the Fenian convicts had been released, and were uproariously welcomed in the United States. But the organization of Irish sedition passed into different hands, and the Fenian leaders lost their influence. The French Communist general, Cluseret, who had been in the Fenian service, says, most probably with truth: "Their insurrection was foolishly planned, and still more foolishly executed."

Fenwick, SIR JOHN (1645 ?-97), was a zealous Tory member of the parliament of 1685, who became, after the Restoration, one of the most ardent Jacobite conspirators. In 1695 he joined Charnock, Porter, Barclay, and others in designs against the king, which ripened next year into the Assassination Plot (q.v.). His fellow-conspirator, Porter, informed the government of the whole intrigue, and Sir John attempted to escape to France, but was arrested near Romney Marsh. He was committed to the Tower. In order to gain time, he offered to disclose all he knew touching the Jacobite plots. His artful confession, while silent about the real Jacobite plotters, contained a great deal of evidence—mostly true, no doubt—against Marlborough, Godolphin, Russell, and Shrewsbury, who had from time to time intrigued with the court of St. Germain. Furious at the charges brought against their party, the Whigs determined to pursue the subject. Fenwick was examined by William, but refused to make any disclosures. He had heard that his wife, Lady Mary Fenwick, had succeeded in getting Goodman—the only other witness against him—out of the country, and Porter's evidence remained unsupported. But the Whigs, not to be balked of their prey, brought in a bill of attainder against him, which the Commons passed, by 189 to 156. The bill went through its first stage in the Lords without a division. After a violent struggle, the second reading was carried by 73 to 53, and the third by 68 votes to 61. On January 28, 1698, Fenwick was executed. Hallam's opinion on the act of attainder is that, "it did not, like some acts of attainder, inflict a punishment beyond the offence, but supplied the deficiency of legal evidence." Yet, allowing the substantial justice of the sentence, it is questionable whether it was not ill-advised to break from the rigid rules of law, especially for so second-rate a person as Fenwick.

Fergus, LORD OF GALLOWAY (d. 1161), was contemporary with David I of Scotland, whom he assisted with soldiers at the Battle of the Standard. In 1160 he joined the sons of Malcolm MacHeth against King Malcolm IV, but was forced to submit to the royal power. He retired to the monastery of Holyrood, and died 1161. He married Elizabeth, natural daughter of Henry I.

Fergus Mor (d. 501 ?), son of Erc, King of Irish Dalriada, is said to have crossed over at the end of the fifth century with his brothers, Loarn Mor and Angus, and founded in Argyllshire a Scottish colony, which afterwards developed into the kingdom of Dalriada (q.v.).

Ferguson, ROBERT (d. 1714), was a Scottish clergyman who obtained a living in England, but, being a Presbyterian, was expelled in 1662, and became a schoolmaster and Dissenting preacher. He was a man of bad character, and constantly involved in plots. Being a furious Whig, he was expelled from England after the failure of the Rye House Plot (q.v.). He went to Holland, instigated and took part in Monmouth's rebellion, escaped after Sedgemoor, and joined William II's expedition. Disgusted, however, at his inadequate reward, he turned Jacobite, and shared in Montgomery's Plot and the Assassination Plot (q.v.). Notwithstanding his connexion with so many conspiracies, he escaped every danger and died a natural death.

Ferozeshah, THE BATTLE OF (December 21, 1845), was fought between the Sikhs under Lall Singh and the British under Sir Hugh Gough. The Sikhs were finally put to flight. This battle was the most severe ever fought in India.

Ferrar, ROBERT, Bishop of St. David's (d. 1555), was deprived of his see by Mary, having previously been imprisoned by Northumberland (at the instance of some of his clergy who accused him of neglect of duty), and was condemned for heresy, and burnt at Carmarthen, March 30, 1555. He was a man who, with excellent intentions, was quite unable to cope with the difficulties of his position.

Ferrers, JOHN GREY, 8TH BARON (d. 1461). [GREY.]

Ferrers, GEORGE (1500 ?-79), a lawyer, dramatist, and poet of some celebrity, is remembered mainly for his connexion with a famous case of privilege of parliament. In 1542, while member for Plymouth, he was imprisoned for debt. Parliament took up his case, compelled the sheriff of London, with his officers and the creditor as well, to appear at the bar, and sent them all to prison. A remarkable trial followed, leading to Ferrers's release by virtue of his privilege. Henry VIII, in whose service Ferrers was, warmly took up his cause.

Ferrybridge, THE BATTLE OF (March 28, 1461), was fought just before the battle of Towton. The Yorkists who were at Pontefract attempted to secure the passage of the Aire at Ferrybridge; but a body of light cavalry under Lord Clifford was detached by the Lancastrians, attacked and defeated the Yorkists, and slew Lord Fitzwalter their leader. The Yorkists, however, succeeded in crossing the Aire at Castleford, three miles higher up the river, and in attempting to regain the main body of the Lancastrians at Towton, Clifford was defeated and slain.

R. B. Mowat, "Wars of the Roses," 1914.

Fethanleag, THE BATTLE OF (584), was fought between the West Saxons under Ceawlin and Cutha and the Britons. Cutha was slain, and Ceawlin, though he took many towns and countless booty, says the "Chronicle," returned in anger to his own country. The site of the battle is unknown, although both Faddiley (Cheshire) and Frethern (Gloucestershire) have been suggested. All that is clear is that a definite check was delivered to the West Saxons, and that the westward advance to which the battle of Deorham had so materially contributed was interrupted.

Feudalism (for etymology see FIEF) is in its most general sense defined as an organization of society based on land tenure. It is applied specially to the system which arose in western Europe after the dissolution of the Carolingian Empire, and also less fully to special and analogous systems which sprang up among the Germanic peoples not directly included in that empire—as England or Sweden—but where similar tendencies afterwards manifested themselves. We must distinguish feudalism in its legal, political, and even in its vaguer social aspects. Legal feudalism indicates a certain method of land tenure. Political feudalism followed when every regalian right became attached to ownership of land by a feudal tenure. The social ideal of a feudal society necessarily followed at a later stage. The main source of feudalism, both in England and on the continent, is to be found in the primitive German constitution. The settlement of the wandering nations had made that primitive personal polity a territorial one, and its essentially unprogressive character on the old lines necessitated a new system to meet the varying needs of a progressive society. Contact with dying Imperialism precipitated but did not create this process out of which feudalism sprang. In the Frankish Empire Charles the Great bound together the national German state of the Franks, the traditions of Roman law and empire, and his own gift of a powerful administrative system. Under his feeble descendants this system broke down. After the anarchy which this process occasioned, the organized anarchy of feudalism arose, from the beneficiary system, the practice of commendation, and the grants of immunity which were superadded to them. The king was in the habit of granting lands out of his own vast estates to followers on the special promise of fidelity, and lesser proprietors in full sovereignty surrendered their nominal alod to a great church or noble, to receive it back as a tenant protected by a powerful patron. These lands were the beneficia, the territorial source of feudalism, and the condition on which they were very commonly held was military service. Commendation was personal, and consisted in a man submitting himself to a lord, whose vassal and man [HOMAGE; VASSALAGE] he became. "The union of the beneficiary tie with that of commendation," says Stubbs, "completed the idea of feudal obligation." The third element arose as follows. The national courts had become stereotyped or ineffective, and it became customary to unite to the grant of a beneficium a grant to its lord of power to exercise full jurisdiction within it. Thus the fief or benefice was withdrawn from the national system, and when these grants of immunity from the courts of the gau became general, and when political functions followed judicial ones, we have the complete feudalism of eleventh-century France—when, though ties of feudal dependence united the meanest vassal to the Crown as supreme overlord, the national system had become obliterated, central power nominal, and all real power in the hands of a multitude of landowners, who had every regalian right in their own estate. This was the system which the barons of Normandy lived under, and which they would fain have brought to England with them.

In England, however, a similar but independent process had set in. The Comitatus of the old Germans, which had died out in Gaul, became in England the source of a new organization of society. The king's thegns, the comites in a later stage, received with grants of land grants of immunities from the jurisdiction of the popular courts, which resulted in the establishment of practical feudalism on these soken or franchises. The free man bowed his neck for bread or protection. Everything became territorialized. What was originally the exception rapidly tended to become the rule. The great earls, as on the continent, gradually threw off their neutral character. Harold suggests the parallel of Hugh Capet, and continental feudalism found a soil ready to receive it. William I and his sons brought with them feudal theory and feudal practice. To him, as to his barons, no legal theory of tenure was possible but the feudal one; and the generation after the Conquest saw feudalism in its legal aspect established universally in England. But William had seen how feudalism as a system of government meant mere anarchy in Normandy, and did his best to prevent its introduction into England. The barons naturally desired as much power here as at home; but save in the Border Palatinates [COUNTIES PALATINE; BORDERS], and then in Wales and Ireland, which the barons won as independent adventurers, the Norman kings refused them this. Rebellion after rebellion broke out and was crushed. At last Henry I's defeat of Robert of Belesme settled the question for his reign. Under Stephen the barons won the day, and then alone did feudal government prevail in England. Henry II, in 1174, put down the final revolt of the feudal party. His administrative system rendered his triumph permanent. Only under Henry III's minority were there some slight tendencies to a feudal revival. Edward I destroyed the political importance of land tenure. Henceforth the barons fought, not to abolish the central state in favour of feudal localism, but to get the machinery of the central state into their own hands. They fought, not to get rid of the crown, but to put the monarchy in commission. The chivalry of the fourteenth century, though the result of a feudal ideal, was powerless to bring back real feudalism. The baronial power perished with the Wars of the Roses. The legal theory remained, with its obligation of fealty and homage, its incidents of aids, wardships, marriage, its military service, and other effects.

James I unsuccessfully attempted to abolish feudal tenures. An act of 1660 actually effected this. The very indefinite sense in which feudalism is sometimes used as indicating the power of the landed aristocracy need not be dealt with. Yet the English land law remains full of vestiges of feudalism. Every copyholder still owes to the lord of the manor the feudal incidents. Lands of the intestate and kinless deceased still escheat to the next lord.

Stubbs's account of the development of English feudalism in his "Constitutional History" has been superseded in many respects by later writers. Among recent works on the subject there may be particularly mentioned: G. B. Adams, "The Origin of the English Constitution," 1912; J. H. Round, "Feudal England," 1909; P. Vinogradoff, "English Society in the Eleventh Century," 1908; E. W. Maitland, "Domesday Book and Beyond," 1907; from the legal standpoint, Pollock and Maitland, "History of English Law," 1898, and W. S. Holdsworth, "History of English Law," 1922.

"Fidei Defensor." [DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.]

Fief, or Fee (Lat. feudum, feodum), is possibly derived from the old German word fehū in its sense of "wages, payment for service"—old French fiu—but it is hard to establish a connexion between the mediæval Latin feodum (introduced at the Conquest) and any word in the vernacular. Before the Conquest the word feoh was used for cattle in general and cattle in particular. It is very doubtful whether the second syllable has any connexion with od, also meaning property. The word first appeared in the ninth century, and acquired the meaning of land held of a lord by feudal tenure [FEUDALISM] or military service, "but very soon (after the Conquest) it was so widely used as to imply no more than heritability."

Fielden, JOHN (1784-1849), originally a labourer, became master of a factory, and from 1832 until 1847 was M.P. for Oldham. He is chiefly remembered by his exertions in favour of the Factory Acts, especially the Ten Hours Bill of 1833.

Fiennes, JAMES, LORD SAYE AND SELE (d. 1450), was treasurer of England from 1449 to 1450, and a strong supporter of the Duke of Suffolk. Hence he gained great unpopularity, and, when the insurgents under Jack Cade reached London, he was seized and after a mock trial beheaded.

Fiennes, NATHANIEL (1608-69), second son of William, 1st Viscount Saye and Sele, was educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford. He was elected member of the Long Parliament for Banbury, and became a leader amongst the "Root and Branch" party (q.v.). He was appointed in 1641 one of the committee to attend the king to Scotland. In 1642 he accepted a colonel's commission in Essex's army, and took part in the battle of Edgehill. In the following year he surrendered Bristol to Prince Rupert (July 1643), in circumstances which made him suspected of either treachery or cowardice. For this he was accused by Walker and Pryne, tried by court-martial, and sentenced to death. His former services, and his family interest, however, secured him a pardon, but he was obliged to abandon public affairs, and leave the kingdom for several years. He returned, regained the confidence of his party, and became, in January 1648, a member of the Committee of Safety, but was expelled from parliament by Pride's Purge (q.v.). In Cromwell's first parliament he represented the county, in the second the University, of Oxford. He became a member of the council of state (1654), commissioner of the great seal (1655), one of Cromwell's lords (1657), and was among the principal speakers in the discussions concerning the offer of the crown to the Protector (1658). He assisted in proclaiming Richard Cromwell, and adhered to his party till the re-establishment of the Long Parliament deprived him of his office. After the Restoration he retired into private life, and died in 1669. Fiennes was an eloquent speaker, and a man of decided opinions, but irresolute in action, and constitutionally timid.

Fiennes, THOMAS, LORD DACRE OF HURSTMONCEAUX (d. 1541) (Lord Dacre of the South), was a young nobleman who, in company with several friends, had engaged in a deer-stealing expedition to the park of an unpopular neighbour. During the affray which ensued one of the foresters was killed, and the whole party were brought up for trial, and a verdict of wilful murder was returned. Despite all the efforts of Dacre's friends, Henry VIII would not consent to spare the young man's life, saying he would deal out equal justice to all ranks. Lord Dacre was accordingly executed in 1541.

Fiennes, WILLIAM, 2ND LORD SAYE AND SELE (d. 1471), son of James Fiennes (q.v.), fought on the Yorkist side at Northampton. He was subsequently made lord high admiral by Edward IV, fled with the king in 1470, and, returning in the next year, was slain at the battle of Barnet.

Fiennes, WILLIAM, 1ST VISCOUNT SAYE AND SELE (1582-1662), educated at New College, Oxford, succeeded his father, Richard, as Lord Saye in 1613, and was created viscount in 1624. He was a strong Puritan, "for many years the oracle of those who were called Puritans in the worst sense, and steered all their counsels and designs" (Clarendon). He was one of the founders of the colonies of New Providence Island (1630) and Connecticut (1632), and thought of emigrating himself. He was also one of the foremost opponents of ship-money, but the government preferred to try Hampden's case rather than his. In 1639 he was committed to custody for refusing to take the military oath against the Scots required by the king. He was appointed in May 1641 master of the Court of Wards, when the king thought of winning the popular leaders by preferment, but remained firm, voted for the exclusion of the bishops, became a member of the Committee of Safety, and raised a regiment of foot for the Parliament. He continued to sit in the House of Lords until its abolition. In 1648 he acted as one of the parliamentary commissioners at the Treaty of Newport, and voted in favour of an accommodation with the king. He lived in retirement until 1660, when he took part in the intrigues to bring about the Restoration, and was rewarded by being made lord privy seal. His contemporaries charged him with duplicity, and nicknamed him "Old Subtlety."

Fifteenths and Tenths. Taxation of movables is said to have originated with the Saladin Tithe imposed by Henry II in 1188. In the thirteenth century taxes upon personal property became increasingly common, the amount levied being normally some definite fraction of each person's movables. The inhabitants of cities, boroughs, and the royal demesne were ordinarily taxed at a somewhat higher rate than the rest of the country. By the fourteenth century the grant of a tenth and fifteenth had become usual, the tenth being contributed by the cities, boroughs, and demesne lands, the fifteenth by the counties. At first a special, though not necessarily an exact, assessment was made for each grant. In 1332 an inquiry of such exceptional rigour was instituted that widespread discontent was aroused; and when, two years later, a new grant was made, the Crown was obliged to conciliate opinion by authorizing composition. Thereafter no new assessment was made, the returns for the taxation of 1334 being used as the basis for all subsequent levies. Later it became the practice to add to the grant of tenths and fifteenths a general subsidy on land and goods. In the course of time changes in the distribution of wealth necessitated a readjustment of the burden of taxation, and a drawback of first £4,000 and later £6,000 was allowed on each fifteenth and tenth in favour of waste and impoverished places. By Coke's day the value of a grant had diminished from £39,000 to roughly £29,000. The whole system of taxation was altered during the Commonwealth, and fifteenths and tenths were levied for the last time in 1626.

Fifth Monarchy Men, THE, were an extreme sect of the period of the Puritan revolution, formed chiefly of soldiers. They supported Cromwell in the belief that his government was the beginning of the "Fifth Monarchy," during which the millennial reign of Christ on earth would take place. The previous four monarchies were the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman. But such fanatics could not but be in opposition to any established government, and Cromwell had some difficulties with them. In 1661 the revolt of Venner was supported by this sect.

Fiji Islands, THE (pop. 157,266, area 7,083 sq. m.), or Viti Islands, a volcanic group of 200 or more islands, the chief of which are Viti Levu and Vanua Levu, form a British colony. They were sighted by Tasman (1643), visited by Cook (1769-73) and Captain Bligh (1789), who encountered hostility from the natives. Escaped convicts from New South Wales helped to ferment native wars, and Wesleyan missionaries arrived from Tonga about 1835. In 1859 the chief Thakombau offered sovereignty to Great Britain to save himself from American claims, but in spite of Colonel Smythe's advice the Duke of Newcastle refused. A sudden influx of whites from Australia led to a premature effort at self-government, and again Great Britain refused, as did also the United States, to assume sovereignty. In 1874 Great Britain accepted the unconditional cession of the Fijian chiefs, after Sir Hercules Robinson, governor of New South Wales, had endorsed the wishes of Australia and the report of Commander Goodenough in favour of annexation. Thus a port of call was secured between Australia and Panama and regulation of Polynesian labour traffic made possible. It was created a Crown colony and is ruled by a governor assisted by an executive council of 5 official and 3 unofficial members and by a legislative council of 11 nominated officials and 3 elected members and 1 native member.

In 1900 New Zealand made overtures to absorb Fiji, but the Imperial government refused after receiving a protest from the Aborigines Society. Rotumah, the dependency, was discovered in 1793 and annexed on cession by her chiefs in 1881. It is administered by a European high commissioner under the governor.

Finlmer, SIR ROBERT (d. 1653), was a gentleman of Kent, who matriculated at Cambridge (1604), fought for the king during the Civil War, and wrote in defence of monarchy. His chief works were "The Freeholders'

Grand Inquest" (1648, published 1679) and "Patriarcha" (published 1680). Finlmer started by denying the doctrine that mankind is naturally endowed and born with freedom from all subjection, and at liberty to choose what form of government it pleased; and that the power which any one man has over others was at first bestowed according to the discretion of the multitude. He went on to derive regal authority from the authority of a father over his family, as it was exercised by the patriarchs. From the patriarchs, by hereditary descent, this authority was transmitted to different royal houses. The royal authority, therefore, resembled the natural authority of a father over his children. The kingdom and its head, like the family and its head, existed by divine ordinance. The king received from God "his royal charter of a universal father," and ruled, therefore, by divine right. The subject was, in consequence, bound to absolute obedience, and had no right to depose a king or alter the line of succession. Finlmer's book was published in the midst of the discussions on the Exclusion Bill, and his theory supplied a powerful argument to those who denied the competence of parliament to exclude James from the throne. It was replied to by John Locke (q.v.).

Finch, DANIEL, 2ND EARL OF NOTTINGHAM (1647-1730), eldest son of Heneage, 1st earl, entered early into public life. In 1679 he was placed on the admiralty commission. Under James II he rigorously opposed the abrogation of the Test Act. In 1687 he entered into negotiations with Dykvelt, envoy of the Prince of Orange. He and Danby were representatives of the Tory party in those proceedings. He followed Sancroft's ideas on the settlement of the Revolution question, and advocated a regency to be exercised in James's name and during his life, but gradually abandoned the idea before the opposition of the Commons. He was appointed secretary of state under William and Mary, thereby acquiescing in the king de facto, and bringing a large body of Tory supporters to the ministry. He was soon involved in quarrels with his Whig colleague, Shrewsbury. In 1689 he carried his Toleration Bill, by which Nonconformist divines were allowed to preach after signing thirty-four out of the Thirty-nine Articles. He also moved a Comprehension Bill, but was compelled to drop it on account of the opposition it encountered. On the departure of William for Ireland, he was placed on the Council of Nine. The resignation of Shrewsbury had made him sole secretary of state. It was to his timely discovery of the intended invasion, and his vigorous measures to confirm the loyalty of the fleet, that the victory of La Hogue (q.v.) was in great part due. At the close of that year (1692) he bitterly inveighed against the subsequent mismanagement which had neutralized the victory. Nottingham and Russell became mortal enemies.

A vague vote of censure was passed on the former in the Commons by a majority of one, but he was warmly supported by the Lords. William, wishing to reserve for himself the services of Nottingham, induced Russell to accept a place in the household. But on the appointment of Russell as first lord of the admiralty, Nottingham had to resign. In 1694 he vigorously opposed the establishment of the Bank of England. On the accession of Anne, he became secretary of state. But his ideas were quite at variance with the schemes of Godolphin and Marlborough. In 1704 he declared that the ministry must be purged of the Whig element, and resigned. In opposition he raised the cry of the "Church in danger." In 1707 he proposed a motion to the effect that the English Church was threatened by the Union. He was struck off the privy council. As Harley neglected to give him office (1710), he joined the Whigs. They agreed to support his Occasional Conformity Bill if his Tory followers would oppose all ideas of peace. He therefore proposed and triumphantly carried a resolution "that no peace was honourable if Spain or the West Indies were allotted to any branch of the house of Bourbon." He was placed on the privy council by George I, but in 1716, disapproving of the condemnation of the leaders of the Jacobite rebellion, he was dismissed, and virtually quitted public life.

Finch, HENEAGE, 1ST EARL OF NOTTINGHAM (1621-82), was called to the bar in 1645, but his Royalist sentiments prevented his becoming prominent till the Restoration, when he was appointed solicitor-general. He conducted the prosecution of the regicides with great fairness and judgment. In 1670 he became attorney-general, and in 1673 lord keeper, which title he exchanged for that of lord chancellor in 1675. He held the great seal till his death in 1682, having in 1681 been created Earl of Nottingham. He figures in Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel" under the name of Amri. "From his persuasive powers he acquired the titles of 'the silver-tongued lawyer' and 'the English Cicero,' and from his graceful action that of 'the English Roscius.'"

Finch, JOHN, LORD (1584-1660), was the son of Sir Henry Finch, an eminent lawyer. He was a member of Charles I's first two parliaments, and was chosen Speaker of the third, which met in 1628. He speedily showed himself a decided partisan of the king, and on February 25, 1629, he refused to read a remonstrance against tunnage and poundage after the king's message for the adjournment of parliament had been delivered. A tumult occurred, during which the Speaker was held down in his chair, and Holles read the protestation to the House. In 1634 Finch was made chief justice of the Common Pleas, in which capacity he delivered judgment against Hampden in the case of ship-money. In 1640 he was made lord keeper, but, fearing the vengeance of the Long Parliament, he fled from England, at the end of the same year, to Holland, where he remained till 1660, when he returned to England, and took part in the trials of the regicides. The character of "an unprincipled lawyer and a time-serving minister," which Foss gives him, seems to be only too well deserved, and he died universally despised.

Fines, THE STATUTE OF, an act of the fourth year of Henry VII, was based on a similar one of Richard III and on the "De Finibus" statute of Edward I. It enacted that a fine, levied with proclamations in a public court of justice, should, after five years, be in ordinary circumstances a bar to all claims upon lands. Its main object was to give security of tenure to existing tenants by fixing a short term of prescription; a measure very necessary just after the Wars of the Roses. It did not, as some have thought, give liberty of alienation with the view of luring on a spendthrift nobility to ruin.

Finglen, THE BATTLE OF (719), near Lochavich in Argyllshire, was fought between Selvach, King of Dalriada, and his brother, Aincellach, whom he had driven out in 698. Aincellach made a desperate effort to recover his kingdom, but was slain.

Finlay Question, THE. George Finlay (1799-1875), the Greek historian, had settled in Athens when Greece became independent. Some of his land had been seized for the purpose of rounding off the new palace gardens of King Otto, and Finlay had declined to take the terms offered him, which had been accepted by all the other landowners in a similar position. He appealed to the British government, and his case was associated with the Pacifico and the Fantôme cases into one grand grievance, for which Palmerston demanded compensation (1850). [PACIFICO.]

Finbolgs. One of the legendary or fabulous tribes of the earliest period of Irish history. They may, it has been thought, correspond to the pre-Aryan inhabitants of Ireland.

Fire of London, THE (September 2-7, 1666), broke out accidentally in a house near London Bridge, but a strong east wind caused it to spread with great rapidity, and for five days London was given up to the flames. Two-thirds of London was destroyed—eighty-nine churches, including St. Paul's Cathedral, and more than 13,000 dwelling-houses. But the fire, though destroying so much, was most beneficial in thoroughly eradicating the plague.

The fever dens in which it continually lurked were burnt, and the new houses which were erected were far more healthy and better arranged. The fire was attributed to the hated papists; and on the Monument, which was erected to commemorate it, the Romanists were directly charged with being the authors of the terrible conflagration.

"First of June," THE BATTLE OF THE (1794), was a naval engagement fought off Ushant during the wars of the French Revolution. The French had collected a fleet of 26 ships at Brest, which put out on May 20 to meet a convoy of corn ships expected from America. On the 28th Lord Howe with the Channel fleet (also 26 ships), brought them to a partial engagement; but it was not till June 1 that he was able to bring about a decisive encounter. Having the wind of the enemy, he resolved to break through the French fleet, and fight it to leeward. The enemy lay in close line of battle, stretching from east to west, and Howe's object was not to come down on it directly, but to sail abreast of it until each ship got an opportunity of breaking through the line. It was impossible, however, to carry out the manœuvre in detail, and five only of the ships, besides the flag-ship, succeeded in passing through, while the rest engaged the enemy on the windward side. But in whatever position the British ships closed with the enemy, their mode of fighting was too fierce to be long resisted, and after a few hours the French ships which were able began to move off; nor was the pursuit vigorously carried out. As it was, however, six ships had been lost to the enemy, and 8,000 men, while the English admiral returned his losses at 1,150 in killed and wounded; but the corn ships escaped to Brest. The moral effects of the victory were greater than the material. [HOWE, RICHARD; HOOD, ALEXANDER.]

Fisher, JOHN, Bishop of Rochester (1459-1535), was born at Beverley. After a distinguished Cambridge career, in which he took a prominent part in bringing the studies of that university abreast of the new learning, both in Greek and theology, he was chosen in 1504 Bishop of Rochester, and was also from 1505 to 1508 master of Queen's College, Cambridge. A man of honesty, piety, and determination, but of strict conservative principles, he became one of the leaders of the party opposed to Henry VIII's divorce, listened to the Nun of Kent, opposed the royal supremacy, and was imprisoned in 1534, and attainted. His untimely appointment as cardinal by Paul III led to his execution, after trial by a special commission, on June 22, 1535.

Biography by A. M. Stewart, 1880.

Fishguard (ABERGWAUN) is a small town in Pembrokeshire, on a land-locked haven in the north of that county. Near here, at Llanwnda, 1,400 French soldiers landed on February 22, 1797; but they were the scum of every jail in France, and showed little power of resistance. Frightened, as the story goes, by the red coats and tall hats of the old Welsh women, they surrendered on February 24, to the ill-armed local militia under Lord Cawdor.

D. Rowlands, "The Fishguard Invasion," 1893.

Fitton, ALEXANDER (d. 1699), a barrister of no reputation or character, was made lord chancellor of Ireland by James II in 1687. He had been detected in forgery, and his only recommendation was that he had recently become a Roman Catholic. After Tyrconnel's death he became one of the lords justices appointed to govern Ireland.

Fitz-Alan, EDMUND, 12TH EARL OF ARUNDEL (d. 1326), was one of the Ordainers appointed in 1310. He joined the king in 1321, and was one of the few nobles who remained faithful to Edward II after the landing of Isabella and Mortimer. He was captured in Shropshire, and hanged at Hereford.

Fitz-Alan, HENRY, 24TH EARL OF ARUNDEL (d. 1580), was in 1547 appointed one of the twelve councillors who, under the will of Henry VIII, were to assist the executors in carrying on the government during the minority of Edward VI. He was one of the chief promoters of the attack on Somerset, which ended in his downfall; and having given an unwilling assent to the alteration of the succession of Edward VI in favour of Lady Jane Grey, he was regarded with suspicion by Northumberland, who endeavoured to prevent his leaving London. However, he managed to escape to Baynard's Castle, and at once, with the rest of the council, declared for Mary; shortly afterwards he arrested the Duke of Northumberland at Cambridge, and conveyed him to London. After the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Arundel became one of her councillors, "feared by all men, trusted by none," and was even named as a probable suitor for her hand, a fact which led to a bitter quarrel with Leicester in 1561. In 1568, as the leader of the old nobility and the Catholic party, he showed himself violently opposed to Cecil and the Reformers, and was present at the Westminster Inquiry as a partisan of Mary, Queen of Scots; in the following year he was placed under arrest for complicity in the northern rebellion, and in 1571 was privy to the Ridolfi conspiracy.

Fitz-Alan, RICHARD, 15TH EARL OF ARUNDEL (d. 1397), was the son of Richard, Earl of Arundel, and Eleanor, daughter of Henry, Earl of Lancaster. He succeeded his father in 1376, and served in the French and Scottish wars; but he was chiefly remarkable for his valour and conduct at sea. He was for several years admiral and captain of the east, south, and west, gained several naval victories, and captured Brest. He joined Gloucester against de la Pole and de Vere, and was one of the lords appellant. In 1397 he was involved in Gloucester's fall, and was seized, tried, and beheaded.

Fitz-Alan, THOMAS, 22ND EARL OF ARUNDEL (d. 1524), was one of the chief nobles attached to Henry VII's court. On the occasion of the shipwreck near Weymouth, in January 1506, of the Archduke of Austria, Philip, and his wife, the Earl of Arundel was the royal messenger sent to congratulate Philip upon his escape, and to welcome him to England. Arundel had also done the king good service as a soldier in Flanders, during the wars in aid of Maximilian.

Fitz-Aldhelm (or AUDELIN), WILLIAM DE, was sent by Henry II, in 1171, to treat with Roderick O'Connor. He was again in Ireland in 1173, as Henry's envoy, with the bulls of Adrian IV and Alexander III. In 1176 he became Strongbow's successor as governor of Ireland. He was strongly opposed to the Geraldines, and defrauded Maurice Fitzgerald's sons of part of their inheritance in 1177. In the same year he was recalled, not having signalized himself in any other way.

G. Orpen, "Ireland Under the Normans," 1911, etc.

Fitz-Athulf, CONSTANTINE (d. 1222), was the leader of a riot in London in 1222, which, though it originated merely as a brawl between the Londoners and the men of the abbot of Westminster, became most serious in its results, and is supposed to have been secretly fomented by Louis of France. It was, however, summarily put down by Hubert de Burgh; Fitz-Athulf was hanged and his followers fined or mutilated.

Fitzgerald, FAMILY OF. Their ancestor was William Fitz-Other, castellan of Windsor, whose son Gerald married the Welsh princess Nesta, by whom he became the father of William and Maurice Fitzgerald. Both his sons participated in the Norman conquest of Ireland. William became the ancestor of the Carews; Maurice was the founder of the Geraldine family. He secured from Strongbow large grants of Irish land, including the lordships of Naas and Wicklow. The grant of Wicklow was not continued to his heirs, but his eldest son William became Baron of Naas. His second son, Gerald, secured the barony of Offaley in right of his wife, Eva de Bermingham; and his descendant, the 5th Lord Offaley, was created Earl of Kildare in 1316. In the meantime Maurice's third son, Thomas, had obtained the lordship of Shanid in Limerick, c. 1179, to which his son John added Decies and Desmond. Their descendant, Maurice Fitz-Thomas, was created Earl of Desmond in 1329. From this time the Fitzgeralds became the virtual rulers of Ireland, or at least of the English part of it. The destruction of the houses of de Burgh and de Lacy left the Butlers as their sole rivals. From the defeat of Edward Bruce to the reign of James I, the history of Ireland largely consists in the feuds of these two great families. The sixteenth century saw, however, the overthrow of the Geraldine connexion. The Kildare branch of the family is still represented in our own day by the ducal house of Leinster, to whom the honours passed through Henry, a brother of Gerald, the 11th earl, who died in the Tower in 1585.

Fitzgerald, LORD EDWARD (1763-98), was a younger son of the Duke of Leinster, and married the reputed daughter of Philippe Egalité. In 1784 he was a member of the Irish parliament, and opposed the address. In 1793 he was compelled to apologize for words reflecting on the lord-lieutenant. Just before, he had gone to Paris as envoy of the United Irishmen. In 1796 he took their oath, and again went over to the continent, met Hoche in Switzerland, and settled on a French invasion. On his return to Ireland he kept up a constant correspondence with France through his wife at Hamburg. In October 1797 a "person," as he is called, gave information of this to Pitt, and allowed himself to be employed as a spy, but he refused to come forward as a witness, and the government could not, therefore, arrest Lord Edward. On March 12, 1798, he escaped, while his fellow-conspirators were seized. A reward of £1,000 was offered for his apprehension, but he continued undiscovered in his hiding-place in Dublin. Finally, however, he was betrayed by a man whose name never transpired, and on May 19 between five and six o'clock he was seized on his bed. He stabbed Ryan and Swan, two of the officers, but was disabled by a pistol-shot and was captured. The seal of the United Irishmen and a plan for the surprise of Dublin were found on him. Before he could be tried, he died of his wounds (June 4, 1798).

Fitzgerald, GERALD, 8TH EARL OF KILDARE (d. 1513), was thirty-three years chief governor of Ireland. In 1487, as lord deputy, he actively assisted at the coronation of Lambert Simnel as Edward VI at Christ Church, Dublin. His brother, the chancellor of Ireland, fell at Stoke. However, when the earl made his submission to Edgecumbe, the king's controller, and had an interview with Henry VII at Windsor, he again became lord deputy. After Warbeck's landing in Ireland, however, his office was taken from him, and Sir Edward Poynings had him attainted. He was then sent over to England and confined in the Tower. Many stories are told of his conduct there, and his frank avowal that he burnt the cathedral at Cashel because he thought the archbishop was in it, is said to have convinced Henry that he was no conspirator. The Bishop of Meath, his chief accuser, concluded his charges by saying, "You see what a man he is—all Ireland cannot rule him." "Then," said the king, "it is meet that he should rule all Ireland." Accordingly he was again made lord deputy, and remained so till his death. From this time, however, he was a loyal subject, and waged incessant war against the natives, who were again encroaching on the Pale, till he fell in battle against the O'Moores (1513).

R. Bagwell, "Ireland Under the Tudors," 1885-90.

Fitzgerald, GERALD, 9TH EARL OF KILDARE (1487-1534), became lord deputy after his father's death in 1513, and remained so till 1519, when, in spite of his successful administration, he was superseded by the Earl of Surrey. The hereditary feud with the Butlers meanwhile assumed such dimensions that, though he was again made lord deputy in 1524, he was summoned to England and kept a prisoner in the Tower from 1526 to 1530. In 1532, though the struggle with the Butlers was still going on, he was again lord deputy, but in 1534 he was once more summoned to England, though he was allowed to appoint a deputy during his absence. Gerald appointed his son, Lord Thomas (q.v.), and after supplying his own castles with artillery and ammunition from the royal magazines, he left for England. He was at once thrown into the Tower, where it is reported he was beheaded.

R. Bagwell, "Ireland Under the Tudors," 1885-90.

Fitzgerald, GERALD, 11TH EARL OF KILDARE (1525-85), was brother of Thomas, the 10th, and second son of Gerald, the 9th earl. On his father's death he was only twelve years old; but in spite of all the efforts of the government to capture him he was conveyed from Ireland to the continent. Cardinal Pole, a relation of his mother, Lady Grey, sent for him into Italy, in which country he was educated. His estates were restored under Edward VI, and under Mary he was reinstated in all his honours. The attainder, however, was not really reversed till the reign of Elizabeth. He was active in suppressing Irish insurrections, and died in 1585 in the Tower, where he had been sent on suspicion of being connected with the Geraldine rebellion in the south. All his sons died early, without issue, and the family honours descended through a brother to the present house of Leinster.

R. Bagwell, "Ireland Under the Tudors," 1885-90.

Fitzgerald, GERALD, 15TH EARL OF DESMOND (d. 1583), was the head of the great house of the southern Fitzgeralds, who were all-powerful in Munster. Sir Henry Sidney had recommended that this province should be made into an English presidency and English colonists introduced. But the queen, who had set herself against this plan, demanded that Desmond's influence should be attacked in another way. He was consequently arrested for treason. In 1568 he submitted to Elizabeth, and surrendered his property into her hands.

But in 1574 he broke out in rebellion again, and once more in 1579. Next year he was trapped with the Spaniards by Lord Grey at Smerwick, but escaped the horrible fate of the garrison. Finally, after he had wandered about for more than two years, his hiding-place was betrayed to the English, who surrounded his cabin and murdered him in his bed.

Fitzgerald, JAMES, 1ST DUKE (SECOND CREATION) OF LEINSTER (1722-73), 20th Earl of Kildare, was in 1747 made Marquis of Leinster in the English peerage, in 1761 Marquis of Kildare, and in 1766 Duke of Leinster in the Irish peerage. Individually the most powerful and popular nobleman in Ireland, he refused to act with any other party. Hence it was that only once was he lord justice. In 1769 he joined the Patriots, and raised and commanded the first regiment of volunteers. When the trade restrictions were taken away he refused to embarrass the government, but again took the lead against them after the Mutiny Bill had been passed. He was one of the deputation to the Prince of Wales with the Regency Bill. He signed the "Round Robin" (q.v.), but refused to recede from that engagement; in consequence he lost the mastership of the rolls. He was father of Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

Fitzgerald, JAMES FITZMAURICE (d. 1579), was the brother of the 16th Earl of Desmond, and far superior to him in address and military skill. When the head of the family was made a prisoner by Sidney, he roused the Geraldines, and, uniting with other chiefs, he took Kilmallock (1570). He went over to Spain to get help, but on his return, had to submit to Sir John Perrot in 1571. He then again went abroad, and in vain tried to induce France and Spain to come to the aid of the Irish Catholics. Pope Gregory XIII, however, entrusted him with a force of a few hundred men, and he set sail with them in 1579, and landed at Dingle, co. Kerry. Not finding the support he expected, he went off into Tipperary, where he was soon afterwards slain in battle.

Fitzgerald, SIR JOHN, OF DESMOND (d. 1581), was the brother of Gerald, 15th Earl of Desmond. In the hope of compromising his brother with the English he murdered two English officers at Tralee (1579). The whole clan then sprang to arms. Sir John was taken prisoner at the fall of Kilmallock, in 1580, but as he spoke English fluently, he managed to escape. In December 1581 he fell in with Sir John Zouch on the Avonmore River, and was slain. His head was later sent to Dublin.

Fitzgerald, MAURICE, one of the Norman conquerors of Ireland, was a son of Nesta (daughter of Rhys the Great, King of South Wales, and former mistress of Henry I) and Gerald of Windsor, castellan of Pembroke. He landed at Wexford in 1169 in company with Fitz-Stephen, to render assistance to Dermot of Leinster against the High King of Ireland. He is mentioned as a leader of the expedition against Dublin in 1170, and he was besieged there by O'Connor in the next year. He participated in the bold sortie which dispersed the besieging army and saved the beleaguered city. He was with John de Lacy when O'Rourke was killed (1172), and got Wicklow and Naas as a fief. He died in 1176. Giraldus says of him that he died leaving no man behind him stronger in constancy and faith. His sons were deprived of Wicklow, but retained Naas. He is the ancestor of the houses of Kildare and Desmond, and of the Fitzgerald family generally.

G. Orpen, "Ireland Under the Normans," 1911, etc.

Fitzgerald, LORD THOMAS (1513-37), son of Gerald, 9th Earl of Kildare, and vice-deputy for him. On his father's arrest by Henry VIII, Lord Thomas excited in 1534 a somewhat formidable revolt in Ireland, which for a time was very successful. But the storming of Maynooth, the great stronghold of the Fitzgeralds, by Skeffington, led to the ruin of the rebel cause. After a long period of wandering, Thomas surrendered to the English, and was hanged with his five uncles at Tyburn on February 3, 1537.

Fitzgerald, SIR THOMAS JUDKIN (d. 1810), was high sheriff of Tipperary during the rebellion of 1798. He committed and encouraged the most frightful barbarities. One man named Wright was flogged nearly to death for having a note in French in his pocket, and proceeded after the Revolution to take legal action, which secured him £500 damages. But the government paid the money, and in 1801 made Fitzgerald a baronet. His severities prevented an outbreak in Tipperary.

P. F. Kavanagh, "Rebellion of 1798," 1913.

Fitzgerald, WILLIAM VEZEY, BARON FITZGERALD AND VEZEY (1783-1843), an Irish Tory politician of some mark, represented Clare in the House of Commons from 1818 till turned out by O'Connell in 1828 on seeking re-election after appointment to office. From 1828 to 1830 he was paymaster and president of the board of trade; and from 1841 to 1843, president of the board of control.

Fitzgibbon, JOHN (1749-1802), was created Baron Fitzgibbon in 1789, Viscount in 1793, Earl of Clare in 1795. He distinguished himself greatly at Trinity College, and was even then the rival of Grattan. He soon made a name at the bar. In the year 1787 he first signalized himself as Tory member for Dublin, by speaking against the vote of thanks to the volunteers, then at the height of their popularity. His second great speech was directed against Flood's Reform Bill, which was lost. In 1784 he became attorney-general, and as such had the courage to attack the sheriff of Dublin, as he was assembling the freeholders to elect representatives to a new illegal congress. In 1785 he fought a duel with Curran. On January 31, 1787, he brought in a Conspiracy Bill, and he was one of the few Irishmen who opposed the Regency Bill in 1788. In 1789 he became a peer and lord chancellor. During Lord Camden's administration he was virtually governor of Ireland, and was the mainstay of the government during the rebellion of 1798. The insurgents hated him more than any other man. Lord Cornwallis, though he came out to Ireland prejudiced against him, declared later that he was "by far the most moderate and right-headed man in the country." He defended the Union in a great speech on February 10, 1800, in the Irish parliament. In the following year he made a bitter attack on the absentee Whig lords in the English parliament. In 1802 he died, and his burial was nearly interrupted by a furious mob.

Fitzharris, EDWARD (1648 ?-81), was an Irish adventurer, who in 1681 concocted a libel upon the king and the Duke of York, in which he advocated the deposition of the one and the exclusion of the other. This manuscript he probably intended to place in the study of one of the prominent Whig statesmen, and then, by discovering it himself, earn the wages of an informer. He was, however, betrayed by an accomplice, and sent to the Tower, where he invented a popish plot for the murder of the king, and the boiling down of the leading Whigs into a jelly, to be used for anointing future popish kings. Fitzharris was impeached by the Commons, but the Lords declared that they had no power of trying a commoner, as that would be a violation of Magna Carta, while the Commons asserted their right of impeachment. On the dissolution of parliament he was tried for high treason before the King's Bench, and executed (July 1, 1681).

Fitzherbert, MARIA ANNE (1756-1837), was a Roman Catholic lady, with whom George, Prince of Wales, went through the ceremony of marriage in 1787. If the Royal Marriage Act had not invalidated this marriage as contracted without the royal consent, the Act of Settlement would have deprived George of his rights of succession. To get his debts paid by parliament, George (there is reason to believe) persuaded Fox publicly to deny his marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert, though he denied that he had instructed Fox to do so. Mrs. Fitzherbert parted from George in or about 1803.

Fitz-James, JAMES, DUKE OF BERWICK (1670-1734), was the natural son of James II, by Arabella Churchill, the sister of the Duke of Marlborough. At an early age he was sent to learn the art of war under Charles of Lorraine, and was present at the siege of Buda in 1685. In 1687 he was created Duke of Berwick. After the Revolution of 1688, Berwick fought for his father in Ireland, and was present at the battle of the Boyne. He accompanied James to France, and served under Marshal Luxemburg in Flanders. He was taken prisoner at Neerwinden, but exchanged. In 1696 Berwick took a very prominent part in the unsuccessful plot for a Jacobite insurrection, which was to have been aided by a French force; but it is probable that he knew little of the darker schemes of some of the plotters, who aimed at removing William III by assassination. [ASSASSINATION PLOT.] In 1704 Berwick, whose military talents were now highly esteemed, was appointed to the command of the French army in Spain. In 1705 he suppressed the Camisard insurrection in Languedoc. In 1706 he was again sent to Spain, and he did much to restore the French cause, which previously appeared almost desperate. In 1707 he completely routed the British and Imperialists at the great battle of Almanza, in which his opponent was a Frenchman, Ruvigny, Marquis of Galway. In 1709, and the following years, he was employed in Dauphiné, and conducted a skilful defensive campaign. In 1713 he returned to Spain and captured Barcelona. In 1716 he was appointed commandant of Guienne; and in 1718 he once more led a French army into Spain, this time in opposition to Philip V, whom he had done so much to place on the throne. At the conclusion of the interval of peace, which terminated in 1733, Berwick was called to superintend the operations on the Rhine. He was killed by a cannon-ball at the siege of Philippsburg. Berwick was created a peer of France and a grandee of Spain. One of his sons was created Duke of Liria, in Spain, and the other Duke of Fitz-James, in the peerage of France. Berwick's military talents were of a very high order, and perhaps not altogether unworthy of comparison with those of his celebrated uncle. In some other respects his characteristics were not unlike those of Marlborough. He had the same coldness, and could be disturbed neither by excitement nor by danger. His integrity, piety, and high sense of duty were unquestioned, and his character has been very highly praised by Montesquieu. Bolingbroke called him the best great man that ever lived.

Berwick's "Mémoires," written by himself down to 1716, and continued to 1734 by the Abbé Hook, were published in 1778, with an "Eloge Historique" by Montesquieu; also biography by C. T. Wilson, 1883. [S. L.]

Fitz-Jocelin, REGINALD, Archbishop-elect of Canterbury (d. 1191), was the son of Jocelin, Bishop of Salisbury, and was elected Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1173. On the death of Archbishop Baldwin, the monks of Canterbury, in opposition to King Richard and Earl John, each of whom had his own nominee, chose Reginald to fill the vacant see. Almost immediately after his election he was seized with illness, and expired in less than a month.

Fitzmaurice, HENRY CHARLES KEITH PETTY, 5TH MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE (1845– 1927), eldest son of Henry, 4th marquis, was governor-general of Canada from 1833 to 1888, and viceroy of India from 1888 to 1893. From 1895 to 1900 he was secretary for war, and secretary for foreign affairs from 1900 to 1906. In 1911 he led the House of Lords in resisting the Parliament Bill until the threat to create peers, and opposed the Home Rule Bill. He retired from office on the fall of the Asquith Coalition in 1916.

Fitz-Nigel, RICHARD, or FITZ-NEAL (1133–98), was the son of Nigel, Bishop of Ely, and great-nephew (or grandson) of Bishop Roger of Salisbury. He was treasurer of England as early as 1160, and this office he seems to have held till his death, having also been made Bishop of London in 1189. He was probably the author of the "Gesta Henrici," one of the best sources for the reign of Henry II; but his more famous work is the "Dialogus de Scaccario" (q.v.) (written between 1177 and 1179), which his position and connexion with Nigel and Roger made extremely important and trustworthy. The treatise describes in detail the working of the exchequer, which was the centre of the Norman system of administration.

R. L. Poole, "The Exchequer in the Twelfth Century"; Hughes, Crump, and Johnson, "Dialogus de Scaccario," 1902.

Fitz-Osbern, WILLIAM (d. 1071), was a Norman baron, somewhat distantly connected with the Conqueror. He was largely instrumental in obtaining the sanction of the Norman nobles at the council of Lillebonne to the invasion of England, and commanded one of the wings at the battle of Hastings. He received the palatine earldom of Hereford as his reward. During the king's absence in Normandy he acted as regent in conjunction with Odo of Bayeux and, in 1069, assisted in suppressing the insurrections in the north and west of England. In 1071 he went to Flanders to support the cause of the widowed Richildis. There he was slain at the battle of Cassel.

"Political History of England," vol. ii; H. W. C. Davis, "England Under the Normans and Angevins."

Fitz-Osbert, WILLIAM (d. 1196), known also as William Longbeard, the first demagogue in English history, served in the Third Crusade, and is described as a man of great eloquence. He opposed the system of assessment adopted in the levy of the aid to ransom Richard I in 1194 and is said to have secured a following of more than 50,000 men. He held meetings, denounced the oppression of the governing bourgeoisie, and proclaimed himself the saviour of the poor. The justiciar, Hubert Walter, collected troops, and speedily awed the city into submission. Fitz-Osbert took sanctuary in St. Mary-le-Bow, where he was attacked by fire, and eventually captured. He was at once tried, and put to death as a traitor. Of his character and aims it is difficult to judge, as contemporary writers express such very opposite views. William of Newburgh says: "The contriver and fomentor of so much evil perished at the command of justice, and the madness of this wicked conspiracy expired with its author; and those persons, indeed, who were of more healthful and cautious dispositions rejoiced when they beheld or heard of his punishment, washing their hands in the blood of the sinner." On the other hand, Matthew Paris says: "So perished William Longbeard, for endeavouring to uphold the cause of right and the poor. If it be the cause which makes the martyr, no man may be more justly described as a martyr than he."

Fitz-Peter, GEOFFREY (d. 1213), was the younger brother of Simon Fitz-Peter, one of Henry II's justices. He himself acted as an itinerant judge and as sheriff, and Richard I placed him on the council which was to act, with the justiciar, during the king's absence on the Crusade. In 1198 he was appointed justiciar, which office he contrived to hold till his death. His administration was characterized by great sternness and rigid impartiality, and he did what he could to restrain the excesses of John, who, on hearing of his death, exclaimed, with an oath, "Now, for the first time, am I King of England." Fitz-Peter secured the earldom of Essex on the death of William de Mandeville, in right of his wife Beatrice.

Fitzroy, AUGUSTUS HENRY, 3RD DUKE OF GRAFTON (1735-1811), son of Charles, 2nd duke, after being educated at Westminster and Peterhouse, Cambridge, succeeded his father at the age of 22. He attached himself to the Whigs, and was one of the three peers who, for their independence in censuring Bute's peace with France in 1763, were dismissed from their lord-lieutenancies (Grafton had been lord-lieutenant of Suffolk). When Rockingham came into office in 1765, the duke was appointed one of the secretaries of state, but resigned in the following May, having become a disciple of Pitt. When the ministry resigned a few months later, the duke was appointed first lord of the treasury, while Pitt nominally received for himself the privy seal only, but was in fact prime minister. The duke did, however, become really premier, when Chatham fell ill and retired from active business; and so he continued until January 1770, when he retired and made way for Lord North, after being outvoted in his own cabinet. In June 1771 he "was induced to accept the privy seal, but, with a kind of proud humility, refused a seat in the cabinet of Lord North"; and in October 1775, as he could not convince his colleagues of the need of conciliating America, he resigned. He then joined his old leader, Lord Chatham, in his protests against the policy of the government in America, and was in opposition during the remainder of Lord North's tenure of office. He was appointed privy seal when Lord Rockingham took office in 1782. On the succession of Shelburne to the premiership, he did not resign, but distrusted the new premier. Soon after this he retired from politics to the quiet enjoyment of field sports, which had always occupied most of his thoughts. Eventually he became a Unitarian and wrote in favour of revising the Liturgy. He is best known to posterity from the striking though exaggerated picture drawn of him by the powerful pen of "Junius," whose chief victim he was. A man of promise and ability, endowed with fortune and high position, upright and disinterested in his public conduct, the Duke of Grafton was yet a failure. He was lacking in application, and was both vacillating and obstinate. The conspicuous manner, too, in which he paraded his personal immorality gave offence even to his lax age.

Grafton's "Autobiography and Correspondence," ed. Sir W. Anson, 1898.

Fitzroy, SIR CHARLES AUGUSTUS (1796-1858), second son of Augustus Henry, 3rd Duke of Grafton, was governor of New South Wales (1846-8). His tenure of office was chiefly remarkable for disputes between the home and the colonial governments as to the proposed change of constitution in New South Wales. He was governor-general of Australia from 1850 to 1858.

Fitzroy, HENRY 1ST, DUKE OF RICHMOND (1519-36), was a natural son of Henry VIII by Elizabeth Blount, afterwards wife of Sir Gilbert Tailbois. Before he was seven years of age he was made a knight of the Garter, and created successively Earl of Nottingham and Duke of Richmond and Somerset (1525). At the same time he was appointed warden of the Marches towards Scotland, and placed in possession of many great estates. He was also subsequently raised to the dignity of lord-lieutenant of Ireland (1529), the actual duties of his position being performed for him by his deputy, Sir William Skeffington. He was married to Mary, daughter of Thomas Howard, 3rd Duke of Norfolk, but died before the consummation of the marriage. Had he lived he would almost certainly have been nominated in Henry's will to follow Edward VI in the succession to the crown.

A. F. Pollard, "Henry VIII," 1902, etc.

Fitzroy, HENRY, 1ST DUKE OF GRAFTON (1663-90), was the second son of Charles II by Barbara Villiers, Countess of Castlemaine (q.v.). He married Isabella, daughter of Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, and was created Duke of Grafton in 1675. He became vice-admiral of England on the death of Prince Rupert, and saw military service at the siege of Luxemburg (1684) and at Sedgemoor (1685). In 1688 he deserted James II with Churchill, took the oath to William III, and helped the Dutch in the battle of Beachy Head (q.v.). He was killed in Ireland in 1690, during the siege of Cork.

Biography by Sir A. W. Fitzroy, 1921.

Fitz-Stephen, ROBERT, a Norman conqueror in South Wales and Ireland, was a son of the notorious Nesta (the former mistress of Henry I), by Stephen, constable of Cardigan. When Dermot came to Wales to collect succours, Fitz-Stephen was the captive of the Welsh prince Rhys ap Griffith, but on his release, in 1169, he led thirty knights, sixty men-at-arms, and three hundred archers to Ireland. With this force he took Wexford; but, in 1170, he was induced by treachery to surrender at Carrick. When Henry II landed, in 1171, Fitz-Stephen was delivered up to him at Waterford as a traitor by the men of Wexford. He was, however, shortly released, although he received no grant of lands in Ireland until 1177. He followed Henry abroad, in 1174; was sent over to Ireland in 1176 with Fitz-Audelin, again recalled, but finally, in 1177, invested with a moiety of the kingdom of Cork and the command in southern Munster. In 1182 he was besieged in Cork, but rescued by Raymond le Gros. He died without heirs and was succeeded by his nephew, Raymond le Gros, from whom the lands passed to the Carew family.

Fitz-Urse, REGINALD, was a knight in the service of Henry II, and one of the murderers of St. Thomas. [BECKET.]

Fitz-Walter, MILO (MILES OF GLOUCES-TER) (d. 1143), was one of the itinerant justices in the reign of Henry I and sheriff of several of the western counties. On that king's death he assisted Stephen in his attempt to gain the crown, but before long he deserted the king, and strenuously supported the Empress Matilda, who in 1141 gave him the title of Earl of Hereford, together with considerable lands and privileges. He was accidentally killed in 1143.

Fitz-Walter, ROBERT (d. 1235), lord of Dunmow and Baynard's Castle, was a bitter opponent of John, and was selected by the baronial confederacy as the leader in the struggle that finally resulted in the grant of Magna Carta. He was one of the twenty-five executors appointed to see that the provisions of the charter were duly observed, and he it was who in 1216 offered the throne of England to Louis of France. He was defeated and captured at the battle of Lincoln in May 1217, but was speedily released. From 1219 to 1221 he was on crusade, and after his return he lived peaceably in England till his death in 1235.

Fitz-William, ROGER, EARL OF HEREFORD, was the younger son of William Fitz-Osbern. In 1075 he entered into a plot with Ralph Guader, Earl of Norfolk (q.v.), against William I, the immediate cause being the king's opposition to the marriage between Ralph and Fitz-Osbern's sister. Being defeated and taken prisoner, he was sentenced to deprivation of his lands and titles and perpetual captivity. [NORWICH, THE BRIDAL OF.]

Fitz-William, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1542), was a famous naval commander of Henry VIII's time. In 1513 and in 1522-4 he defeated the French, and in 1537 was made Earl of Southampton and privy seal.

Fitzwilliam, WILLIAM WENTWORTH, 2ND EARL (1748-1833), was of the distinguished Yorkshire Whig family, and nephew of Rockingham, and opposed the American War and Pitt's earlier ministry. Taking panic at the French revolutionary excesses, he deserted Fox. He was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1794, but recalled next year because too Liberal and succeeded by Cornwallis. This alienated him from the government, and he became president of the council under Grenville, in 1806, and lived to share in and see the success of the Reform Bill agitation. He was one of the best specimens of the Whig grandee of the eighteenth century.

Five Boroughs of Mercia. A confederacy of Danish boroughs comprising Derby, Lincoln, Leicester, Stamford, and Nottingham. They were each ruled by their "jarl," with twelve hereditary lawmen administering Danish law, in whom was vested supreme judicial authority. The Five Boroughs were conquered by Edward the Elder; and reconquered (in 942) by Edmund, who seems to have allowed them full enjoyment of their local privileges. [DANELAGH.]

Five Members, THE. In January 1642 Charles I, believing that the Parliamentary leaders intended to impeach the queen, resolved to prevent them by impeaching her assailants. He selected, as the chief offenders, five members of the House of Commons, John Pym (Tavistock), John Hampden (Buckinghamshire), Denzil Holles (Dorchester), Sir Arthur Haselrigg (Leicestershire), and William Strode (Dorchester). Lord Mandeville was included in the same impeachment on January 3. Sir Edward Herbert, the attorney-general, laid the charges before the House of Lords, who at once appointed a committee to inquire whether his procedure had been according to law. On the same day the king sent the sergeant-at-arms to the House of Commons with orders to arrest the five members. Charles was urged on by Lord Digby and the queen to arrest the members himself, and about three o'clock on the afternoon of January 4 started from Whitehall with about three hundred armed men to apprehend them. The accused members had been warned by a message from Lady Carlisle, and escaped by the river into the city. The king entered the House, leaving about eighty armed men in the lobby, and made a speech in which he said that since they had disobeyed his orders, he had come to arrest the members himself. He commanded the Speaker to tell him whether the accused members were present; and when Lenthall refused to do so, and the king saw with his own eyes that "the birds were flown," he retired. The House adjourned till the 11th, appointing a committee to sit in the interval at the Guildhall. This committee voted, on the 6th, that the impeachment, the personal issue of the warrants by the king, and the attempt to arrest the impeached members were alike illegal. Addresses and petitions on behalf of the accused members poured in from the city and the country. On the 11th the Commons returned in triumph to Westminster, and two days later the king announced that, as the legality of the impeachment of the members had been doubted, he would now abandon it and proceed against them "in an unquestionable way." The justifiable distrust caused by this attempt induced the leaders of the Parliament to demand substantial securities from the king, and so led to war.

Five-Mile Act, THE (1665), enacted that no nonconforming clergyman should come within five miles of any corporate town or any place where he had once ministered (except when travelling), nor act as a tutor or school-master unless he first took the oath of non-resistance, and swore to attempt no alteration of the constitution in Church or State. It was one of the series of repressive measures popularly known as the "Clarendon Code" (q.v.), and was aimed at depriving the ejected clergy of their means of livelihood, both preaching and teaching.

Flag, HONOUR OF THE. From very early times the English required foreign ships to salute English vessels within the narrow seas by lowering their flag. This question was vehemently contested by their commercial rivals, the Dutch, and was one of the smaller points of the chronic dispute between the two nations in the middle of the seventeenth century. The Dutch admitted the claim in 1673.

Flagellants, THE, were a sect of fanatical enthusiasts of the thirteenth century, who formed special fraternities for the observation of flagellation as a solemn and public religious ceremony. Founded in 1210 by St. Anthony of Padua, this order became widespread through the teaching of Rainieri of Perugia. In the reign of Edward III, 120 of them crossed into England, but their long processions and self-immolation did not produce a single convert.

Flags, THE NATIONAL, are of several kinds. (1) The Royal Standard of England is descended from the arms of William the Conqueror—two leopards on a red field—which persisted until Henry II substituted for them three lions. Edward III first quartered the royal arms, placing the fleur-de-lis in the first and fourth quarters as a symbol of his claim to the French crown. On the accession of James I in 1603 the lion of Scotland and the harp of Ireland were added. William III further added a central shield bearing the arms of Nassau, for which George I substituted the arms of Hanover. These were removed in 1837 on the accession of Victoria. (2) The Union Jack, the national flag of the British Empire, comprises the red crosses of St. George (England) and St. Patrick (Ireland), and the white cross on blue ground of St. Andrew (Scotland). The cross of St. Andrew first appeared on the Union Jack in 1603, on the accession of James I; and that of St. Patrick in 1801, on the Union with Ireland. The Union Jack is the most important and most universal of all the British ensigns. (3) The three Ensigns, originating in the navy: the red ensign is the flag of the British merchant service, according to orders issued in 1707; the white ensign is the flag of the Royal Navy, and may be flown only by vessels of the Royal Navy (with the exception that in 1829 the privilege of flying it was granted to the Royal Yacht Squadron); the blue ensign is the flag of the public service other than the Royal Navy, and of the Royal Naval Reserve. (4) Two other naval flags—the admiralty flag (red, with a yellow anchor in the centre), and the flag of the master of Trinity House (the cross of St. George, with a ship in each quarter and a shield surmounted by a lion in the centre). (5) Colonial and Dominion flags (with the exception of the Union of South Africa) are the same as that of the mother-country, bearing in addition the badge of the colony.

Flambard, RALPH or RANULF (d. 1128), was a Norman of obscure origin, who after Lanfranc's death became the chief minister of William Rufus. To his malign influence may be attributed much of the tyranny and oppression of this reign. He devised new impositions, and enriched himself as well as the king, by keeping the sees and abbeys vacant. Under him the position of justiciar gradually became a definite office. In 1099 he was made Bishop of Durham. On the accession of Henry I he was at once arrested and imprisoned in the Tower, from which, however, he very soon managed to escape, and took refuge in Normandy with Robert, whom he encouraged in his invasion of England. Henry subsequently allowed him to return to his bishopric, where he remained peaceably till his death, occupying himself chiefly in architectural and ecclesiastical works. His character is painted in the darkest characters by the chroniclers. William of Malmesbury says, "If at any time a royal edict was issued that England should pay a certain tribute, it was doubled by this plunderer of the rich, this exterminator of the poor, this confiscator of other men's inheritance. He was an invincible pleader, as unrestrained in his words as in his actions, and equally furious against the meek or the turbulent. Wherefore the king used to laugh and say, 'that he was the only man who knew how to employ his talents in this way, and cared for no one's hatred so long as he could please his master.' ”

Flammock, THOMAS, was a Cornish attorney, whose harangues incited the Cornishmen to revolt, in 1497, against Henry VII's taxation for the Scottish war. He led them on their march to Blackheath, and on the suppression of the revolt was hanged as a traitor.

Flanders, RELATIONS WITH. Nominally a fief of France, Flanders was very early of sufficient importance to have close dealings with England. The name “Baldwinsland,” given by the early English to the country, suggests the frequency of the dynastic relations between the courts. The first Count Baldwin married Judith, the Frankish widow of Ethelwulf of Wessex, and their son married Ælfrith (Elfrida), a daughter of Alfred the Great. Dunstan found in his exile a refuge in a Flemish monastery. Godwin, in 1051, was warmly welcomed by the great Baldwin, whose dealings with England were singularly intimate. He died soon after his son-in-law, William I, had conquered the kingdom. Later in William's reign, Gerbod of Chester and William Fitz-Osbern found captivity and death respectively through warlike intervention in Flemish quarrels. Another Baldwin supported William FitzRobert against his uncle Henry I. Flemish mercenaries and William of Ypres fought for Stephen. Count Philip joined in 1173 the great confederation which the younger Henry had excited against his father Henry II. But gradually the old changing relations settled down into a general friendship, when not only dynastic accidents, but a common policy of alliance against the encroachments of the French kings, and the growing pressure of economic necessities, firmly bound together the two countries. Count Ferdinand joined John and his nephew Otto IV, in the confederacy that was dissolved by the battle of Bouvines (1213). Edward I ended, by the Treaty of Montreuil (1274) with Count Guy, the hostilities between his father and Margaret of Flanders. Guy, on the whole, gave Edward efficient support against Philip the Fair. But the growth of the cloth trade in Flanders had bound its great towns to England, whence came the raw wool which Ghent or Ypres made up into cloth, and the Hanse factories of London and Bruges may have added a further link. On the other hand, the rising power of the towns compelled the Flemish counts to rely on French help; and thus, while the alliance of England and the towns was strengthened, her relations with the counts grew cool. At last, in 1339, Jacob van Artevelde, the Ghent leader, concluded a firm alliance with Edward III against Count Louis and Philip VI, which continued till Artevelde's death, in 1345. The renewed disturbances at Ghent, under Philip van Arte-velde in 1381, were in close analogy and direct connexion with the contemporary revolutionary movement under Wat Tyler, and even Bishop Spencer's crusade against the Clementists practically turned to the help of the Flemish townsmen. But the accession of the Burgundian house to Flanders restored the old friendship of the princes, though partly at the expense of the popular party. In 1496 the treaty styled Magnus Intercursus expelled Perkin Warbeck from Flanders, and allowed full freedom of trade between the two countries. But henceforth Flanders is only a fragment of a larger state. [T. F. T.]

Flavia Cæsariensis was one of the districts into which Roman Britain was divided after the reorganization of the Empire by Diocletian and Constantine. It possibly comprised the North.

Fleet Prison, a famous London jail, a king's prison since the twelfth century, was situated on the east side of Farringdon Street, on the bank of the Fleet rivulet. The Fleet was burnt down by Wat Tyler, and became of great historical interest, as the prison of religious offenders on both sides, under Mary and Elizabeth, and of the victims of the Star Chamber. On the abolition of the Star Chamber, it became a prison for debtors and those committed for contempt. It was burnt during the Fire of 1666, and again in the Gordon riots (1780), and abolished in 1842. In the eighteenth century the Fleet became famous for the irregular marriages contracted there by clergymen of abandoned character, and in prison or within the precincts for debt. Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act (1753) put an end to this abuse.

Fleetwood, CHARLES (d. 1692), the son of Sir Miles Fleetwood, was one of the gentlemen of the Inns of Court who enlisted in the body-guard of the Earl of Essex. He also served in the army of the Eastern Association under Oliver Cromwell. In the New Model he commanded a regiment of horse, and after the capture of Bristol was appointed governor of that place. In May 1646 he became member for Marlborough. He took no part in the king's death, though his brother George sat amongst the judges. In 1650 Fleetwood was lieutenant-general of the army under Cromwell which invaded Scotland. As such, he shared in the victory of Dunbar, and played a very important part in the battle of Worcester. On the death of Ireton, Fleetwood married his widow, Cromwell's daughter Bridget; and, after the commandership-in-chief in Ireland had been refused by Lambert, Fleetwood was appointed to that post (July 1652). In August 1654 he became lord deputy, but was recalled to England in the summer of 1655, probably because he was not sufficiently active in pushing on the transplantation of the Catholics and suppressing the exercise of the Catholic religion.

On his return, he took his place as a member of Cromwell's council, and as one of his major-generals. Notwithstanding his relationship to the protector, he opposed his taking the crown, but accepted a place in his House of Lords. Fleetwood had some expectation of being nominated Cromwell's successor, but, nevertheless, accepted the appointment of Richard Cromwell. However, he headed the party among the officers which wished to make the army independent of the civil power. Their plan was to make Fleetwood commander-in-chief, independent of the protector, and practically a co-ordinate power with him. Not succeeding in this, he and the council of officers forced Richard to dissolve parliament. The Rump, directly it was restored, appointed him commander-in-chief of the land forces in England and Scotland, and one of the Commission of Seven, who were to appoint officers (May 1659); but as they attempted to subject the army to the parliament, he broke up the House (October 1659), and established the "Committee of Safety." Monck's advance, and the spread of disaffection among army and people, obliged Fleetwood to recall the parliament, though Whitelocke very nearly persuaded him to bring back the king instead. He was deprived of his office by parliament, and, after the king's return, perpetually incapacitated from public employment. He died on October 4, 1692.

Fleming, SIR THOMAS (1534-1613), a prominent member of the parliaments of 1601 and 1604, was recorder of London (1594), and solicitor-general the following year. He took part in the trial of the Earl of Essex, and became chief baron of the Exchequer in 1604. Coke calls him "a man of great judgment, integrity, and discretion."

Flemings in England. At various times, large colonies of Flemish settlers have been brought over to England. The close commercial and political relations of the two countries largely occasioned this emigration. Henry I is reputed to have settled Lower and Southern Dyfed with Flemings. He certainly thoroughly expelled the Welsh, and planted the country with Teutonic settlers, who speedily became English, and have remained so to the present time, without any tendency to amalgamate with the surrounding Celts. Not to mention the Flemish mercenaries of Stephen's reign, we find large numbers of Flemish weavers settling in England, especially in the eastern counties, where Norwich became the great seat of the clothing industry. These Flemings taught the English to make up their own wool into cloth, instead of exporting it to the looms of Flanders. Later still, the Reformation led to a large emigration of Flemish Protestants into England.

Fleta is the name usually given to a work on English law based mainly on Bracton and written some time in the reign of Edward I (possibly about 1290). It derives its name from the fact that it was written in the Fleet prison. The intimate acquaintance with the royal court and officials which is displayed by the author suggests that he may have held some office in the king's household.

Fletcher, ANDREW, OF SALTOUN (1655-1716), was educated by Bishop Burnet, then minister of Saltoun. He first appears as commissioner for East Lothian in the Scottish parliament; but his opposition to the court occasioned his outlawry and the confiscation of his estates. In 1685 he engaged in Monmouth's rebellion, but quarrelled with a fellow-officer named Dare, and shot him. Monmouth was obliged to dismiss Fletcher, who withdrew to the continent, and entered the Austrian service against the Turks. In 1688 he joined William of Orange at The Hague, and after the Revolution his estates were restored to him. He soon joined the "Club" (q.v.), a body of politicians who were dissatisfied with the Revolution Settlement in Scotland. Proud of his good family and theoretical Liberalism, Fletcher hated monarchy and democracy: and desired to make Scotland an oligarchical republic, of the Venetian or Bernese type. At this time he published two "Discourses" concerning the affairs of Scotland, in one of which he recommended predial slavery as a remedy for pauperism. He formed a friendship with Paterson, the originator of the Bank of England, and supported his Darien scheme. In Anne's reign he led the "Patriots" in their opposition to the Union. In 1703 he introduced his "Limitations" for Queen Anne's successor, some of which strangely anticipate modern Liberalism, and was a prime mover of the "Bill of Security," which passed in 1704, while the "Limitations" were accepted in 1705. But, finding he could not withstand the Union, he exerted his influence more practically to secure freedom of trade. This attitude, rather than any real connexion with the Jacobite conspiracies, led to his arrest in 1708. On his release he disappeared from public life.

Fletcher, RICHARD (d. 1596), Bishop of London, "a comely and courtly prelate," was made Dean of Peterborough (1583), in which capacity he attended Mary, Queen of Scots, at her execution. He was a great favourite of Elizabeth, by whom he was advanced successively to the sees of Oxford, Worcester and London, but lost her regard on his marriage, for which he was suspended. He was the father of Fletcher the dramatist, and the uncle of Phineas Fletcher the poet.

Fleurus is a small town, fifteen miles west of Namur, famous for several battles, and especially those in 1690 and 1794. In the former engagement (July 1, 1690), the Duke of Luxemburg gained a well-contested victory over the Dutch and Imperialists under the Prince of Waldeck. The latter (June 26, 1794) resulted in a victory for Marshal Jourdan over the Prince of Coburg.

Flodden Field, THE BATTLE OF (September 9, 1513), was fought between James IV of Scotland and the English under the Earl of Surrey. The most noteworthy circumstances of this engagement are: (1) The skilful movement by which the Earl of Surrey succeeded in crossing the river Till, and cutting off all communication between King James and Scotland. (2) The omission of the Scots to take advantage of the favourable moment for attack presented by the passage of the English army over the river. (3) The utter defeat of the English right wing under Sir Edward Howard, and the loss of this success to the Scots through the misconduct of the troops of Earls Huntly and Hume, who, instead of following up their victory, abandoned themselves to pillaging the baggage of both armies. (4) The prowess of the English archers, whose murderous volleys threw the Scottish right, led by Lennox and Argyll, into complete confusion, and rendered their subsequent defeat and ruinous flight a comparatively easy matter. (5) The desperate resistance against overwhelming numbers made by the Scottish centre, and the death of James IV during the heat of the contest. (6) The indecisiveness of the conflict. Notwithstanding reverses elsewhere, and the death of their king, the Scots succeeded in holding Flodden Hill during the night, and only abandoned their position at the dawn of the next day on learning the real state of affairs. Meanwhile, on the English side, the contest had so nearly resulted in a defeat that Surrey was quite unable to prosecute the war with any vigour. The loss of the Scots in this battle was from 11,000 to 12,000 men; that of the English under 2,000. At the commencement of the battle the contending armies mustered respectively 30,000 and 32,000 men.

Flood, HENRY (1732-91), was an illegitimate son of Warden Flood, chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland. He studied at Dublin and at Oxford, and in 1759 entered the Irish parliament as member for Kilkenny; and about 1761 he became the idol of the Irish patriots. In 1767 he successfully opposed an attempt made by the government to increase the Irish army. In 1773 he was the most vigorous supporter of the Absentee Tax, and the real leader of the opposition to the Castle. In 1774, however, he came to terms with Lord Harcourt, the lord-lieutenant, and finally contented himself with a vice-treasurership, a sinecure of £3,500 a year. In 1779 he again deserted the government, and advocated free trade. In 1781 he attacked the Castle expenditure. His name was now struck off the list of privy councillors, and he lost his place. He then tried to supplant Grattan, and recover his old position, but was twice defeated. In 1782 he stood forth as a defender of Protestant ascendancy. When Grattan was rewarded for his services, Flood's friends tried to get a reward for him also, but failed, and a bitter personal attack on Grattan being unsuccessful, he left Ireland for England. In 1783 he returned. Another quarrel with Grattan would have ended in a duel if they had not both been ordered into custody. Flood now took the part of the volunteers, and agitated for a Reform Bill: he was, however, averse to the Catholic claims. In November 1784 his great motion for reform was defeated, and his influence continuing to decline, he again went to England in 1787. Since 1785 he had had a seat in the English parliament, but he was little appreciated, and a motion for reform brought forward by him in 1790 was a failure.

"Florida," THE, was a ship built in Birkenhead (nominally for the use of the Italian government), whose activities produced strained relations between Great Britain and the United States during the American Civil War (1861-4). The Florida slipped out of the Mersey despite warnings from the United States to the British government that her real purpose was that of a Confederate privateer, and captured 15 vessels within the next three months, 13 of which she destroyed. The damage done by the Florida was included in the Geneva Award with the Alabama and other claims. [GENEVA AWARD.]

Floyd's Case (1621). Floyd was a Catholic barrister, who, in prison, had uttered disrespectful language against the Elector Palatine and his wife. Parliament, then sitting, and disgusted at James I's obstinate aversion to their zeal for the cause of the Palatine, inflicted on Floyd a heavy fine, together with whipping, the pillory, branding, and imprisonment. The Commons took the initiative, but the Lords inflicted the sentence. This case illustrates the indefinite right of parliament to exercise jurisdiction even over those not its members, and for offences not directly against the House.

"Flying Squadron" (Squadronne volante) is the name of a party of Scottish politicians, formed about 1705. It was borrowed from the famous "Flying Squadron" of independent cardinals during the previous generation at the papal court. Lord Tweeddale was the leader of this new party, which, by keeping close together, and joining first one side and then the other in the Union debates, had for some time a good deal of power. It had the fate of the Union question in its own hands, and its adhesion to the cause of the government in 1706 secured the triumph of that measure.

Foley, PAUL (1645 ?-99), a Tory politician in the reign of William III, began his political career as a Whig, but about 1690 became a Tory. He was so wealthy—his father was a successful ironmaster—that it was unnecessary for him to follow law as a profession; but he had studied it carefully as a science. He paraded his independence and disinterestedness rather ostentatiously. In 1695 he was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, and was again re-elected at the close of the year. In 1696 he proposed the establishment of the Land Bank.

Foliot, GILBERT (d. 1187), was a monk of Cluny, and became, first, Abbot of Gloucester, then Bishop of Hereford, 1147, and, subsequently, of London, 1163. He is mainly remarkable by his zeal for the cause of Henry II, and in the disputes with Becket was sent to Sens by the king in 1164 to represent his case to the pope. At Argentan in 1167 he renewed his plaint and was excommunicated by Becket, but the pope withdrew the sentence; a second excommunication shortly afterwards followed, but the pope again granted him absolution, on the mediation of Henry. He participated, with the Archbishop of York, in the coronation of the young Henry in June 1170, and for this was again excommunicated by Becket, after the latter's nominal reconciliation with the king. The anger felt by Henry on receiving the news of Becket's act resulted in the murder of the latter, and such was the horror aroused, that the sentence on Foliot was not relaxed until 1172. He was a man of learning, and his letters are of considerable value, but he has been traduced without mercy by the partisans of Becket.

Folkland, Bookland, Laenland, are terms which stand for the three principal forms of land ownership under Anglo-Saxon law. Out of folkland specific grants of bookland (or bocland) and laenland were made which constituted in many cases the estates held later by the great landowners under the manorial forms. The word "folkland" has only survived in one or two instances and these are of the late ninth and tenth centuries. The form may be regarded as representing the primitive kind of land ownership in England. It was land held not, as was for a long time supposed, by the community, but by individuals according to the tribal or customary rules of family inheritance. At a time when folkland was regarded by investigators as having a public character, various words were used to describe species of private property (in reality held by folkright) which could not be identified as bookland. According to Vinogradoff, "the folkland is what our scholars have called ethel and aïod and family land and yrfe-land; it is held under the old restrictive common law, the law which keeps land in families, as contrasted with land which is held under a book, under a privilegium modelled on Roman precedents, . . . and making for free alienation and individualism." The occupiers of folkland evidently varied in the degree of freedom under which they lived. In some parts, in the east and north, they were servants to no landlord, but they were subject to services and taxation and owed the trinoda necessitas. In the south the independence was not so marked, but the local customary law still governed the tenure of folkland.

The strict rules of inheritance rendered folkland an unsatisfactory mode of land-holding to those who wished to alienate land, whether permanently or for a term of years, so a system of grants was instituted whereby the obstacle was overcome. More than a thousand of these land-books or charters are extant for the period between the days of Ethelbert and the Conquest. The earliest grants of bookland are nearly all made by the king to ecclesiastical beneficiaries together with the various rights that appertained, e.g., claims to military service, jurisdiction, taxation. For customary law were substituted the rules which the new charters established. So frequent and widespread did these ecclesiastical grants become under the urge of the royal conscience, that a scarcity was felt when land was required for rewarding and endowing laymen, and even then the formula of conveyance retained a pious terminology which makes curious reading in the granting of land and privileges in imitation of the forms established by the ecclesiastical land-book. Bookland can be distinguished from folkland in several ways. The grantee may be given permission to dispose of it freely by his will; the charter gives the law to which the land is subject; and the land could be made exempt from customary dues and services, e.g., in the case of some ecclesiastical grants. The effect of the institution on the status of the rent-paying freeman was to depress it, for the personal link which connected the individual on the land and the king in matters of service and jurisdiction was broken by the intrusion of an intermediary. He became subject to a territorial lord.

Laenland was a grant of more temporary nature. Parcels of laenland were often conveyed by the Church, itself a grantee of bookland, as loans for a number of lives, to thegns, and even to the king. The terms vary. The grant may take the form of a temporary gift; services may be required, or partially dispensed with; rent may be paid; or a lump sum may secure the lease. Failure to fulfil the tenant's obligations often involved forfeiture. Records survive to show that the careful Bishop Oswald of Worcester (961-72) took considerable trouble to superintend the administration of his lands. Seventy grants have been found in which we observe him making land-loans for the period of three lives (two of which may be chosen by the first life) to his thegns. At the end of the term the lands are to revert to the Church. In return the tenants are to pay church-scots, tolls for sales and purchases which they conduct, ride on the bishop's errands, and perform other services.

Bookland and laenland both depended on a written deed of conveyance. The laen was the later form and imitated the book grant in some of its features. The king would grant land with or without obligations by book and the grantee would employ the more elastic possibilities of the laen in granting portions of his estate to his sub-tenant. The grant of bookland was, of course, employed also by others than the king.

Fontenoy, THE BATTLE OF (May 11, 1745), was fought during the Austrian Succession War, and resulted in a victory for the French. The Duke of Cumberland advanced with 50,000 British, Dutch, and Austrian troops to relieve Tournay, besieged by Marshal Saxe. The French, while continuing the siege, took up a very strong position south of the town to cover their operations. On their right was the Scheldt, along their front a steep and narrow valley, at their left a wood with forts. This strong position the allies attempted to take. The Dutch under the Prince of Waldeck, after a spiritless attempt had failed, withdrew from the field. But the mass of the British and Hanoverian troops won the heights opposite them; and if supported by the Dutch, must have retained their position. As it was, fresh troops from the French side gradually forced them to retire, with a steadiness as great as that displayed during their advance. The capture of Tournay followed this French victory; but it was the withdrawal of troops to Scotland to oppose the Pretender rather than the effects of Fontenoy that made the subsequent campaign in Flanders so disastrous for the allies.

Foreign Enlistment Act, THE (1819), forbade British subjects to take service with a foreign state without royal licence, and prohibited the equipment within British dominions of ships to be used against a power with which Great Britain was at peace. It was specially suspended to allow Sir de Lacy Evans to raise a British Legion (q.v.) against the Carlists in Spain in 1835. The Alabama and other affairs led to some trials in 1862 and 1863, the proceedings of which showed that the act required amendment. This was done by a new Foreign Enlistment Act, passed in 1870.

Foreign Legion, THE, was conceived by Prince Albert during the Crimean War, and in accordance with the Prince Consort's suggestion instructions were issued to British ambassadors and ministers abroad to recruit men for the Crimea. The result was a series of collisions with foreign governments, particularly that of the United States, where Crampton, the British minister (q.v.), was dismissed for his zeal. In the end only a few Swiss and other foreigners were recruited.

Foreign Office, THE, is a department of state created in 1782. Before that date foreign affairs had been administered by a dual secretariat, Europe being divided for convenience into two parts and policy directed by a secretary of state for the Northern and a secretary for the Southern Department. During the Rockingham administration of 1782 the Southern Department became the Home Office (q.v.) and the Northern Department the Foreign Office. Charles James Fox, the first foreign secretary, moved the establishment from Whitehall to Cleveland Row, whence it was transferred to the Whitehall Cockpit in 1786, and in 1793 to Downing Street, where it has remained ever since (save for a short period when it was removed for structural alterations—1856 to 1868). The use of English instead of French in official correspondence with foreign representatives in London was introduced by Grenville in 1800. "The first event in the constitutional history of the Foreign Office" occurred in 1850, when Queen Victoria addressed to Palmerston her famous memorandum stipulating that questions of foreign policy should be settled by the foreign secretary in consultation and not on his own initiative (August 12). The Foreign Office staff includes a permanent under-secretary, a parliamentary under-secretary, assistant under-secretaries, a librarian (the superintendent of the foreign service messengers, of whom there were 38 in 1822 and 16 in 1922), a head of the treaty department, and a staff of clerks (for whom qualifying examinations were instituted in 1856 by Lord Granville, who later, 1881, established second division clerks). The legal adviser to the Foreign Office was created in 1886, and the first typist was appointed in 1889 by Lord Salisbury. Four new departments arose during the Great War—the Ministry of Blockade, the War Intelligence Department, the Political Intelligence Department, and the Historical Section. By 1922 the diplomatic establishments and the Foreign Office had become fused into one foreign service.

Forest, MILES, was one of the murderers of Edward V and his brother Richard in 1483. As a reward he was made keeper of the wardrobe at Barnard Castle; but after the death of Richard III he took sanctuary, where, according to Sir Thomas More, he "piecemeal rotted away."

Forests. Forest, from the Norman Conquest to the Commonwealth, bore the technical signification of Crown land reserved for the purposes of the chase, and, as such, cultivated and inhabited on sufferance if at all. A forest was defined as containing eight things: soil, covert, laws, courts, judges, officers, game, bounds. It comprised both "vert"—i.e., trees, underwood, and turf—and "venison"—i.e., the hart, the hind, the hare, the boar, the wolf, which are beasts of forest; the buck, doe, fox, marten, which are beasts of chase; the rabbit, pheasant, partridge, quail, mallard, heron, etc., which are beasts and fowls of warren. The land subject to forest law need not be all wooded, e.g., Cornwall was "forest" under John. [The open moorland of Dartmoor is still called "forest" to-day.] But the forest districts did, of course, mainly coincide with the great woods which, in old days, had made even the Roman roads deflect from a straight course, and which had then, under Roman rule, been cleared away by the legionary, the metal-worker, the citizen, the peasant, to grow up again in time to check the advances of Angles and Saxons, to force this advance to take certain lines, and to limit its first results to the establishment, at least in Mid-England, of petty and isolated "folks." Thus the West Saxons found their natural boundaries determined by Andredes Weald on the east, by Selwood on the west, as decisively as by the Thames and the sea on the north and on the south. Kentish folk, East Saxons, and East Angles were cut off from each other by marsh and wood; so were Mid-Angles from West Angles, Deirans from Bernicians; while along the Severn, in the Peak district, and in the hills of the kingdom of Elmet, the nature of the ground long barred the way westward, and from the Clyde to the Parret the Welsh confronted the invaders in a long continuous line until the seventh century. The mighty Andredes Weald, even in Bæda's day, lay stretched for 120 miles from Hampshire to the Medway. The Wire Wood covered what are now Worcestershire, Shropshire, and Staffordshire, as Arden once covered Warwickshire. Epping Forest was part of a greater whole, which extended from London nearly to the Wash, as another such region from the Peak to the Trent; from the Peak to the Tees was little but desert; from Tees to Tyne was one great forest in St. Cuthbert's days. These great woods were being rapidly cleared or opened out, when the Norman kings came and largely increased them; as by the depopulating and "afforesting" a district containing twenty-two churches, to form [an addition to some twelve square miles of deserted country, which were made into what was called the New Forest. Under Henry I the whole of Essex was subject to the Forest Law, an introduction of the Norman kings, probably from Normandy, for the protection of the king's game. Cruel penalties were inflicted for hunting the royal deer.] The so-called Forest Laws of Canute, a palpable forgery of the twelfth century, probably represent the state of things under Henry I; they make it capital "to kill a stag as to kill a man"; merely to hunt a deer was punished by the lash, if the offender were a villein; if a freeman, by a heavy fine. Within the forest bounds, no bows were to be carried without a licence, no dogs were to be kept but mastiffs, and those to be "lawed" by cutting off the claws of each forefoot. [Suspected poachers were arrested on suspicion, and blinding and mutilation were practised on those who were convicted of stealing game. The execution of an offender seems to have been an exceptional occurrence.] Even Edward I allows a trespasser who should resist the hue and cry to be lawfully slain, and requires a solemn inquest and verdict to be taken upon the body of a dead stag. The same jealous watch was exercised over "vert" as over "venison." The forest courts and officers, under the hand of Henry II, were modelled on a plan which bears a faint resemblance to the shire system, to which they stood as it were as rivals. The Court of Reguard was indeed held only every three years, for the "lawing" of dogs, agistment of cattle, etc. [and the investigation of offences against the rules of Forest Law. It was held in anticipation of the coming of the itinerant justices; for the Forest Eyre was also a triennial event. This last court gave final judgment. The Swainmote, which has been compared to the County Court, was composed of foresters and was, in fact, of no considerable importance, attending only to practical matters such as the protection of the deer during the fawning season. Minor offences were tried in the Court of Attachment, which met as a rule every six weeks and could impose fines. More serious cases were reserved for the justices of the forest]. This last office was abolished in 57 George III, the criminal law of the forest having already been almost wholly repealed in 7 George III.

Nothing stood more in the way of that alliance between the king and the English people against the Norman baronage—that alliance on which hung, for more than a century and a half, the very existence of the throne—than this tyrannous forest system. Even in his great need, in the very charter by which he purchased his accession, Henry I insists on retaining his father's forests; and Stephen, too, who gave up everything, could not bring himself to keep his promise of giving up the forests which Henry I had added. Henry II developed them [into an organization under a master forester, supported by a number of chief foresters for the different localities]. John was forced into an engagement to give up those added by himself, and "to consider the extensions made by his father and brother." [An attempt by the barons to destroy forest jurisdiction altogether was resisted, but in 1217 the young Henry's advisers issued the Charter of the Forests by which the royal rights were curtailed, and the penalties of death and mutilation were finally abandoned. One of the complaints made at the Oxford Parliament in 1258 was that the engagements of John and Henry III had not been carried out.] It was not until the last year of the century that the often-promised "perambulation" was made, and the forest bounds reduced, by a strict inquiry between the royal officers and the local representatives. It was characteristic of the short-sightedness of the Stuart kings that they revived this old source of discontent. Traces are to be found under James I of attempts to restore the old claims in their fullness, and at last Noy's bullying chicanery won a suicidal victory in the decisions of 1633-7, which inquired into all alterations made since John and Henry II, and undid much of the "perambulation" of 1300.

The forest policy of the earlier kings is not to be explained by a royal infatuation for the pleasures of the chase. The forests, in fact, offered to the king (1) a revenue, (2) an armed force, (3) a jurisdiction altogether outside the ever-narrowing circle of his constitutional position. Thus (1) the Crown derived considerable profits from such rights as the "pannage" of swine and the agistment of cattle within these vast domains; the "chiminagium," or tax on carts which came to take fuel, charcoal, or bark; the "pleas" of the forest courts, and the fines on offenders. But too often the forests were treated as an inexhaustible treasury, wherefrom to make grants to courtiers. Again

(2), the host of stewards, foresters, reguadors, agistors, woodreeves, and bailiffs were a rude substitute for a standing army and a royal police. (3) The code of forest law, too, stood out in relief from the common law; what was "not justice in itself, was justice according to the forest law," and these courts could enforce an attendance even from the great lord who claimed a franchise superior to hundred and shire moot, even from the clergy, who could in other cases appeal to their ordinary. They were, indeed, as Henry II's treasurer calls them, "the shrine and bower of kingship," a royal counterpoise at once to the baronial "liberty" and the popular "shire-moot," an imperium in imperio. The king claimed a supervision over the very parks and woodlands of his earls and barons, bishops and abbots, whether within a forest's bounds or not. "A subject," says Coke, "cannot have more than a chase, unless by express grant, first, of the privilege of a royal forest, and then of the jurisdiction belonging thereto."

To a people feeling the ordinary courts an irksome burden, the added duty of attendance at the forest courts must have seemed intolerable. And yet, till Magna Carta, this was enforced, probably in more than half the shires on all alike, whether dwellers in forest bounds or not. In the Forest Charter of 1217 concessions are made which show how well grounded the complaints were; the swainmote is to be convened not more than three times a year, and the Court of Attachment every forty days; the necessary officers and parties alone are bound to attend. The keepers of royal castles are forbidden to hold forest pleas; the same rules henceforth are to be binding on the barons' and prelates' conduct to their mesne vassals.

The forests reached their widest extent in the reign of John. Not merely were there such woods as Delamere, Windsor, Whittlebury, Dean, the New Forest, Andred, Sherwood, Selwood, Arden, and such hill districts as the Chilterns, the Peak, Exmoor, Dartmoor, the Yorkshire Wolds; but whole counties were reckoned as forests, and subject to forest law, e.g., Devonshire, Cornwall, Essex, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Lancashire. [Before the disafforestments which were carried out by the Plantagenet kings (culminating in the reign of Edward I) there were only six counties which contained no forest, out of a total of thirty-nine. The free areas included Kent and East Anglia.] Edward I's concessions then "disforested" an immense proportion of lands hitherto included, perhaps two-thirds of the whole. But Henry VIII added Hampton Court, the royal rights still weighed on twenty counties in the Tudor reigns, and the number of royal forests was still reckoned at sixty-eight in the eighteenth century. The Commonwealth Commission, which sat to carry out the remedial act of 1641, did not act on the suggestion made for a complete sale of them; but the reductions it effected were not wholly lost at the Restoration. Most of the forest laws, and many of the forest dues, became obsolete. And now the people began to encroach upon the Crown. When investigation was made at the end of the eighteenth century, and early in the nineteenth, it was found that endless unlicensed enclosures had been effected; iniquitous transfers made under colour of sale; timber was stolen, mines neglected, plantations mismanaged; officials had transformed themselves into owners; and there were only twenty forests which could supply timber for the navy. But under the provision of several acts of George III, and the Consolidating Act of 10 George IV, c. 50, a better system of management was inaugurated about 1809. Twelve of the twenty royal forests then remaining were re-enclosed and replanted, and a commission appointed in 1838 gradually simplified their organization, and improved their yield, till, fifty years later, the eight royal forests which remained yielded an average profit of £8,000 a year, as against an actual loss in 1846-7-8, due to former mismanagement. Some have been sold, as Sherwood to the Duke of Grafton, and some opened out to agriculture, as large parts of Windsor. The Office of Woods and Forests was separated from the department of public works in 1851. This by no means represents the whole result of their work, for much of the old forest domains are now classed as Crown lands, and on the whole estates of the department the revenue has risen from £250,000, in 1853, to over £650,000 (1920-1), a sum which is half as large again as the king's civil list. It is singular that in this way those royal demesne lands, of which the forests once formed the main part, after straining the relations between Crown and people for centuries, and assisting unduly to magnify the prerogative, while they soon failed to add to its real strength, or materially to aid the exchequer, have at last been made to cover the cost of the monarch's establishment [although they are now treated not as the personal property of the Crown, but as the lands of the state. They are administered by two commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenues, one of whom is usually the minister of agriculture].

Forfeiture of Lands. (1) FOR TREASON. The earliest law of treason, that of Alfred, enacted that if a man plotted against the king's life he should be "liable in his life and in all that he has"; and in the first detailed discussion of the subject, that of Bracton (temp. Henry III), forfeiture is set down as one of the penalties. From this period the law was unchanging until 1870. The traitor, of whatsoever lord he held, forfeited to the Crown for ever all his freehold lands, whether entailed or not, all rights to freehold lands which he then had or might afterwards acquire, and all interests in land for life or other term of years. Sentence of forfeiture was retroactive as far as the date of the act of treason; it therefore annulled all deeds of conveyance, etc., which might have been made since, but did not affect a wife's jointure which had been settled on her previously. Dower, on the other hand, was forfeited by 5 and 6 Edward VI. As forfeiture was a consequence of attainder, if the rebel was killed on the field, executed by martial law, or died before judgment was pronounced, his lands were not forfeited. In Scotland conviction for treason did not bring with it forfeiture of entailed lands. At the Union it was thought necessary to make the law uniform in England and Scotland, but as this met with much opposition from the Scots, it was enacted (7 Anne) that though for the present forfeiture should follow treason in Scotland as in England, it should cease in both countries upon the death of the then Pretender. After a second act immediately before the rebellion of '45 had secured the continuance of the penalty, the whole clause relating to the ultimate cessation of forfeiture was abolished by 39 George III. (2) FOR MURDER. The criminal forfeited to the Crown only the profits of his entailed estates, and the possession for a year and a day with right of "waste" of lands in fee simple. After this the lands escheated to the lord. Possession by the Crown for a year and a day originally followed all convictions for felony, though it became customary to pay a composition to prevent the use of the right of entry. By 54 George III forfeiture for a year and a day was abolished for all felonies except treason and murder, and finally the Felony Act of 1870 abolished attainder and its consequent forfeiture altogether. Forfeiture of goods and chattels followed conviction for any felony, and did not need, as in the case of lands, to be preceded by attainder. This also was abolished in 1870. [ESCHEAT.] [W. J. A.]

Forman, ANDREW (d. 1522), was a Scottish ecclesiastic and statesman of the early part of the sixteenth century. He became Bishop of Moray; was ambassador to ratify the alliance of Scotland and England at the accession of Henry VIII, but soon after attached himself to France; was made Archbishop of Bourges; and persuaded James IV to begin the war of 1513 against England. In 1515 he was made Archbishop of St. Andrews at the request of Albany. In 1517 he became one of the council of regency in Albany's absence.

Fornham St. Genevieve, THE BATTLE OF (1173), was one of the victories won by Henry II over the rebellious barons who allied themselves with the French king. Here Robert de Beaumont and his Flemish mercenaries were totally defeated by the justiciar, Richard de Lucy. Fornham is two miles from Bury St. Edmunds.

Forrest, JOHN (1474-1538), was an Observant Friar and confessor to Katharine of Aragon, a strong opponent of her divorce and of the royal supremacy, and was executed in 1538, being hung in chains over a slow fire, so that his "treason" and heresy should both receive their legal punishment.

Forster, SIR JOHN, was sent in 1565, in conjunction with the Earl of Bedford, on a mission to Mary, Queen of Scots, on behalf of the Earl of Moray. In the rebellion of the northern earls, 1569, he did good service on the royal side, and in the following year harried Teviotdale. In 1572 he was charged, as warden of the Middle Marches, with the duty of superintending the execution of Thomas, Earl of Northumberland. In 1585 he was taken prisoner by Ker of Ferniehurst, the warden of the Scottish Marches, near Riccarton.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Forster, WILLIAM EDWARD (1818-86), was educated at the Friends' School, Tottenham. In 1861 he was returned to parliament as Liberal member for Bradford, and in Lord Russell's administration he was under-secretary for the colonies (1865). As vice-president of the committee of council on education he passed the Education Bill (1870) through the Commons. On Gladstone's retirement in 1874 he was one of the candidates for the Liberal leadership, but resigned in Lord Hartington's favour. In 1880 he became chief secretary for Ireland, but resigned in 1882 on Parnell's release. He ardently supported the Northern cause in the American War of Secession, took a middle course in the Eastern question (1876-8) and was keenly interested in Imperial Federation.

Fort Duquesne was the most celebrated of the ring of forts built by the French about the middle of the eighteenth century (1754) to connect Louisiana with Canada. It was situated in the upper valley of the Ohio. Against it, in 1755, General Braddock led his ill-fated expedition; but shortly after, the English conquered the fort and renamed it Pittsburg, in honour of the great war minister. It is now, under its new name, an important seat of the American iron and coal trades.

Fort Erie, on Lake Ontario, was besieged and taken by the British troops, under Sir Gordon Drummond, after the battle of Lundy's Lane, in September 1814, during the American War.

Fort George, on Lake Ontario, near Niagara, was the scene of frequent skirmishes during the American War of 1812-14. In 1813 it was taken by the Americans from General Vincent, and was again invested by General Brown in the following year.

Fort St. George. [MADRAS.]

Fort Teviot, five miles south of Perth, was the capital of the old Pictish kingdom.

Fort William, close to Inverlochy in south Inverness-shire, commands the sea entry to the Highlands, and was begun in 1690 by General Hugh Mackay. It was successfully attacked by the Jacobites in 1715 and 1745.

Fort William. [CALCUTTA.]

Fortescue, SIR JOHN (d. after 1476), was descended from an old Devonshire family, and in 1442 was made chief justice of the King's Bench. He was a strong partisan of the Lancastrian cause, and in the first parliament of Edward IV was attainted of high treason. He fled to Scotland, and afterwards to Flanders and France, where he became the tutor of the young Prince Edward, for whose instruction he wrote his famous work, "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ." He was present at the battle of Tewkesbury, and was taken prisoner, but in 1473 obtained a reversal of his attainder by retracting what he had written against Edward IV's title to the Crown. His book on the governance of England is of much interest, from its picture of a constitutional ideal that had almost been realized in the preceding generation.

"Forties," THE, was a name given to the Irish forty-shilling freeholders in the early part of the nineteenth century. The Irish election law had never been altered, and in old days, when the landowners could depend on their tenantry, it had been a favourite practice with them to increase their tenants, in order to have more voters under their control. In 1826, however, in two cases the voters followed the priests and O'Connell, and threw out two landlords' candidates. In 1828 they returned O'Connell for Clare. In 1829, however, the Emancipation Act was accompanied by a measure raising the franchise to £10, thus sweeping the "Forties" away. O'Connell was much blamed for not raising his voice on their behalf, but he was probably afraid to endanger Emancipation.

B. Ward, "Eve of Catholic Emancipation," 1911.

Fortrenn was a province of Celtic Scotland, apparently comprising the districts of Menteith and Strathorne, and extending from the Forth to the Tay. After the re-establishment of the Pictish power by the victory of Nechtansmere, the name Fortrenn seems to have been used as synonymous with the kingdom of the Picts.

Fosterage, THE CUSTOM OF. It was the custom of the Irish chiefs and nobles to send their children, especially their sons, to be fostered in some other family. The Irish in mediæval times were remarkable for their affection for their foster-children, and Giraldus Cambrensis goes so far as to say "that the Irish loved their foster-children, and were cruel to their own relations." Fosterage was one of the chief means by which the Irish influenced their conquerors, and the Statute of Kilkenny (q.v.) in 1366, and several other statutes, were passed to prevent this form of degeneracy. Sir John Davies says of it, "Yet in Ireland they put away all their children to fosterage, the potent and rich men selling, the meaner sort buying, the nursing of children, and the reason is because, in the opinion of this people, fosterage hath always been a stronger alliance than blood, and the foster-children do love and are beloved of their foster-fathers and sept more than of their own natural parents and kindred, and do participate their means more frankly, and do adhere to them with more affection and constancy." The Statute of Kilkenny made fosterage with the Irish high treason, but the custom still obtained in Cromwell's time.

Fotheringay Castle, in Northamptonshire, was founded after the Norman Conquest by Simon de Liz, and subsequently rebuilt by Edmund Langley, Duke of York. In 1452 it was the scene of the birth of Richard III. After the discovery of Babington's plot, Mary, Queen of Scots, was confined (1586), tried, and executed (1587) here. The castle was demolished by order of James I.

O. Bede, "Fotheringay and Mary, Queen of Scots," 1886.

Fougères, THE CAPTURE OF (1449), was made by a body of English troops with the connivance of the Dukes of Somerset and Suffolk in flagrant violation of the truce which had been made between England and France. Fougères, which is situated in Brittany, close to the frontiers of Normandy and Maine, was at this time a place of great wealth, and by its capture the English obtained enormous booty, but the glaring breach of faith threw the Duke of Brittany into the arms of France, and hastened the expulsion of the English from Normandy, completed in 1450.

J. Gairdner, Introduction to "Paston Letters," 1904.

Fourmigni, THE BATTLE OF (1450), was one of the last battles of the Hundred Years' War, and was fought between a body of English troops who had been sent into France under Sir Thomas Kyriel to reinforce the Duke of Somerset, and the French under Richemont. The English were defeated with great slaughter; between three and four thousand were left dead on the field, and Kyriel was taken prisoner. This defeat decided the fate of Normandy, which was reconquered by the French in the course of the same year.

Fowler, HENRY HARTLEY, 1ST VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON (1830-1911), entered parliament as member for Wolverhampton in 1880. In 1884 he took office as under-secretary of the home office; in 1886 he became financial secretary to the treasury, and was sworn of the privy council. In 1892 he entered the cabinet as president of the local government board, and gained great increase of reputation by the skill with which he piloted the complicated Parish Councils Bill. In 1894 he was secretary for India, and on the fall of the government in 1895 was created G.C.S.I. He became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster in 1905, and was appointed lord president of the council and raised to the peerage in 1908. He resigned in 1909.

Fox, CHARLES JAMES (1749-1806), was the third son of Henry Fox, afterwards Lord Holland. Educated at Eton and Oxford, he afterwards travelled on the continent, and while still in Italy he was returned as M.P. for Midhurst, as a supporter of Lord North. His success was immediate, and was the more readily assured since he took the side of the majority. His brilliant and reckless support was rewarded by his appointment in February 1770 as a junior lord of the admiralty (under Lord North). This position he retained for two years, and then, after attacking Lord North with much warmth on the Church Nullum Tempus Bill, in February 1772, he resigned, and thus felt himself at liberty to oppose the Royal Marriage Act. He was again taken into the ministry as a lord of the treasury; but his fiery spirit was too independent to allow him to remain long in any subordinate post. He instituted a mutiny in the government ranks, which resulted in Lord North's defeat. Henceforth, his great social influence and greater debating powers were enlisted on the Whig side. He openly opposed Lord North's ministry, especially in regard to its American policy, and at once became a recognized leader of the Whigs, and a close friend of Burke, whose views he now began to share. In 1779 he made a most violent attack upon Lord Sandwich, the first lord of the admiralty, and moved that he might be excluded from the king's councils. He had now come to be the acknowledged leader of the opposition in the House of Commons; and was selected by the Radical electors of Westminster as their champion along with Admiral Rodney. He still continued to attack the ministry with the fiercest invectives, and even threatened Lord North with impeachment. In 1782 Lord Rockingham formed a cabinet, in which Fox was one of the secretaries of state. With Lord Rockingham's death in July, Fox's share in the government came to an end. He distrusted Shelburne, and would not serve under him. Before a year was passed, Shelburne, unable to withstand the strictures with which Fox greeted his peace proposals, resigned; and Fox became the colleague of Lord North, as secretary of state, under the nominal lead of the Duke of Portland. An alliance so unnatural could not last long, and the government was defeated on Fox's India Bill, chiefly through the king's influence. After the dismissal of the coalition ministry, Pitt came in with a minority to back him; but Fox did much to ruin the cause of his party by the factious and violent opposition which he offered to all Pitt's measures. Pitt soon became firmly established in his position; but Fox continued to harass him with attacks at every point. He opposed his India Bill, and tried to make capital out of Pitt's measures for the relief of Ireland. In 1786 he obtained a splendid opportunity of displaying his eloquence and abilities in the prosecution of Warren Hastings; but in this great trial he seems to have been eclipsed by his illustrious companions. Two years later he warmly espoused the unconstitutional position desired by the Prince of Wales on the question of the Regency Bill, but he was baffled by the patient resolution of Pitt. In 1789 came the news of the destruction of the Bastille. Fox at once hailed with delight what he deemed the uprising of an oppressed people. In 1792 he passed the celebrated Libel Bill. With greatly diminished following, Fox still continued to watch with sympathy and enthusiasm the course of the Revolution in France, and furiously opposed the notion of war with that country. In 1795 he employed his most vehement eloquence in opposing in vain the Sedition and Treason Bills. Seeing that he could effect nothing, Fox retired in 1797 into domestic privacy at St. Anne's Hill. In 1804, on the resignation of Addington, Pitt, well aware of his difficulties, was very anxious to form a cabinet on a broad basis, where faction might be sunk in patriotism. With this object in view he desired the co-operation of Fox; but the king would not hear of it. On January 23, 1806, Pitt died, and the king at length overcame his prejudices and had recourse to the opposition, out of which a ministry was formed with Lord Grenville as prime minister, and Fox as foreign secretary. Fox now abandoned his passionate longing for peace with France before the necessity of saving Europe; and in his efforts to achieve this object he was as resolute as Pitt. But Napoleon took advantage of his still strong desire for peace to carry out his own schemes for the conquest of Europe; and the fatal indecision of the ministry left Prussia unaided to oppose Napoleon's combinations, and to be defeated at Jena. Death, however, came to Fox just in time to save him from witnessing the overthrow of his most cherished hopes. While negotiations were still pending between Great Britain, France, and Russia, Fox died, September 13, 1806. To a real passion for liberty, very unusual with eighteenth-century Whigs, Fox added honesty, manliness, and consummate eloquence. His sweet disposition effaced the memory of his private irregularities; his general straightforwardness atoned for occasional factiousness.

Fox, GEORGE (1624-91), Founder of the Society of Friends or Quakers, was born at Fenny Drayton, Leicestershire, and began to address meetings of Baptists and others in different parts of the midlands in 1647, preaching with "few, but powerful and piercing words," and gathering to him a staunch following. The first recorded meeting of Friends occurred at Little Eaton, near Derby, in 1648. They called themselves "Friends of Truth," but in 1650 acquired the nickname "Quakers," from Fox's admonition to the Derby magistrates to "tremble at the Word of the Lord." In a very short time they numbered thousands, drawn mostly from the lower middle class. Fox organized them with the help of his wife, Margaret Fell, and undertook missionary journeys throughout the whole of the British Isles with untiring energy, visiting also North America (1671-2) and Holland (1677 and 1684). He died on January 13, 1691, in London. [FRIENDS, THE SOCIETY OF.]

Fox, HENRY, 1ST BARON HOLLAND (1705-1774), younger son of Sir Stephen Fox, was a political disciple of Walpole. In 1743 he became a lord of the treasury, under the Pelham administration, and on Lord Granville's failure to form a ministry he was appointed secretary for war. But dissensions sprang up among the ministry, and he violently opposed Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act. On the death of Pelham, his brother, the Duke of Newcastle, attempted to form a government. It was difficult to find a leader of the Commons. Newcastle applied to Fox, as Pitt was obnoxious to the king. But they quarrelled about the disposal of patronage; and Sir Thomas Robinson (q.v.), a man of little influence, was made leader of the Commons. Next month, however, Newcastle secured Fox's services by making him secretary of state, and removing Robinson. Fox soon quarrelled with his chief; and believing that the blame for the loss of Minorca was to be cast on his shoulders, he resigned, in 1756, and was shortly followed by Newcastle. It was hoped that he and Pitt would unite and form an administration; but his quarrel with Pitt, caused by his acceptance of office in 1754, was too serious. However, after the failure of Pitt's first administration, Fox accepted the subordinate position of paymaster of the forces, whereby he lost even a seat in the cabinet but secured a large income. On the accession of George III he joined Lord Bute in his attack on the Whigs, and deliberately set to work to buy a majority in the House. The paymaster's office became a shop for the purchase of votes. It is said that £25,000 was thus expended in one morning. But the whole feeling of the Commons was against him, and his colleagues refused to support him. Hints of bribery were freely thrown out, and he became thoroughly unpopular. "He had always been regarded as a Whig of the Whigs." On the sudden resignation of Bute, he retired to the House of Lords as Lord Holland. He continued to hold office for two more years, but he had ceased to play any part in politics. In 1767 he was not ashamed to solicit his old enemy, Chatham, for an earldom.

Biography by T. W. Riker, 1911.

Fox, HENRY RICHARD VASSALL, 3RD BARON HOLLAND (1773-1840), grandson of Henry, 1st baron, succeeded to the peerage while still an infant, but it was not till the year 1796 that he entered on his parliamentary career, during the whole of which he maintained the views and principles of his uncle, Charles James Fox. In 1805, when the Whigs came into office, he was appointed in conjunction with Lord Auckland to negotiate with the American plenipotentiaries for the settlement of some differences between the two governments. In this, however, they were not successful, as Jefferson, the president of the United States, refused to ratify the treaty. Holland became a privy councillor in 1806, and on the death of Fox he entered the cabinet as privy seal, but early in 1807 the ministers were dismissed. He was present in various parts of the Peninsula during the Spanish War. On his return to England (1809) he became a follower of Canning, to whom he lent aid on his accession to power, though he did not become a member of his cabinet. In 1830 he entered Lord Grey's ministry as chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, which office he continued to fill, with a slight interval when his party was not in power, until the time of his death. He published his "Memoirs of the Whig Party" in 1832.

Fox, SIR STEPHEN (1627-1716), was of humble stock, and began life as a choir-boy at Salisbury. Thence he became a member of Lord Percy's household, and took some share on the Cavalier side in the Civil War. Clarendon persuaded Charles II when in exile to make Fox his business manager—an office he filled with great discreetness. He made the scanty finances of the exile adequate to support him. After the Restoration his promotion was rapid. He was made paymaster, master of the horse, and lord of the treasury, sitting in the House as member for Salisbury. He became very rich. Despite his gratitude to the Stuarts, his name appeared on every commission of William III's treasury. He took a large part in the foundation of Chelsea Hospital. Of his two sons by his second wife, Stephen became Lord Ilchester, and Henry became Lord Holland and father of C. J. Fox.

Foxe, RICHARD (1448 ?-1528), Bishop of Winchester, was born near Grantham, and, by the favour of Cardinal Morton, made Bishop of Exeter, Durham, and Winchester, in succession. He was a prominent minister and diplomatist under both Henry VII and Henry VIII, until eclipsed by Wolsey. He was also zealous for the "New Learning," and founded Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and several schools.

France, RELATIONS WITH. Long before France, in the modern sense, was constituted, England had frequent dealings with the territory now known by that name. The old English monarchs were often in close relations with the Carolingian emperors. [EMPIRE, RELATIONS WITH.] French history strictly begins in 987, when Hugh Capet, Duke of the French, assumed the crown of the Carolings, and, like Harold, founded a monarchy, national in idea but feudal in reality. The abandonment of the Carolingian kings by the Norman dukes was among the chief causes of Hugh Capet's success; but there was a natural enmity between the weak suzerain and the mighty vassal which transferred itself to England when William of Normandy became English king. French ideas, manners, military system, architecture even, had already come into England with Edward the Confessor. After the Conquest the governing classes were practically Frenchmen. But the political relations with the French monarchy, which it is our main business to trace here, were necessarily determined by William's hostility to the Parisian king. The subsequent hostility between France and England sprang much more largely from the uneasy relations of the early Capetians to their over-powerful vassals than from English dislike to what was French. William I fought against Philip I for the possession of the Vexin, and met his death during the campaign. In 1094 Philip vainly helped Duke Robert against William II, and again, in 1097, fought with the English king about the Vexin. Louis VI was a more redoubtable antagonist than the weak Philip. But the reunion of England and Normandy after 1106 made Louis's efforts to weaken Henry fruitless, and the Treaty of Gisors (1113) ended the war for a time. But in two or three years the war was renewed, until the English victory at Brenneville (1119) and the mediation of Calixtus II produced another peace. The subsequent efforts of Louis were of little importance. The reign of Stephen suspended foreign relations; but Henry II, from the very fact that he ruled more of France than the French king himself, was the more likely to be his unwilling vassal. In 1159 Henry was involved in the War of Toulouse, but in refusing to wage open war with his lord, Louis VII, showed a scruple that was not experienced by Louis, who never lost an opportunity of attacking Henry—e.g., in 1167-8, during the Becket quarrel, and in 1173-4, when Louis helped the younger Henry to revolt against his father, and set on foot a powerful but unsuccessful coalition against the Angevin. Later in the reign, when Louis stirred up Richard and John against their father, the relations of England and France for the first time assumed that aspect of lasting hostility which influenced all subsequent history. The temporary suspension of enmity for crusading purposes—the joint crusade of Richard I and Philip Augustus [CRUSADES]—led only to a quarrel in Palestine, and Philip's premature return to arrange attacks on Normandy. John, Philip's old ally, became his enemy on his accession to the throne. Philip's conquest of Normandy in 1204, his alliance with Innocent III against the excommunicated English king, and the crowning victory of Bouvines (July 27, 1214) over every branch of the German race, sufficiently indicate the relations of England and France under John. But so little national opposition was there as yet that the revolted barons, enraged at John's repudiation of the Great Charter, invited Philip's son Louis to avenge their wrongs and occupy their throne. Nothing but John's opportune death and the wisdom of Pembroke could have saved England from at least a temporary union with France.

Though the results were not at first apparent, the separation of England and Normandy had revolutionized the relations of England and France. The countries henceforth pursued a separate course. The feudal hostility became national. England became conscious of national identity. Though French still in manners and speech, the barons of England were no longer French in feeling. Strengthened by the annexations of Philip Augustus, the French monarchy was now a sufficient basis for the development of French national sentiment. One thing alone retarded this change of relation—the retention of Guienne by Henry III and his successor. In consequence of this there was still a feudal element in the relations of England and France. Besides being English monarchs, Henry III and even Edward I were also feudal potentates in the separatist south. In both aspects they were equally hostile to the Parisian monarchs.

Under Henry III—in whose reign a new importation of French manners, and the great absorption of French words in the English tongue occurred—the struggle for Poitou, lost in about 1229 by the English and in vain attacked in 1242, was counterbalanced by the conscientious moderation of Louis IX, which led to his selection as mediator between Henry and the barons in 1264. But the Mise of Amiens (q.v.) disgusted the national party, and led the way to the struggle of Edward I and Philip the Fair; while the rival claims of English and Angevin claimants to the Sicilian throne had added previously a new element of difference. Yet in 1286 Edward mediated between France and Aragon, though his award was repudiated. In 1294 a great war began, during which Edward for a time lost Gascony, and in which Scotland, then struggling against Edward for national independence, first became the hereditary ally of France. In 1297 the war ended, and in 1299 Boniface VIII's mad action led to the definite Treaty of Chartres. Edward II, though married to the sister of Charles IV, fell into difficulties with that monarch in 1324; the revolution of 1327, however, put these into the background. In 1328 the old line of French kings died out, and the accession of Philip of Valois was contested by Edward III as the son of Isabella. In 1337 French help to Scotland led Edward to prosecute his claim by arms. So began the Hundred Years' War between France and England. After a period of brilliant victories, Edward III forced on the French the Treaty of Brétigny (1360—q.v.), but Charles V, profiting by Edward's dotage, and the minority of Richard II, reconquered all he had won save Calais. The marriage of Richard II with Isabella of France, in 1397, coinciding with that monarch's arbitrary stroke for absolutism, marks a curious approximation between the two countries, during the pause between the acts of the great struggle. It led to the friendship of the Armagnacs for the deposed Richard which was, perhaps, the beginning of that Anglo-Burgundian alliance which alone made possible the brilliant successes of Henry V. Under him the second heroic period of the Hundred Years' War was fought, and the Treaty of Troyes (1420—q.v.) made Henry son-in-law and successor of the French monarch. Edward III had the assistance of the feudal south, but Henry V was the ally of the monarchical north of France, a different native faction contributing to each king's success. Thereafter the minority of Henry VI and the national enthusiasm engendered by the Maid of Orleans led to the loss not of Paris only or of Normandy, but of the ancient possession of Guienne. The death of Talbot, in 1453, ended the Hundred Years' War and the hopes of English domination in France. Calais, Edward III's great prize, alone remained of all the conquests.

The question of peace or war with France was now one of the chief points of dispute between the court and constitutional parties. The unpopularity of Suffolk, and the popularity of York, were largely the result of their adopting a statesmanlike and popular view respectively. But the alliance, first of the Lancastrians, then of Warwick, with France, forced Edward IV, however unwillingly, to the Burgundian alliance; and though Charles the Bold's abandonment of his cause led to the Treaty of Pecquigny (1475—q.v.) and friendship with Louis XI, yet before Edward's death that monarch had repudiated the English alliance. In vain Richard III sought the friendship of France. Charles VIII, no less than Francis of Brittany, helped Henry of Richmond to the throne; though Henry VII's constant Spanish policy, the war of the Breton succession, and the French support of Warbeck, despite the Treaty of

With Henry VIII a new era in foreign relations began. Instead of the long-standing traditional policy of the Middle Ages, the policy of interests begins with the establishment of the political system of Europe, the doctrine of the balance of power, and the growth of modern diplomacy. In the early part of his reign, Henry was eager to win new Crécoys and Agincourts at the expense of the traditional enemy. But besides this, a new motive—the desire of adjusting the balance in Italy—led Henry to join the War of the Holy League against France (1511–14). For a few years old and new motives coincided to keep Henry true to his traditional hostility, and the first war of Francis I and Charles V (1521–9) saw Henry again the enemy of France. But the negotiations of 1520 clearly show that Henry's main motive had reference to the political exigencies of the moment, rather than to any traditional theory of policy. The withdrawal of England from the war after the battle of Pavia (1525), the moment that Charles had an overwhelming advantage, illustrates Henry's regard for the balance of power. The alliance with France in 1526, the long and wearisome negotiations to enlist France on the side of Henry's divorce, equally indicate the new state of things. Francis played Henry false, and deserved the English attack in 1543, which, successful during Henry's life, led to disastrous failure during the weak rule of Somerset. Northumberland was the friend of France; but the accession of Mary, with the consequent Spanish alliance, was the cause of a fresh war between the two countries, during which France gained Calais. The Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559—q.v.) ended the war, but the accession of Francis II, the husband of Mary of Scotland, and tool of the Guises, and the ambiguous compromise as to the restoration of Calais, kept alive the enmity.

The Treaty of Cateau marked the beginning of a new era. Political considerations were subordinated to religious ones; and during Elizabeth's reign, despite her personal feelings, the Huguenots were the natural allies, the Catholic League the natural foes, of the English. The accession of Henry IV ended the active period of Catholic reaction, and led, for the first time, to a hearty national alliance of France and England against Spain. For the next half-century religious hatred of Catholicism, and political fear of the overweening Spanish monarchy, continued to produce this approximation between the old rivals. James I's Spanish policy was unpopular and unsuccessful. In 1624 a French alliance was adopted, and Charles I's marriage with Louis XIII's sister, though it did not prevent the war of 1627, kept the two nations on fair terms during the whole reign of that monarch. Richelieu's underhanded support of the Scots strengthened rather than weakened this position. The vacillating foreign policy of the first Stuarts made it impossible for fixed relations, either friendly or hostile, to be established; and it was reserved for Cromwell to revive the foreign policy of Elizabeth, and, in league with Mazarin, to humble effectually the pride of Spain. But Elizabethan policy was now obsolete. Cromwell's friendship with France is largely responsible for the aggressions of Louis XIV. Under Clarendon, who closely followed Cromwell in foreign policy, the same policy of French alliance became a source of that minister's unpopularity. The Triple Alliance (1667) of the Cabal was the beginning of the policy of combined resistance to Louis XIV of which ultimately England was to be the centre. But Catholic and despotic leanings, love of bribes, and fear of decided action, kept England's general influence on the side of France, so long as Charles II and James II were on the throne. Only under Danby, when the Orange marriage and the decided action of 1677 were effected, did England in any vigorous way set herself against French aggressions. The great development of French influence on literature, culture, manners, and fashions helped to maintain this French friendship. But with the Revolution of 1688, the prince who was at the centre of the European opposition to the universal monarchy of Louis XIV became King of England, and the addition of the whole weight of England to the coalition led to the ultimate defeat of France. The war of 1688–97 [RYSWICK, TREATY OF] prepared the way for the War of the Spanish Succession (1702–13) (q.v.). The well-contested defeats of William, and the crowning victories of Marlborough, broke up the power of France, even when the connexion of the dethroned Stuarts with France, and the doctrine of laissez-faire in European politics, kept up a French party in the country, which secured the conclusion of the Treaty of Utrecht (1713—q.v.). This Tory alliance with France, strangely enough, endured for twenty-five years of Whig ministry. The regent, Philip of Orleans, and the ministers of George I were, from widely different reasons, equally anxious for its maintenance. Philip drove away the Pretender from France, and in 1717 the Triple Alliance of Great Britain, Holland, and France was effected to maintain the Treaty of Utrecht against the efforts of the reviving monarchy of Spain. The peace policy of Walpole and Fleury kept this state of things alive. It was during this period of unity that the close literary and philosophic intercourse between France and Great Britain, which was to make the doctrines of Locke and Newton the common property of Europe, was effected. But the revival of Spain was not very real. When prosperity visited France anew her ministers were anxious to revive the schemes of Louis XIV, and, besides regard for the political balance of Europe, the rivalry of Great Britain and France in America and India, the efforts of both nations at colonial expansion, proved a new and deep-seated source of hostility. Thus, in the War of the Austrian Succession (1740-8), and still more in the Seven Years' War (1756-63), Great Britain and France were again involved in war. The glories of Pitt's great ministry led to the vast extension of the Indian and colonial empire of Great Britain, even though the desire of George III to leave foreign politics alone, and devote himself to the restoration of the royal power, led to the premature Peace of Paris (1763). For the next few years there was peace, but little cordiality, between France and Great Britain. At last peace was broken by the French, who openly helped the revolted colonists of America (1778). A fierce war was now waged between that year and 1782, terminated by the Peace of Versailles. During the next few years Pitt kept on good terms with a nation already on the verge of a revolution; although acts like his intervention in Holland would, in more fiery times, have led France into war. But Pitt's famous commercial treaty with France (1786), which revived a trade between two countries fast drifting into commercial as well as political alienation, is the chief mark of his French policy, and the "Anglomaniya" in France of the period antecedent to the Revolution was one effect of the increase of pacific relations.

At the outbreak of the Revolution France and Great Britain were on better terms than since the days of Walpole. That event, hailed by all but a few as the beginning of a brighter state of things in France, brought the nations still nearer together in sympathy. But it was soon seen that the course of the French Revolution was very different from what had been hoped for. Very early Burke sounded the alarm, and the growing ascendancy of the Jacobins soon confirmed his prophecy. Henceforth sympathy with the Revolution was attended with social ostracism, and remained only with the few staunch Whigs who still followed Fox as their leader, or with professed Radicals and agitators. In 1793 the war of Great Britain against the Revolution began, and continued with but two slight breaks (the few months after the Treaty of Amiens, and the few months of Napoleon's captivity in Elba) until 1815. It became in turns a war of reactionary propaganda which would make no peace with a "regicide" Directory, a hopeless struggle for the balance of power in Europe against the aggressions of Napoleon, and finally an heroic defence of the British nation, and in a sense of the principle of nationality generally, against the lord of all Europe. In 1815 the restoration of the Bourbons ended, so far as was possible, the work of the Revolution, and a common attachment to some at least of the principles of the Holy Alliance united Tory Britain with the men of the Restoration.

[After 1815 a slow but growing cordiality replaced the old traditional hostility, bearing fruit in the "entente" of 1830 begun after the July Revolution and just before the fall of Wellington. The entente lasted until 1846, when the question of the Spanish Marriages (q.v.) brought a revival of ill-feeling. Towards its close, indeed, the understanding had thrived almost wholly on distrust—exemplified in Anglo-French rivalry in Spain, Africa (Algeria), Tahiti (q.v.), and the Near East, in which last sphere France was at one time isolated from the concert of powers until readmitted by the Second Treaty of London (q.v.). The rivalry of Palmerston, Thiers, and Guizot culminated in the Spanish Marriages dispute of 1846. Thereafter few important issues rose between the two governments. Louis Napoleon III sought a British alliance in the Crimean and Chinese Wars, while the Cobden Treaty (q.v.) of 1860 made for greater cordiality. Towards the close of the century acute distrust and apprehension arose once more, however; concentrated in Egypt, Tunis, the New Hebrides, Siam, the Congo, and French colonial ambitions generally. These differences were finally resolved by the understanding of 1904 which in 1907 became the Triple Entente on the establishment of renewed friendship between Great Britain and Russia. [ENTENTE, TRIPLE.]

During the Great War the British and French armies co-operated on many fronts; and after the Peace of Versailles the two governments were closely associated by their membership of the League Council and the Reparations Commission. In 1923 the British government disapproved of the occupation of the Ruhr, and cordiality waned; but in 1924 Britain and France together produced the abortive Geneva Protocol (q.v.). And their identity of policy and aspirations facilitated the entry of Germany into the League of Nations after Locarno.]

Francis, JOHN, a youth of 19, shot at Queen Victoria (May 30, 1842), for which he was condemned to execution, but the sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life. The absurdity of indicting such a man as a traitor led to an act punishing such cases by imprisonment and whipping.

Francis, SIR PHILIP (1740-1818), entered the Indian civil service, and was sent to Bengal in 1774 as a member of the new council appointed under the Regulating Act of 1773. He distinguished himself by the violence of his opposition to Warren Hastings. Returning to England in 1781, he entered parliament in 1784, where he joined the opposition, and stimulated Hastings's impeachment. Many, including Macaulay, have regarded him as the author of the "Letters of Junius." [JUNIUS.]

Franciscans, THE, or Grey Friars, were founded by St. Francis of Assisi in 1209 and formally inaugurated in 1210. In the thirteenth century they became divided into three parties—the zealots, the party of relaxation, and the moderates. The moderates were the party strongest in France, Germany, and England. They came to England in 1224 and made foundations at Canterbury, London, and Oxford. By 1250 they numbered over 1,200, with some fifty friaries. At the dissolution there were about 66 friaries. Frankalmoin (libera eleemosyna, i.e., free alms) was the name of a peculiar species of clerical tenure. The general condition of grants of land in frankalmoin was, that the grantees should pray or say Mass for the grantor and his kin; but no particular service was specified. This indefiniteness distinguished it from the analogous tenure by divine service, in which the service was fixed. Most of the great ecclesiastical estates of pre-Norman or Norman creation were held by ordinary lay tenure, such as knight-service; but later donations were commonly in free alms, exempt from all secular burdens. The legislation of Edward I ("Mortmain" (q.v.) and "Quia Emptores" (q.v.)) put a check on the future alienation of land under this form. In the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries the jurisdiction over land held in frankalmoin belonged to the ecclesiastical courts.

Frankpledge, or FRI-BORH, was an association of ten men, under the borhsealdor, fri-borge-head, or tithing-man, who were to be standing securities for each other, bound to produce any one of their number if called upon to do so, and if he was unable, liable to pay for what he had done amiss unless they could purge themselves from all complicity in the matter. The system has been defined as "a system of compulsory collective bail fixed for individuals, not after their arrest for crime, but as a safeguard in anticipation of it." It prevailed throughout England, except in the northern and western districts. The associations were called tithings, and every man, unless exempted by reason of his rank, or the amount of his property, or for some other cause, was obliged to be a member of it. The frankpledge is not found as a fully-developed institution until after the Norman Conquest, although its germs were present in the Anglo-Saxon period. True, the laws of Edgar, Edward, and Canute imposed police duties on the tithing. Canute required that all men should be enrolled in a tithing; and in the tenth and eleventh centuries the law provided that accused persons must find borh or security to appear before a court. There is, however, no clear evidence that the members of the tithing-groups were a compulsory borh for one another. It is probable that the idea of communal responsibility for crime was introduced by the Conqueror, under pressure of the need to safeguard his Norman followers. The system was under the supervision of the sheriff who, twice a year, at a specially full meeting of the hundred court, made inquiry whether all who ought to be enrolled in a tithing were so enrolled. The sheriff's "tourn" of the thirteenth century resulted from the association of this duty with the duty of receiving presentments made under the Assize of Clarendon. The right to hold the View of Frankpledge was frequently usurped by private lords, and became one of the commonest of the mediæval franchises. The frankpledge system appears to have become obsolete about the end of the fifteenth century. In some parts of England the tithing seems to have been not a group of ten men, but a territorial unit coincident with the vill or township.

Fraser, SIMON, 12TH BARON LOVAT (1667?-1747), was the second son of Thomas Fraser, third son of Hugh, 8th Lord Lovat. Invested with the family estates for supporting the government in the rebellion of 1715, he sent forth his clan to fight for the Young Pretender in 1745, while himself posing as a loyal subject. For this treachery he was beheaded.

Biography by W. C. Mackenzie, 1908.

Frederick Louis, PRINCE OF WALES (1707-51), was the eldest son of George II and Caroline of Anspach. Before coming to England he quarrelled with his father because his intended marriage with Princess Wilhelmina of Prussia was broken off. On his arrival in England he joined the party that was in opposition to Walpole, taking Bolingbroke as his political adviser. The "Idea of a Patriot King" was written by that statesman as a guide for the prince when he should ascend the throne. In 1736 Frederick married Augusta of Saxe-Coburg; but this did not tend to the union of the royal family. He demanded (1736) that his income should be fixed by parliament. The king's overtures were rejected; and after an animated debate the ministers were victorious. The prince thereupon hurried his wife from Hampton Court to the empty palace of St. James's, when she was on the point of giving birth to a child. For this he was peremptorily ordered by George II to leave the court; Queen Caroline remained implacable, refusing to see him on her death-bed. Frederick withdrew to Norfolk House in St. James's Square, and became the leader of the opposition. On the fall of Walpole Frederick headed the opposition as they went to pay their respects at court; but his reception by the king was merely formal. No reconciliation was effected, and the prince continued to oppose the ministry and court until his death.

Free Church of Scotland, THE, was formed in 1843 by the "Disruption" from the Established Church of a large body of ministers and laymen. The Tory government, at the end of Queen Anne's time, passed (1712) an act restoring patronage in Scotland. It was extremely unpopular at the time, and was a chronic cause of dissent from the Church of Scotland. Yet the patronage conferred by the act gave only a recognized right to the benefice and its emoluments. The spiritual office of pastor could only be added to this by the "call" of the parishioners; but this "call" was frequently nominal, and, if but a few parishioners would make it, "a forced settlement" of the presentee could be effected. The beginning of the nineteenth century saw the acquisition by the Evangelical party of a majority in the General Assembly over the Moderates or Latitudinarians. In 1834 the assembly passed the Veto Law, which declared it to be a fundamental article of the Church's doctrine that no minister should be intruded into a parish against the will of the people, and declared that a majority of male heads of families, full members of the church, should be able to bar an obnoxious presentee. This was an attempt to make the call a reality in all cases. Before long this act created litigation in the Court of Session, as well as great controversy on the relation of the ecclesiastical and civil powers. At Auchterarder, the call of the presentee was signed by two heads of families only, while the great majority of the parish expressed vehement dissent. Yet the Court of Session declared the presentment legal under the Patronage Act, and the House of Lords, on appeal, confirmed their decision; while at the same time the Scottish judges were accused of extending their jurisdiction on other points into spiritual matters cognizable by the Church alone. In 1842, after tedious litigation, the Auchterarder case was finally decided. In May 1843, at the time of the meeting of the General Assembly, four hundred and twenty ministers, led by Dr. Chalmers, the most famous clergyman of his day, left the Established Church; and, leaving the hall of the assembly, met in another room, as the first General Assembly of the Free Church with Chalmers as moderator. The bulk of their congregations followed them. The organizing power of Chalmers, shown from the first by the Sustentation Fund for ministers' salaries, and the scheme for the education of the clergy of the new Church, triumphed over the financial and social difficulties of the new undertaking. In four years seven hundred Free churches were built. The Free Church simply reproduced in doctrine, discipline, and organization the Established Church; save that, of course, the right of appointment to benefices was strictly confined to the congregation, and the "Erastian" dependence on the State avoided; though, as a theory, the "voluntary principle" was repudiated.

In 1900 the United Free Church of Scotland was formed by the union between the Free Church and the United Presbyterians. A small minority of the Free Church Assembly, however, maintaining that the union was ultra vires, claimed the property vested in the Free Church, and ultimately appealed to the House of Lords, which upheld their contention. The decision created such widespread discontent that the government in 1905 appointed a committee of inquiry. Following on the commissioners' report, an act of parliament was passed under which an executive commission allocated the property, etc., as between the two churches. The small minority, whose strength is mainly in some Highland districts, still carries on the name of the "Free Church." [CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.]

Freehold. The term "liberum tenementum," "free tenement," appears soon after Domesday in the sense of land held by a free-man by a free tenure, i.e., by knight-service or socage. It was thus opposed to base or villein tenure. Freeholds were granted or conveyed by the process of feoffment, i.e., an act of formal delivery of possession (livery of seisin), accompanied by words describing the nature of the interest conferred and the services to be rendered in return. But in Bracton (temp. Henry III) the term "freehold" had come to have also a special sense, and to be applied to what had previously been only one characteristic of freehold tenure, namely, a right over land for a period without fixed or specified termination. Hence arose the term "freehold estate." "Estate" in English law means the interest which a holder has in the land, and especially the "quantity of interest" as measured by its duration. Estates are divided into such as are freehold and such as are less than freehold, the former including estates of inheritance or for life, the latter estates for years (or leases), or at will.

Freeman, Mrs., was a name assumed by the Duchess of Marlborough, because, as she boasted, it was peculiarly suited to the frankness and boldness of her character, in her correspondence with Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne, who assumed the name Morley. Their husbands were also sometimes styled Mr. Freeman and Mr. Morley.

French Revolution, WAR OF THE, is the name generally, though not very accurately, given to the series of great wars which arose out of the French Revolution, and lasted with two short intervals of peace from 1793 to 1815. Great Britain made at first no attempt to interfere in the internal troubles of France, and refused to take part in the first coalition against her. In the spring of 1792 Pitt reduced the navy, remitted taxation, and confidently looked forward to fifteen years of peace. In the autumn of the same year the position of affairs was entirely different. The French had expelled their invaders, and proceeded to annex Savoy, and to conquer Belgium, which they threatened to incorporate with France. The Convention offered the aid of the French arms to all people desirous of liberty, and French ministers intrigued with the disaffected party in Great Britain and Ireland. Pitt vigorously protested against the annexation of Belgium and the opening of the Scheldt, called out the militia, and introduced bills to subject aliens in Great Britain to strict supervision, and to prevent the export of corn and war materials to France. The French government refused any concession on the two questions of Belgium and the Scheldt, and protested against Pitt's precautionary measures. In the midst of negotiations on the subject, the execution of Louis XVI took place (January 21, 1793), and the government at once ordered the French minister to leave England. Pitt attempted to continue negotiations in spite of this, but on the first of February the French government declared war. Great Britain sent 30,000 men to the Netherlands under the command of the Duke of York. The Austrian victory of Neerwinden (March 18) had forced the French to retreat, and the allied troops spent the summer in besieging the frontier fortresses. In August the Duke of York laid siege to Dunkirk, but was forced to raise it again with the loss of his artillery. An expedition sent to the Norman coast to assist the Vendéans arrived too late, and another which occupied Toulon in August was forced to abandon it in December. Next year the allies were still more unfortunate. The French reconquered Belgium, and during the winter the Duke of York was driven out of Holland, and the Prince of Orange obliged to fly to England. Lord Howe's great victory of June 1, the conquest of numerous West Indian islands, and the revolt of Corsica, were a partial compensation for these defeats. In 1795 the coalition broke up altogether. Prussia made the Peace of Basel (April), and began thereby a neutrality which lasted for eleven years. Spain made peace on July 22, to be followed a year later by an offensive and defensive alliance with France, and a declaration of war against Great Britain (October 1796). The smaller powers mostly followed the example of these two nations, and the burden of the war henceforth rested on Great Britain, Austria, and Sardinia. The year

1795 was marked by the failure of two British expeditions, one to Quiberon, the other to the coast of La Vendée. On the other hand, the alliance of Holland with France resulted in the British conquest of the Cape of Good Hope (September 16). The continental war, the next year, was decisive; Bonaparte's Italian campaign more than counterbalanced the reverses of Moreau and Jourdan in Germany. In May the King of Sardinia withdrew from the coalition. In March Great Britain made an unsuccessful peace overture, which was followed in October by the dispatch of Lord Malmesbury to Paris, to negotiate a general peace. Great Britain offered to restore all her colonial conquests, and demanded a similar restoration of the French conquests. Above all it refused to admit the annexation of Belgium to France, and the rupture of the negotiations followed.

The year 1796 ended with an abortive attempt to land a French army in Ireland. The year 1797 brought the danger of invasion nearer still. In April Austria signed the preliminaries of Leoben, which were, in October, converted into the Treaty of Campo Formio. Great Britain was left to carry on the war alone, and that in a very unfavourable position. The Funds had sunk to little more than fifty, and in February cash payments had to be suspended, whilst in May and June the mutinies of the fleet made Great Britain for some weeks defenceless. The French government had formed the design of uniting the Spanish and Dutch fleets to their own fleet at Brest, and so sweeping the British fleet from the Channel, and rendering a landing possible. But the two victories of St. Vincent (February 14) and Camperdown (October 11) frustrated this plan; and though Bonaparte made some preparations for an invasion of England, he preferred the less perilous expedition to Egypt (May 1798). A month after his landing, Nelson, by the victory of the Nile, destroyed his fleet and cut him off from France (August 1). Renewed acts of aggression by the Directory in Switzerland and Italy, Bonaparte's absence, and Nelson's victory, made the formation of a new coalition possible. In 1799 the combined armies of Austria and Russia drove the French out of Italy; but General Masséna successfully defeated the Austro-Russian invasion of Switzerland, and General Brune repulsed an Anglo-Russian expedition to Holland. Bonaparte's return to France was followed by the overthrow of the Directory (November 1799), and an immediate resumption of the offensive. In 1800 Austria was attacked both in Italy and Germany, and the victories of Marengo (June 14), and Hohenlinden (December 3), were followed by the Peace of Lunéville (February 9, 1801). Great Britain was again left to carry on the war alone, for Russia had quitted the coalition, and made a dispute about the right of search the foundation of a maritime league (December 1800), which renewed the Armed Neutrality (q.v.) of 1780. This league consisted of Denmark, Sweden, and Russia, but it was almost immediately broken up by the battle of Copenhagen (April 2, 1801) and the death of the Emperor of Russia (March 23). Two days before, a British expedition had defeated the French at Alexandria, and the conquest of Egypt, with the surrender of 24,000 French soldiers, soon followed. Though Bonaparte still threatened an invasion of England, and collected troops and gunboats at Boulogne, the British supremacy at sea rendered it merely a threat. Both countries were ready to come to terms. The negotiations at Paris, in 1796, had been followed by similar negotiations at Lille in 1797, and the British government had declined to treat in answer to Napoleon's overture in December 1800. But this, the fourth attempt to bring about an understanding, was more fortunate. The preliminaries of peace were signed in October 1801, and the treaty was finally ratified on March 27, 1802. By the Treaty of Amiens (q.v.), Great Britain surrendered all her conquests except Trinidad and Ceylon. It was agreed that Malta should be restored to the knights of St. John, but as the renewed aggressions of Napoleon gradually made it evident that it would speedily be seized by France, the British government refused to surrender the island. They believed that Napoleon meant to make Malta the stepping-stone for a new attack on Egypt, and Egypt the starting-point for an attack on India. War was declared on May 18, 1803. A French army under Marshal Mortier easily overran Hanover. A great flotilla and army were assembled by Napoleon at Boulogne for the invasion of England, and in December 1804 the rupture between Great Britain and Spain placed an additional navy at his disposal. His plan for effecting a landing was based on the union of the three fleets of Toulon, Rochefort, and Brest, with the Spanish fleet, in order to secure the command of the Channel. Meanwhile a third coalition was being formed. In April 1805 an offensive and defensive alliance between Great Britain and Russia took place, and the league was completed by the accession of Austria (August), Sweden (August), and Naples. The naval combination fell through, and the Toulon fleet, which had succeeded in uniting with the Spaniards, was destroyed with them at Trafalgar (October 21, 1805); but the coalition was shattered by the capitulation of Ulm (October 19), and the defeat of Austerlitz (December), followed by the Treaty of Presburg (December 26). In England the Addington ministry, which had commenced the war, had been superseded in May 1804 by the return of Pitt to power.

Pitt's death (January 23, 1806) led to the formation of a ministry under Grenville, which opened negotiations with Napoleon. But Napoleon's continental policy rendered peace impossible. Just as the Directory had surrounded France with subject republics, so he wished to surround himself with vassal princes. One brother was established in Holland, and another became King of Naples, and the organization of the Confederation of the Rhine founded his rule in Germany. Russia's declaration of war (October 1, 1806) was answered by the victory of Jena (October 14), and the army of Russia, after the doubtful battle of Eylau (February 8), met with a severe defeat at Friedland (June 14).

The British ministry sent expeditions to Sicily (July 1806), South America (February–July 1807), Egypt (March 1807), and the Dardanelles (February 1807), but these useless diversions gave no real aid to the common cause. The Peace of Tilsit (July 1807) put an end to the fourth coalition, and enabled Napoleon to turn the forces of the continent against Great Britain. By the Decrees of Berlin (November 21, 1806) and Milan (December 17, 1807) he prohibited all direct or indirect trade with the British Isles. The secondary states, which still remained neutral or allied with Great Britain, were to be forced to adopt the same system, and to place their naval forces at his disposal. With the aid of Russia, Sweden was forced to adhere to the continental system, and a combined Spanish and French army occupied Portugal (November 1807). Denmark, after a British expedition had obliged it to surrender its fleet (September 1807), allied itself with France. But for the success of Napoleon's schemes, the mere alliance with Spain was not sufficient. In order to make use of the vast resources and great colonies, which misgovernment made of little value, he needed the complete control of Spain, and this he sought to secure by placing his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne (June 1808). With the insurrection which in consequence broke out in Spain, begins a new period in the history of the wars which sprang out of the Revolution. Hitherto, they had been the wars of states; henceforth they were to be the wars of nations. The idea of nationality inspired the peoples of Europe, and became the strongest support of its rulers in their resistance to France. Austria, fired by the example of Spain, took up arms again (April 1809), but it could not rouse Germany to revolt, and after the battles of Aspern (May 22) and Wagram (July 6) was obliged to sign a ruinous peace at Vienna (October 14, 1809). Great Britain seized the opportunity of the Spanish revolt. In the summer of 1808 a British corps expelled the French from Portugal, whilst another advanced to take part in the defence of Spain, but was forced to retreat and re-embark, after winning a battle at Corunna (January 16, 1809). The British government, however, instead of concentrating its strength on the war in Spain, wasted 40,000 men in a useless expedition to Walcheren. But, in spite of inefficient support, Sir Arthur Wellesley was able to recover Portugal (1809), and to maintain himself there, in 1810 and 1811, against repeated attacks. [PENINSULAR WAR.] In April 1812 war began between Napoleon and Russia, and in the same month Lord Wellington captured the border fortress of Badajoz, and assumed the offensive in Spain. The news of his victory at Salamanca (July 22) reached the French headquarters the day before the battle of Borodino (September 7), and about a month before the French entered Moscow the British army occupied Madrid (August 12—September 14, 1812). Wellington raised the siege of Burgos on October 18, and on the 19th Napoleon quitted Moscow. The enthusiasm of the German people forced their sovereigns to take up arms. Russia was joined by Prussia (March 1, 1813), Sweden (March 3), and Austria, and the battle of Leipzig (October 16-18) freed Germany, as that of Vitoria did Spain (June 20).

Whilst Wellington crossed the Bidassoa in September, and established his winter quarters in the south of France, the allied armies began the passage of the Rhine on the last day of 1813. After a campaign which lasted three months, Paris was taken, and Napoleon abdicated (April 1814). The brother of Louis XVI was called to the French throne (as Louis XVIII), and France reduced, with some small exceptions, to the limits of 1792. The allied sovereigns, at the Congress of Vienna, were still disputing about the settlement of Europe, when Napoleon seized the opportunity which the discontent of the nation afforded and re-entered France (March 1, 1815). The four great powers immediately re-formed the coalition against him (March 25), and the battle of Waterloo (June 18) was followed by his second abdication, and his exile to St. Helena. By the second Treaty of Paris (November 20) France was sentenced to pay indemnities and expenses amounting to more than 60 millions, to a further loss of territory, and to a five years' occupation of her border fortresses.

Europe was reorganized by the Treaties of Vienna. The great states issued from the wars of the Revolution more powerful and more compact. The republics of Poland, Venice, and Genoa, the ecclesiastical states and most of the smaller principalities of Germany, had been absorbed by stronger neighbours. But the sovereigns and statesmen who arranged the rewards and compensations due to states disregarded the claims of peoples. The Revolution had drawn its force and its proselytizing power from the general desire for political freedom; the opposition to the Empire had been inspired by the desire for an independent national existence. Neither of these feelings was satisfied by the Vienna settlement, and so it was not permanent.

During the same period Great Britain had grown greater outside Europe. In the West it had acquired a few more sugar islands; in the East it had excluded French influence from India, and greatly extended its own power in that country. It had also acquired the outposts and approaches of India, Ceylon, the Mauritius, the Cape, and Malta. But these accessions of territory had been gained at the cost of crushing taxation, and by the addition of more than 600 millions to the national debt.

Frendraught, THE BURNING OF (October 8, 1630). A reconciliation had just taken place at Strathgogie between the Gordons and their enemies, the Crichtons, who were escorted home by Viscount Aboyne, Robert Gordon, and others. Pressed to remain at Frendraught for the night, the Gordons were burnt to death in the tower by accident or (as was strongly suspected at the time, though on insufficient evidence) by design.

Frere, SIR HENRY BARTLE EDWARD (1815-84), entered the Indian Civil Service in 1834. In 1847 he became British resident at Sattara, and in 1850 chief commissioner of Sind. In 1862 he was appointed governor of Bombay, and in 1867 he returned to England and was made a member of the Indian Council. In 1872 he was sent to the east coast of Africa to inquire into the slave trade, and the following year signed a treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar abolishing the traffic. In 1877 he was made governor of the Cape and high commissioner for South Africa. Here his policy, especially in declaring war against Cetewayo, earned him the censure of the home government, and he was superseded in the high commissionership, and eventually recalled in 1880. His personal integrity, however, was undoubted.

Frere, JOHN HOOKHAM (1769-1846), a literary man of some note, a friend of Canning and his partner in the Anti-Jacobin, was sent on various embassies and political missions of importance. Besides a mission to Lisbon, he was twice Spanish minister during the critical period of the dealings of Ferdinand VII and Napoleon. The failure of Sir John Moore was, in public opinion, largely attributable to Frere's advice; and his recall from Spain ended his public life.

Frescobaldi, THE, were Florentine bankers who advanced money to Edward I and Edward II on the security of the customs, which they were allowed to collect. They became almost as unpopular as the Jews had been, and one of the ordinances of 1311 ordered their banishment from the country.

Friars, THE, were members of orders founded in the thirteenth century in the Church, for the purpose of preaching among the people. Their example in early times was powerful, but as they gained wealth they tended to sink into indolence. In the end of the twelfth century the preachers of the Waldensians, and other heretical sects, set forth a new idea of the religious life, as concerned with activity for the good of others. These sects were repressed; but their conceptions were fruitful, and the struggle against them convinced some ardent minds of the need of active preaching amongst the people. Francis of Assisi, in Italy, began in 1207 to gather round him a society animated by the principle of fervent love, which was to be carried out by entire self-sacrifice. His order rapidly spread, was provisionally sanctioned by Pope Innocent III in 1209, and was established by Honorius III in 1223. It was called the "Ordo Fratrum Minorum"; with it was associated a female order of St. Clara; and a third order, the Tertiaries, comprised those who, without abandoning their secular life, adopted a rule of penitence.

Contemporary with Francis, a Spaniard, Dominic, a canon of Osma, formed a society for the special purpose of preaching against heretics. In 1216 this order of the Friar Preachers was established by Honorius III, and adopted also the rule of evangelical poverty. Later came the order of Carmelites, so called because they were originally founded in the Holy Land, and dwelt in the seclusion of Mount Carmel. They had their rule of rigorous fasting, silence, and solitude, and were transplanted into Europe in 1238. Finally, the Eremites of St. Augustine, established in 1256, took their rise from the union of many cenobite establishments in Italy. All these orders followed the example of the Franciscans, in having Tertiaries, and in renouncing worldly possessions. They were often distinguished by the colours of their cloaks. The Carmelites were known as the White Friars, the Dominicans as the Black Friars, and the Franciscans as the Grey Friars. The survival of these names in London and many other English towns testifies to the extent of their settlements. The Dominicans and the Franciscans were by far the most important of these orders, and exercised great influence on the social and political development of England. The Dominicans came to England in 1221, the Franciscans in 1224.

The friars, in their early days, did a great work of social reform; and as this work grew under their hands, they felt the need for learning. Consequently the mendicants began to throng to the universities, and it was through the activity of the Franciscans that Oxford became famous throughout Europe. The first Franciscan provincial in England built a school in the Friary at Oxford, and prevailed on Robert Grosseteste (q.v.), afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, to lecture there. Grosseteste founded a school which was carried on by Adam Marsh, or de Marisco. [The special characteristic of this school was the endeavour to correct the exaggerated importance which mediæval thinkers attached to logical argument, by broadening the basis of positive knowledge through the study of languages, mathematics, and physical science. The most famous product of the school was Roger Bacon (q.v.). The attempt was only partially successful. Theology, to which all sciences were supposed to lead, tended to follow the narrower lines laid down by St. Thomas Aquinas. The Dominicans in England as elsewhere confined themselves generally to expounding and defending the views of St. Thomas. The Franciscans developed on freer lines, and nearly all the leading Franciscan thinkers belonged to the province of England. Alexander of Hales (d. 1245) was the first to bring the philosophical writings of Aristotle into systematic relation to Christian theology; Duns Scotus (d. 1308) and William of Ockham (d. 1348) agreed in criticizing the attempt of Aquinas to establish harmony between theology and philosophy, but differed in their general outlook—Duns Scotus, the chief of the new realists, holding that ideas were the ultimate realities, Ockham, "the prince of nominalists," maintaining that the ultimate reality was the individual thing. Ockham's nominalism, first expounded when he was a young B.D. at Oxford, by degrees spread to all universities and dominated scholastic thought for the next two centuries.]

The immediate influence of the revival of theology under the friars in England was greatly felt in the constitutional struggles of the reign of Henry III. Bishop Grosseteste and Adam de Marisco were the chief counsellors of Simon de Montfort. The teaching of the friars gave a religious basis to the theory of the relations between king and people, on which the struggle was founded. They set forth the responsibility of the king to God, his duty to rule for the good of his people, his obligation to listen to the advice of the community, and to govern according to its will. The Latin poem on the battle of Lewes (Wright, "Political Songs," 72, The Song of Lewes, ed. Kingsford, 1890) sets forth in striking language the political views of the friars. Moreover, these opinions were not confined to the closet. They were spread by the preaching of the friars amongst all classes, especially in the towns. The friars wandered from place to place, gathered a crowd around them in the open air, and in homely language, with rude illustrations, poured forth a discourse in which the condition of current affairs was used as a motive for amendment of life and as a call to repentance. The friars greatly influenced popular opinion, and secured popular support to the cause of the barons against the king. The summons of representatives of towns to parliament by Simon de Montfort, in 1264, was a recognition of the quickened political life which was largely due to the activity of the friars.

As the importance of the friars increased, their zeal diminished. Their rule of strict poverty was gradually modified, till there arose a schism in the Franciscan order between the more rigid party of the Spiritual Franciscans and the laxer party, which was supported by Pope John XXII (1317). In the course of the conflict William of Ockham attacked the pope, and proceeded with keen logic to examine the limitations of the papal headship over the Church. The democratic spirit of the Franciscans was turned for a time even against the papacy, which it had at first laboured to exalt. Moreover, the friars raised against themselves the hostility of the other monastic orders, who struggled to check their growing importance, and were aided by the secular clergy. This conflict raged chiefly in the universities, where the friars possessed themselves of the professorial chairs. When this battle had been won by the friars, the struggle continued between the Dominicans and Franciscans, till gradually the Dominicans took a sphere of their own apart from the Franciscans. They were left in possession of the Inquisition, and gradually lost the character of a mendicant order. The Franciscans were then left to work amongst the masses, and strove to increase their influence by pious frauds, and by superstitious inducements, that they might lead their penitents to bequeath money for charitable purposes.

The opposition to the mendicants in England was brought to a head by Richard Fitz-Ralph, Archbishop of Armagh (1350), who attacked their principle that mendicancy was practised by Christ and the Apostles, and also pointed out the mischief that they did ("Defensorium Curatorum," in Brown, "Fasciculus Rerum," ii, 466, etc.). They overrode the parish priest, invaded his parish, heard confessions, and granted absolution on easy terms. Ecclesiastical discipline was subverted that the mendicants might be enriched. Children were enticed from their homes and induced to join the order. So great was the influence of the mendicants at Oxford, that parents were afraid to send their sons there lest they should be entrapped by them. From this time we find many complaints against the mendicants. They worked for their own interests, and were despised by the more reflecting people. The Prologue of the "Vision of Piers the Plowman" (about 1377) says :

"I fonde there Freris, alle the fourre ordres, Preched the peple, for profit of hem-selven,
Glosed the gospel, as hem good lyked,
For covetise of copis, construed it as thei wolde."

The picture of the friar in the prologue to Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" shows with humour the ordinary character of the friar. The friars were attacked by Wyclif in 1381, when he entered upon his breach with the doctrinal system of the Church. At first he had more sympathy with them than with the "possessionati," the monks who held property. He attacked them chiefly because they were the staunchest adherents of the papacy. The friars in return were the bitterest opponents of the Lollards. During the fifteenth century the friars ceased to have any special influence or importance.

Friend, SIR JOHN (d. 1696), was a Jacobite conspirator in the reign of William III. He was given a colonel's commission by James, and enlisted men against the day when the French should appear in Kent (1696), but refused to take any share in the infamous Assassination Plot (q.v.), although he kept the secret. On the discovery of the conspiracy, he was tried, harshly denied the assistance of counsel, and, refusing to betray his confederates to a committee of the House of Commons, was executed on April 3.

Friends, THE SOCIETY OF, known in law and general usage as Quakers, was founded by George Fox (1624-91), son of a Leicestershire weaver. [FOX, GEORGE.] Though of little education, Fox had a deep knowledge of the Bible, and in an age of religious ferment he set less store on formulation of doctrine than on a principle which would overcome temptation. Agonized as was his search for this, he makes almost no confession of yielding to temptation. In a time when men based their religious belief on outward authority, either of Church or Bible, Fox came to take his stand on the assurance of the inward witness, the divine principle or that of God in all men as he expressed it. Contrary to the accepted belief of the time, he asserted that to the heathen who had never heard of the Scriptures or of Christ in the flesh a measure of this Divine Light or Seed or Spirit was given, and, as they were obedient to it, salvation was granted to them as to those who had fuller knowledge. Three typical sentences from his writings sum up his position: "Honouring all men is reaching that of God in every man"; "Who walk in the way that lives, they answer the principle of God in every man"; "Mind that which is pure in you to guide you to God." His teaching, differing from the barren theological strife of the time, came as a word of life to thousands of men and women in all classes of society and of all degrees of education. The two best known exponents of it are William Penn (q.v.) and Robert Barclay. In early life Fox performed three or four acts of fanaticism, but otherwise he showed great wisdom in the necessary organization of the Quaker body, and a certain charm of personality gave him power of leadership free from domination. The Society of Friends holds as one of its chief tenets that in the presence of evil the appeal to that of God in the evil-doer, and his conversion, are of more importance than self-protection, even though the following out of this way will probably involve suffering; and that war, the outcome and in its turn the cause of all that is contrary to the mind of Christ, is therefore unlawful for the Christian. The question turns on the standard of value which each one sets up. The Quaker counts as unlawful the confirmation of a statement by an oath, inasmuch as this sets up a double standard of truth: "Peopleswear to the end they might speak truth," said Penn, "Christ would have them speak truth to the end they might not swear." The society has never practised the outward rites of baptism and Holy Communion, but lays stress on the reality of the experience which these are intended to convey. It holds that in time of worship the limitation of ministry to one man is a limitation of the Holy Spirit, and its meetings are held without arrangement, on a basis of silence in the course of which it is open to any man or woman to speak words of ministry or prayer. The intervening times of silence are not a mere waiting for someone to speak, but are times of worship equally with those in which words are uttered. All meetings for worship are open to the public. In the meetings for conducting the business of the church there is no applause or noise of dissent, no scoring of debating points, and no voting; the "clerk" (combined chairman and secretary) announces what he considers to be the mind of the meeting and draws up a minute of record, or, in the face of a fairly even division of opinion, he, with the consent of the meeting, adjourns the discussion. The method may be slow, but sooner or later a decision is come to which commends itself to the spiritual witness of the meeting generally. It is, in fact, remarkable how well the method works. From earliest times to the present the society has taken a lead in philanthropic enterprise, the most conspicuous example of this being its efforts, along with Wilberforce and others, for the abolition of the slave trade and of slavery. In the management of their communities, as councillors, guardians, members of education committees, etc., Friends take a large share in proportion to their numbers. In science and in medicine the society has contributed to England far more than its fair share of eminent men; in historical and other branches of scholarship a few have been prominent. It numbers (1927) in Great Britain about 20,000, including the children of Friends, who are counted as members. Hence the society includes a number of merely nominal members, and it is necessary when any statement is made about a "Quaker" (as, for instance, that he has joined the army) to know whether his Quakerism consists in the fact that at his birth his name was put on the list of members and has never been taken off. There are about 120,000 in America, divided into various branches, not always in unity with one another, and some hundreds in Europe, Australia, South Africa, and at various mission stations.

"Friends of Ireland," THE, were a society founded by O'Connell in 1830, to promote the repeal of the Union. They were declared illegal by the Irish government; but, though dissolved, at once took a new shape as the Society of Irish Volunteers. This too was dissolved, in accordance with the Coercion Act of 1833.

Frilings. The name of the middle division of the old German tribes, corresponding in England with the ceorls (q.v.), i.e., the fully free but non-noble.

Frisians, THE, were a Low German tribe who are said to have made settlements on the Firth of Forth, which Nennius calls the Frisian Sea. Small numbers probably settled elsewhere in Northern Britain, but they were closely akin to the Anglo-Saxons and were readily absorbed by them.

Frith, in Anglo-Saxon law, answers to the later phrase, "the king's peace." It was enforced by national officers, and any breach of it was considered a contempt of the king, and punished by a fine. The frith was a personal, not a territorial, peace.

Frith-gild was the name given to certain gilds or clubs established during or before the reign of King Athelstan, for the maintenance of peace, the repression of theft, the tracing of stolen cattle, and the indemnification of the parties robbed, by means of a common fund raised by subscription of the members. These gilds took the place of the old organization of the family, as is shown by the wergild being in certain cases paid to the gild-brethren instead of, as in earlier times, to the family of the murdered man. The statutes of these gilds are contained in the "Judicia Civitatis Londonia" set forth in the reign of Athelstan, under royal authority, by the bishop and reeves of the city. [GILDS.]

Frobisher, SIR MARTIN (1535 ?-94), one of the great navigators of the Elizabethan period, set sail in 1576 with the object of discovering the North-West Passage, and in 1578 endeavoured, though ineffectually, to found a settlement north of Hudson Bay. Seven years later he accompanied Sir Francis Drake on his voyage to the West Indies, and in 1588 did good service against the Spanish Armada. He was killed in action whilst trying to capture the fort of Crozon, near Brest, on behalf of Henry IV of France, from the combined Spanish and League armies.

Frobisher's own account of his "Three Voyages to find the New Passage," has been edited by the Hakluyt Society, 1867.

Froissart, JEAN (1338-1410 ?), the historian, was born at Valenciennes, and was most likely the son of a merchant. From his childhood he was destined for the Church, but soon distinguished himself by poetry which secured him the patronage of John of Hainault, father-in-law of Edward III. In 1356 he went on his first visit to England, and five years later returned to enter the service of Queen Philippa. In 1366 Froissart returned to Flanders and began the composition of his famous "Chronicles." He became, about 1374, the chaplain of Guy de Châtillon, Count of Blois, whom he accompanied in many journeys and expeditions, during which he collected further material for his history. He made his last visit to England in 1395. His chronicle is vigorously and picturesquely written, and has perhaps been more widely read than any other history of his day. It is original, however, only after 1361, before which date it is based on the earlier chronicle of John le Bel; and its value for the later period is unequal.

Fuentes d'Onoro, THE BATTLE OF (May 5, 1811), was fought during the Peninsular War between the British, under Wellington, and the French, under Masséna. Masséna advanced, with 45,000 men, to relieve Almeida, which Wellington was blockading. Though in command of hardly more than 37,000 men, the latter resolved to fight rather than give up the blockade. Operations extended over two days. On the first, the approach of night prevented anything decisive; but next day, Masséna, newly reinforced, made his great attack. After a hard-fought day, the French slowly withdrew at evening out of gunshot; but there was no retreat. The capture of Almeida was secured by this check on Masséna.

Fulford, THE BATTLE OF (1066), between the Earls Edwin and Morcar and Harold Hardrada and Tostig, resulted in the defeat of the English, and the acceptance by the men of York of Harold Hardrada as their king. Fulford is on the Ouse, about two miles south of York.

Fuller, WILLIAM (1670-1717 ?), was an informer, who attempted, in 1691, to revive the trade of Titus Oates by pretending a Jacobite conspiracy; but no one listened to him, and he was put in the pillory. He tried the same method in 1701, with even greater discomfiture. When the Tories came into power he was sentenced to be flogged, pilloried, and fined; and being imprisoned in default of payment, he died in prison, probably in 1717.

Furruckabad, THE BATTLE OF (November 17, 1804), resulted in a victory for the British, under Lord Lake, over Holkar with a great army of 60,000 men. The British casualties amounted to twenty-eight.

Fyrd was the national militia of the early English. On every free man, by virtue of his allegiance, military service was imperative. In Tacitus's time, the host of the Germans was simply the gathering of the whole nation in arms. It continued the same to a late period. But as the state grew in extent, the difficulty of collecting the whole fyrd together became very great, and, practically, this was hardly ever done. The array of the fyrd of each shire was left to the caldorman, and the fyrd of the shire was the shire-moot in arms. It was more often the fyrd of one or two shires, which had local cohesion, that gained glory by stout fighting, than the larger aggregations of the popular army; for example, Brihtnoth's famous fight with the Danes at Maldon. But the cumbersome nature of the fyrd system led to its gradual supersession, even before the Conquest. The feudal thegnhood, with their retainers, the mercenary huscarls of Canute, illustrate the earliest developments of those baronial and stipendiary forces which ultimately were to make the national force obsolete. Yet William I called out the fyrd more than once, and Rufus branded as nothings those who refused to come, and cheated the fyrd out of their moneys for maintenance. At Northallerton the fyrd of the northern counties repelled the Scottish invasion; and it was the national militia that saved Henry II from the feudal coalition of 1173. Henry's Assize of Arms entirely recognized the principle. Under Henry III and Edward I the fyrd was revived, and made useful by the Statutes of Winchester, and the system of Watch and Ward. The growth of the art of war made such expedients obsolete in their turn; but the militia of modern times, with its quasi-compulsory service, and until recently the posse comitatus, which, in theory, could be convoked by the sheriff, continued the principle at the root of the fyrd down to modern times. [T. F. T.]

Fyrdwite was the penalty for neglecting to serve in the fyrd.

G

Ga, the old English form of the High Dutch gau, occurs, though rarely, in early constitutional history. Like gau, it must correspond to the pagus. Some have contrasted the natural ga with the artificial shire or division. The southern counties of England are of the ga type—of very ancient origin, and built on national or tribal distinctions. The Mercian

shires appear mere administrative "departments" of later date. [COUNTIES, THE ENGLISH.]

Gaderi, THE, were an ancient British tribe inhabiting an area including the western part of Northumberland, the part of Cumberland north of the Irthing, the western part of Roxburghshire, the county of Selkirk with Tweeddale, a great part of Mid-Lothian, and nearly all West Lothian.

Gael, the English form of Gaidhel, is used in two senses—(1) as the name of the great branch of the Celtic stock, including Highlanders, Irish, Manx, and representing the first wave of Celtic invasion of these islands; (2) as the name given to the Scottish Highlanders. Rhŷs suggested that the term Gael should be used only in this restricted sense, and that the archaic form Goidel, by which every tribe of this stock has known itself as far back as we can trace, should be used for the wider term. [CELTS; PICTS; SCOTS; BRITONS.]

Gafol-land (Gafol = tribute) was land let out to rent.

Gage, SIR JOHN (1479–1556), was appointed one of the council to assist the executors of Henry VIII, 1547, during the minority of Edward VI, and became in the next reign a valued supporter of Queen Mary, for whom he did good service during Wyatt's rebellion. During the imprisonment of the Princess Elizabeth in the Tower, 1555, Gage acted as her jailer.

Gage, GENERAL THOMAS (1721–87), was the second son of Viscount Gage. In 1774 he was appointed governor of Massachusetts in succession to Thomas Hutchinson (q.v.). He did his best in this difficult position to prevent an actual outbreak of hostilities, and instituted a conciliatory policy. His hand was forced, however, despite his efforts to maintain peace. The delegates at Philadelphia set his authority at defiance, and, when Gage recalled the writs for the assembling of the representatives, they met in spite of him, and enrolled the "minute men." Still Gage refused to resort to coercion, though he fortified Boston Neck and thus commanded the town. In April 1775 he sent a body of troops to destroy some stores collected at Concord. The colonists opposed the troops, and the first blood of the War of Independence was shed at Lexington. The people at once flocked to arms in numbers, which terrified Gage into inactivity; but in May reinforcements arrived under Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, and Gage at once issued a proclamation offering a general pardon, and declaring martial law to prevail. This, however, failed to attain its object; and on June 17 Gage took decisive action in the battle of Bunker Hill (q.v.). The victory was not followed up, and on Washington's arrival the British were blockaded in Boston. In October Gage resigned his command to Sir William Howe (q.v.), and returned to England. He was very much blamed by the government for not taking active measures earlier.

"Gagging Acts" is a name popularly assigned to the measures of reactionary periods interfering with freedom of speech, or writing, or public meetings. Such were the acts of 1795 against seditious meetings, and one of the Six Acts of 1819 against public assemblies and cheap political pamphlets. The name has also been applied to a long string of Irish measures of coercion.

Gaika (d. 1829), a Kafir chief, was regarded by the British government as the ruler of Kafirland; and it was through interference on his behalf by the governor of Cape Colony that the Kafir War of 1818 was brought on. In 1822 a treacherous attempt made by the colonists to seize this chief almost led to another war.

Galloway, the same word as Galway, i.e., land of the Gael, is (1) in its widest sense equivalent to the south-western district of Scotland, but (2) is more generally used in a narrower sense to include the small Goidelic settlement, isolated among the Brythons of Strathclyde, or Cumbria, that included the modern shires of Wigton and Kirkcudbright and part of Dumfries. A range of hills and moors cut Galloway off on the north and partly on the east, while the sea formed its boundary on the south and west. Some have regarded the presence of this intrusive Goidelic colony as the result of an invasion from Ireland, similar to that which conquered Dalriada (Argyllshire), but the general theory is that it was a survival of the earlier branch of the Celts, forced westward by the invading Brythons. In Roman times the Novante held this region. They are, probably, the same as the later "Picts of Galloway," though what was their precise connexion with the Picts proper it is hard to define. With all Cumbria, Galloway became, in the seventh century, dependent on the Angles of Northumbria; but long after Strathclyde had regained its freedom, it remained, at least nominally, subject to the decaying state. In Bæda's time Ninian's old bishopric of Whithorn (Candida Casa) was still an English see, till a long break in the line of bishops, after 796, marks the revival of the native race. Thus Galloway preserved its separate identity against English, Cumbrian, and Scot, and in the twelfth century was still "terra Pictorum," and its inhabitants formed a separate division in the Scottish army at the Battle of the Standard, distinct even from the "Cumbrenses." Their restless vigour was equally shown in their constant resistance to the encroachments of the Norman barons, which English and Scottish kings equally favoured. On the whole, Galloway leant on England to avoid the nearer danger from Scotland. The revived see of Whithorn depended on York till the fourteenth century, and Fergus, Prince of Galloway, sought in vain, by a marriage connexion with Henry I, to avoid his country's subjection to Malcolm Canmore. In 1174 the captivity of William the Lion led to the revolt of Uchtred MacFergus. Again, in 1185, the rising of another son of Fergus, Gilbert, was suppressed, and Henry II, tired of the double dealing of the Gallowegians, handed them over to Scotland. Yet Alan of Galloway acts as an English baron; his name appears in Magna Carta, and his daughters married Norman nobles. This last step completed the subjection of the state. On Alan's death his sons-in-law divided the land, and with the help of Alexander II put down the last native rising. The acquisition of the throne by Baliol, grandson of Alan, through his mother Devorguilla, perhaps facilitated its absorption. Yet, even in Buchanan's time, a part of Galloway used its Celtic speech, though it must very soon after have become extinct.

In 1415 he raised a body of troops to assist Henry V in his French expedition, and fought most valiantly in the battle of Agincourt, where he was mortally wounded, and, according to one story, received the honour of knighthood as he was expiring on the field.

Game Laws. The earliest game laws were passed in the same period as the laws concerning vagrancy, and were due to the same causes. The first of these, that of 1389, after reciting that artificers and labourers keep dogs and go hunting on holy days in the parks and warrens of lords and others, enacted that no person not possessing land worth 40s. a year should keep a dog for hunting or use ferrets or nets to take game, under pain of a year's imprisonment. In 1494 any person taking pheasants or partridges without leave upon another's land was made liable to a penalty of £10, equivalent to £150 of present money. But this statute can never have been enforced, for an act of 1581 imposed a fine of 20s. for every pheasant and 10s. for every partridge taken in the night. In 1604 all shooting at game with gun or cross-bow was absolutely forbidden (apparently as unsportsmanlike) under a penalty of 20s. for each bird or hare, or imprisonment for three months in default; but persons qualified by birth or estate were allowed to course, and also to net pheasants and partridges. Five years later the property qualification was raised; hawking was forbidden during July and August, and pheasants and partridges were to be taken only between Michaelmas and Christmas—"take" being probably soon construed to include shooting. In 1670 owners were allowed to appoint gamekeepers; no persons save freeholders of £100 a year, 99-years' leaseholders of £150, or heirs-apparent of a squire and others of higher degree, were to possess guns, bows, or sporting dogs, and game-keepers were given the right of search. All these acts were repealed in 1832, and the only earlier statute still in force is that of 1828. This act for the first time made poaching by night a crime, instead of an offence followed merely by fine. Taking, or trespassing by night with intent to take game or rabbits was to be punished with imprisonment and hard labour not exceeding three months for the first offence; not exceeding six months for the second; and transportation for seven years or hard labour not exceeding two years for the third. Resistance with any weapon could be punished with transportation up to seven years; and if a party of three or more, of whom one was armed, were found trespassing by night for the purpose of taking game, each of them might be sentenced to transportation not exceeding fourteen years. The act of 1832 abolished all qualifications for sporting, and also the earlier prohibition of the sale of game, and imposed new penalties for poaching by day, viz., a fine of £2 for trespassing in pursuit of game, and of £5 for resistance or refusal to give names. Thus, then, before 1832 the right to kill game was the privilege of a class, and after 1832 became an incident of ownership or possession as might be arranged between landlord and tenant. By the Ground Game Act of 1880 the occupier was given the right to kill hares and rabbits concurrently with the landlord, and was forbidden to contract himself out of this right. A close time for the sale of hares, to check their diminution, had consequently to be established in 1892.

Gamelin, Bishop of St. Andrews (d. 1271), was chancellor of Scotland at the beginning of the reign of Alexander III (1249); of this office he was deprived by the intrigues of Henry III, who feared him as a leader of the "national" party in Scotland. The English party subjected him to so much persecution that he sought redress at Rome, where the pope espoused his cause, and ordered the excommunication of Alan Durward and others of the young king's council. Eventually the triumph of Gamelin was complete. The national party secured the person of the young king and Durward fled to England (1257).

Gardiner, STEPHEN (1483 ?-1555), Bishop of Winchester, was a celebrated prelate and statesman. He was born at Bury St. Edmunds about 1483, and was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he became doctor of laws in 1520. In 1525 he was elected to the mastership of his college, and he became chancellor of the university in 1540. To a man like Gardiner academic distinctions were far from being all-sufficing. He took a secretaryship in the family of the Duke of Norfolk, and shortly afterwards in the household of Cardinal Wolsey. In this latter employment he speedily obtained the confidence of the king, as well as of his more immediate master, a success which was soon followed by his admission into the royal council. In 1528 he was sent with Bishop Fox on an embassy to the pope, to negotiate the question as to the king's divorce from Katharine of Aragon, and his first preferment in the Church, that of the archdeaconry of Norfolk, was the reward for his tact and energy. On Wolsey's disgrace Gardiner was attached entirely to the king's service as secretary of state, and having succeeded, with the assistance of Bishop Fox, in persuading the University of Cambridge to pronounce formally against marriage with a brother's widow, in 1531, he was appointed to the archdeaconry of Leicester, and shortly after to the bishopric of Winchester. His book, "De Vera Obedientia" (1535), upheld the royal supremacy. For the rest of Henry's reign Gardiner was among the foremost of the conservative party in the council. Powerful during the reactionary years 1539-47, he lost ground just before Henry's death, and the king withdrew his name from his will, of which he had previously been appointed one of the executors. With the exception of a few months in the early part of the year 1548, Gardiner was a state prisoner throughout the whole of the reign of Edward VI. Several attempts were made to induce him to subscribe to terms of reconciliation with the party then in power, but all to no purpose, and in the spring of 1551 he was formally deprived of his see for disobedience and contempt of the king's authority. With the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, Gardiner's fortunes improved. He once again exercised his episcopal functions in performing the obsequies of the late king, and on August 23, 1553, he was made lord chancellor. Throughout the whole of Mary's reign he acted as her chief adviser in all civil matters, and his influence in the affairs of the Church was second only to that of Cardinal Pole. Gardiner's watchfulness enabled Mary to be beforehand with the risings that took place early in 1554, and Wyatt's revolt, being thus pushed into action prematurely, was suppressed with comparative ease, in spite of its formidable character. In his subsequent dealings with the presumed sympathizers of Wyatt, however, Gardiner's merciless rigour alienated from him the support of the more moderate members of Mary's council, and the feeling of coldness towards him thus originated changed at once to indignation and active hostility when he proposed that the Princess Elizabeth also should be sacrificed for her sister's more perfect security.

Much has been written for and against Gardiner in the matter of his treatment of the Reformers. It is, however, beyond question that the cruel measures of Mary's reign against the Protestant party were very largely of his devising. Gardiner died after a short illness, which seized him soon after opening parliament, on October 21, 1555, and which terminated in his death on November 12 following, at Whitehall. An Anglican under Henry, Gardiner became a Papist under Mary, after Edward's reign had demonstrated the futility of Henry's position. In "De Vera Obedientia" he had attacked the papal supremacy; in his "Palinodia Libri de Vera Obedientia" he set forth his change of opinion upon the matter.

Garter, THE ORDER OF THE, was founded by Edward III, in or about the year 1348. The story which connects its foundation with the Countess of Salisbury's garter is, perhaps, the most plausible of the various current legends. The earliest associations of the order appear to have been with the tourney, which comprised two groups of twelve knights, under the leadership of the king and the Black Prince respectively. It ranks as the highest order of English knighthood, and consists to-day of not more than twenty-five knights, excepting members of the royal family and illustrious foreigners for whose admission special provision was made in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The installations of the order are held in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, where the banners of the several knights are suspended. The badge of the order is a gold medallion, representing St. George and the Dragon, which is worn suspended by a blue ribbon. The garter is of dark-blue velvet, and is worn on the left leg below the knee.

Gascoigne, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1419), was appointed one of the king's serjeants in 1397, and in 1400 was made chief justice of the King's Bench. In 1405 he refused, according to some authorities, to pronounce sentence of death on Archbishop Scrope; and his independence was still further shown, according to popular tradition, by his committal of the Prince of Wales to prison for striking him upon the bench. Whether these stories be true or not, it is certain that Gascoigne was not continued in the chief justiceship by Henry V. It is probable, however, that Gascoigne resigned of his own accord, since he was now an old man and had been long in office. Whatever the historical value of the traditions associated with his name, they testify to the high character he bore among his contemporaries as a just, upright, and fearless judge.

Gascony, THE DUCHY OF, corresponded, roughly speaking, with the Roman province of Novem Populana. On the fall of the Empire it became part of the great West Gothic kingdom stretching from the Loire to the Straits of Gibraltar, but seems to have become more or less independent on the death of Clovis (511), though he and his sons overthrew the rival Teutonic powers in Gaul. Towards the end of this century the Basque tribes swarmed down from the Pyrenean slopes (587). These invaders, the Wascons or Vascons, have given the district its present name, and appear to have settled northwards of the Garonne. In 602 they recognized themselves as being tributary to the Frankish kings, and received a duke of their own, Genialis. About the year 636 Dagobert conquered them once more, though his successors found them always setting up their own dukes, whose sway reached from the Garonne to the Pyrenees. Charlemagne had, at the beginning of his reign, to contend against these disruptive forces of Lupus or Loup II. It was not until the later ninth century, it would appear, that the duchy of Gascony became hereditary. In 1073 the title of Duke of Gascony passed finally over to the house of Poitiers, dukes of Aquitaine, and from this time its history must be read in connexion with the last-mentioned country. Soon after the marriage of Eleanor, daughter of William X, Duke of Aquitaine, to Henry of Anjou (1152), it became part of the English possessions in France. After the loss of Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, it still remained an English dependency, but daily became less firmly attached to the English crown. Moreover, it was divided against itself, its great nobles as a rule adhering to French, and its great cities to English, interests. By the Treaty of Brétigny (1360—q.v.) it was handed over to Edward together with Aquitaine, on the understanding that there should be no reservation of homage to the French king, if Edward in return renounced his claims on the crown of France. This mutual renunciation was, however, not completed, and in 1369 the malcontent Gascon nobles seized the pretext afforded by the Black Prince's imposition of a hearth tax to appeal to Charles V as overlord. War was resumed, and at the truce of Bruges in 1377 the English were left with a mere remnant of the territory guaranteed them by the peace of 1360. Less than a century later (1453) Gascony was finally reunited to the French kingdom as a result of the English defeat at Castillon.

Gascoyne, GENERAL ISAAC (1770–1841), is remembered chiefly for his famous motion in 1831, when, on April 12, after Lord John Russell had stated the modifications which ministers proposed to introduce into the Reform Bill, he moved that "the total number of members returned to parliament for England and Wales ought not to be diminished." This motion was carried by 299 to 291, though it was quite evident that it was merely intended to embarrass the ministry.

"Gaspee," THE, a schooner commanded by Lieutenant Duddingston, made itself conspicuous by its activity against smuggling. It had more than once attacked the Neuport, a Providence packet. On one occasion, therefore, when it was accidentally driven ashore, the citizens of Providence captured, plundered, and burnt it (June 9, 1773).

Gates, SIR JOHN (1504–53), one of the strongest partisans of Northumberland, was condemned and executed with Sir Thomas Palmer (q.v.) for his share in the conspiracy to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne.

Gathorne-Hardy, GATHORNE, 1ST EARL OF CRANBROOK (1814-1906), was elected Conservative member for Leominster in 1856, and defeated Gladstone for Oxford University in 1865. He was under-secretary of state for home affairs in 1858, home secretary in 1867, secretary of state for war in 1874, secretary of state for India in 1878, and in 1885 and 1886 lord president of the council. He was created Earl of Cranbrook in 1892.

Gauden, JOHN (1605-62), was in early life of Puritan tendencies, and sat in the Westminster Assembly, but was expelled from that body. His zeal for Charles I led to his publishing "Eikon Basilike" (1649), a work of which he is generally reputed to be the author. At the Restoration he was made Bishop of Exeter, and in 1662 he was translated to Worcester. He was much disgusted at the richer see of Winchester being refused him. Clarendon describes him as covetous, shifty, and self-seeking.

Gaunt, ELIZABETH (d. 1685), was burned to death in London for assisting Burton, one of the Rye House conspirators, to escape after the defeat of Monmouth at Sedgemoor. She was the last woman executed in England for a political offence.

Gavelkind (possibly from O.E. gafol-gecynd, gafol, tribute, and gecynd, kind), a system of tenure which is associated generally with Kent, but which also obtained in other parts of the British Isles. Its chief characteristic was the equal subdivision of land among male heirs; a secondary characteristic, intimately connected with the etymology of the name, was the payment of rent as distinguished from military or labour service. In Kent it was, in fact, a variety of socage tenure. The customs of gavelkind appear to have been everywhere of early origin, and it is argued that the effect of the Germanic invasions upon the Romano-Celtic agrarian system were less marked where, as in Kent, gavelkind survived. The earliest concrete instance of the subdivision of holdings among groups of heirs in Kent occurs at Wye in the days of Edward I. Frequently land was held by one person for a family group. According to Maitland, "the law of inheritance (in Kent) shows a curious preference for the younger son. When his father's house has to be divided, the hearth (astre) is reserved for him." There was no escheat on attainder for felony, the son or sons of the hanged felon being permitted to inherit from him. A custom grew up for the disposition of gavelkind land in Kent by will, and in cases of intestacy the land descends to all the sons, no preference being shown for the eldest, and the tenure has escaped the feudal law of primogeniture. "All lands lying in Kent are reckoned to be held by this tenure unless it can be proved otherwise, and it is said that during the reign of Henry VI there were not more than thirty or forty estates that did not come under this heading." Elsewhere where Celtic customs in land cultivation survived we find the old gavelkind characteristic of family co-partnership preserved, notably in Pembrokeshire and other parts of Wales, in Scotland and in Ireland. The customs of gavelkind and of Borough English were extinguished by the Law of Property Act, 1922 (12 & 13 Geo. V, c. 16).

Gaveston, PIERS (d. 1312), was the son of a Gascon knight who had been a servant of Edward I. Piers was selected by the king as the comrade of Prince Edward, and speedily acquired a great influence over the weak mind of the young prince. The king, seeing the danger of this, had banished Gaveston in February 1307, and on his death-bed commanded his son never to recall him. But Edward II was no sooner king than Gaveston returned, and was made Earl of Cornwall. He at once became the chief man in the kingdom, was appointed custos of the realm during the king's absence, and many valuable possessions and wardships were heaped upon him. At the coronation of the king in February 1308 Gaveston took precedence of the other nobles, and excelled them all in the magnificence of his display. He was an accomplished knight, of great bravery and ambition, but insolent and avaricious, and his head was completely turned by the favours lavished upon him. He indulged in coarse satire against the nobles, and surrounded himself with a train of retainers, many of whom were notorious robbers and homicides. In May 1308 Edward was compelled by the barons to banish him; but his exile was converted into a new dignity by his being made lieutenant of Ireland. In this capacity he showed some courage and skill, but the king could not live without him, and he returned to England in 1309. Banished again in 1311, he was recalled in January 1312, when the barons determined to destroy him. He was besieged in Scarborough Castle, and surrendered on promise of his life. But he was seized by the Earl of Warwick, and on June 19, 1312, beheaded on Blacklow Hill.

Geddes, SIR AUCLAND CAMPBELL (b. 1879), was educated at Edinburgh University, and for a time practised medicine at the London Hospital. In 1916 he became director of recruiting, and in 1917 minister of national service. In 1919 he became president of the board of trade, and for three years (1920-3) was British ambassador in Washington.

Geddes, SIR ERIC CAMPBELL (b. 1875), was born in India and educated at Oxford and Edinburgh. On the outbreak of the Great War his experience in business was utilized by Mr. Lloyd George, and he became (1915) deputy director-general of the munitions supply. In 1917 he was appointed first lord of the admiralty and entered parliament as member for Cambridge. In 1919 he became minister of transport, and in 1921 chairman of the "Geddes Axe" committee set up to recommend public economies.

Geddes, JENNY, is said to have thrown a stool at the head of the dean of Edinburgh, on the occasion of the riot in St. Giles's Church, when Laud's Liturgy was first read in Scotland (Easter 1637).

Geddington, THE COUNCIL OF (1138), was the assembly which agreed to the levy of the Saladin Tithe (q.v.), the first tax on movables.

Gelt, or CHELT, THE BATTLE OF THE, was fought in North Cumberland, February 1570, between the royal troops under Henry Carey, Lord Hunsdon (q.v.), and the rebels and borderers under Leonard Dacre (q.v.). In spite of the desperate bravery of the insurgents, they were completely defeated.

General Warrants, for the apprehension of all persons suspected, without naming anyone in particular, were frequently issued for offences against the government by the Star Chamber and under the Stuarts, as well as during the first half of the eighteenth century. In the case of Wilkes (q.v.) and No. 45 of the North Briton, a general warrant was issued by Lord Halifax, under which forty-nine persons were arrested. On the ground that the warrant was illegal, Wilkes brought an action against the under-secretary of state and obtained £1,000 damages. In 1765 general warrants were pronounced illegal by Lord Mansfield and the judges of the King's Bench, on the ground that no degree of antiquity can give sanction to a usage bad in itself, and that "general warrants are no warrants at all because they name no one." This opinion was confirmed by the House of Commons in 1766.

Geneva Award, THE (1872), settled a serious disagreement between Great Britain and the United States of America. During the civil war between the Northern and Southern States of America, a ship called "No. 290" was built at Birkenhead to act as a privateer in the service of the Southern States. Before she was completed her destination and purpose were made known to the British government, but owing to difficulties in the law and the illness of a law-officer of the Crown, the orders given to arrest her did not arrive at Liverpool until after she had left that port on the pretence of a trial trip. She left the Mersey on July 28, 1862; proceeded to the island of Terceira; took in equipment and armament; and began to act against the Northern shipping, assuming the name of Alabama. On June 19, 1864, the Alabama was sunk off Cherbourg, in an engagement with the Federal war steamer Kearsage. After the conclusion of the war, claims for compensation for the damage done by the Alabama and other cruisers were made against the British government. After many attempts at settlement had failed, it was arranged, in February 1871, that a joint commission should meet at Washington to settle the Alabama claims and other outstanding differences between the United States and Great Britain. On May 8 the high joint commissioners signed the Treaty of Washington, which established a board of arbitration. After the signature of the treaty a question arose between the two governments as to what classes of claims should be submitted for arbitration. The British government was willing to compensate all private individuals for any loss they might have suffered by the action of the cruisers. The American government demanded, in addition to this, the costs of pursuing the privateers, the losses incurred by high premiums for insurance, and by the prolongation of the war. After a correspondence, the Americans declared that they could not withdraw from the case which they had submitted, and they left the responsibility of abrogating the treaty to England. The tribunal of arbitration met at Geneva in December 1871, comprising representatives of Great Britain, the United States, Italy, Switzerland, and Brazil. The final decision was given on September 14, 1872. The tribunal of arbitration found unanimously that Great Britain was liable for the acts committed by the Alabama, "having failed by omission to fulfil the duties prescribed by the first and third of the rules established by the sixth article of the Treaty of Washington." They fixed the sum to be paid by Great Britain at 15,500,000 dollars in gold, amounting to £3,229,166 13s. 4d. sterling.

Geneva Protocol, THE (October 2, 1924), was an international agreement concluded at the close of the fifth assembly of the League of Nations. Based on a draft agreement drawn up by M. Herriot and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, it took as its foundation the three principles of arbitration, security, and disarmament, and endeavoured to provide a systematic procedure for the prevention of war. It was unanimously accepted on October 2, but never ratified by the powers. The Conservative government which succeeded Mr. MacDonald declined to ratify it on the ground that it saddled Great Britain with too great an obligation to maintain peace in "several sectors." But the Protocol gave a strong impetus to the movement for disarmament and security, which bore fruit at Locarno in October 1925.

Geoffrey, Archbishop of York (d. 1212), was a reputed son of Henry II. According to tradition his mother was "the Fair Rosamund," but the story has no historical basis. In 1173 the king procured his election to the bishopric of Lincoln in spite of the obstacles of his age and birth, and in 1189 he was elected Archbishop of York. In 1174 he aided his father against his rebellious brothers. In 1182 he resigned his bishopric, to which he had never been actually consecrated, and received instead the chancellorship, an office he continued to hold till his father's death. He distinguished himself greatly in the war against France (1187-9), and was the only one of Henry II's children who was present at his death-bed. During Richard I's absence from England he quarrelled with Longchamp (q.v.), and the violent conduct of the latter on this occasion was one of the causes of his dismissal from office. His opposition to John's oppressive taxation caused his banishment in 1207, and, in spite of the support of Innocent III, he remained in exile till his death.

Geoffrey of Anjou (1114-51), the father of Henry II, was the son of Fulk V of Anjou. On the death of the Emperor Henry V, Henry I determined to marry his daughter Maud to Geoffrey, the heir of Anjou. The marriage, which was completed in 1129, was, from one point of view, a wise one, as it put an end to the series of wars between Normandy and Anjou which had raged for so long, but the Angevin match was unpopular with the Norman nobles and did much to prevent Maud's recognition as queen. During the civil wars between Stephen and the Empress Maud, Geoffrey was principally occupied with endeavouring to enforce her claims to Normandy, of which he was acknowledged as duke by Louis of France in 1147.

Geoffrey of Brittany (1158-86), fourth son of Henry II and Eleanor, was married when a child to Constance, daughter and heiress of Conan, Duke of Brittany. In 1173 he joined his elder brother Henry in rebellion against his father, and put himself forward as the champion of Breton independence. The conspiracy was defeated, and Henry forgave his sons. In 1182 Geoffrey placed himself at the head of the Poitevins who were in rebellion against Richard; defeated in this attempt, he retired in 1186 to the court of Philip Augustus, where he spent the brief remainder of his life. He met with his death, according to some accounts, in a tournament at Paris, where he was accidentally thrown from his horse and trampled to death; other versions have it that he died a natural death. By his marriage with Constance he had two children, Arthur and Eleanor.

Geoffrey of Nantes (d. 1153) was the younger son of Geoffrey of Anjou and the Empress Maud. On the accession of his brother, Henry II, to the English throne, he claimed the county of Anjou, but he was compelled to submit to Henry in 1156, and to relinquish his claims on the promise of receiving an annual pension. He was subsequently installed, with Henry's approval, as Count of Nantes.

George I (b. March 28, 1660, s. August 1, 1714. d. June 12, 1727) was the first sovereign of the Hanoverian dynasty. Prince George Louis was the son of Ernest Augustus of Hanover, and Sophia, daughter of Frederick V, Elector Palatine, and granddaughter of James I of England. During his father's lifetime he served in the Imperial army against the Turks, at the siege of Vienna, and on the Danube, in Italy, and on the Rhine. In 1680 he visited England, and in the following year his marriage with his cousin, Sophia Dorothea of Celle, united the two branches of the house of Lüneburg. The unfortunate princess was divorced and imprisoned (1694) in the castle of Ahlden, for the remainder of her life, for an intrigue with Count Königsmark. George succeeded his father as Elector of Hanover in 1698. He led some auxiliaries to the aid of Frederick III of Denmark (1700). In 1701 he joined the grand alliance against France. In 1707, at Marlborough's request, he was appointed commander of the Imperial forces on the Upper Rhine. He was, however, much offended at the suggestion that he should divide his forces with Prince Eugene. When at length he took the field, he failed to reduce the towns of Franche-Comté. Shortly afterwards he became reconciled to Marlborough. In 1710 he resigned his command. He drew up a memorial to the queen, protesting against the terms of the Peace of Utrecht. After the Tories gained the upper hand, he was in constant communication with the Whig opposition, but does not seem to have taken any serious steps towards securing the succession. He opposed sending a writ to his son, the electoral prince, as Duke of Cambridge; and answered the queen's angry letter in submissive terms. In May 1714 he joined in the Treaty of Rastadt. On the death of the queen he was proclaimed King of England, but did not arrive in this country until late in September, and was not crowned until October 20. He at once nominated an entirely Whig ministry. His accession was on the whole popular, although riots broke out in several of the large towns. The following year witnessed the outbreak of the Jacobite rebellion. The government at once took vigorous measures for its suppression by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, summoning troops from Hanover, and arresting the more active Jacobites. Ormonde's attempts to land on the English coast were a failure. The insurrection in Scotland for a brief period assumed a formidable aspect. The English insurgents were utterly defeated at Preston, and shortly before, Mar had suffered a reverse at Sheriffmuir (q.v.). The arrival of the Pretender failed to restore confidence in the Jacobite troops, and, with his flight, the insurrection may be said to have terminated. The chief events of the next year were the punishment of the rebels and the passing of the Septennial Act (q.v.). Immediately afterwards George, much against the wish of his ministers, insisted on going to Hanover, accompanied by Stanhope. He was with difficulty induced to allow his eldest son to act as "Guardian of the Realm and Lieutenant" in his absence. Negotiations for the Triple Alliance were at once set on foot. George insisted on a British fleet being sent to the Baltic in order to oppose the designs of Charles XII of Sweden against Bremen and Verden, and was anxious to declare war against Russia. Shortly afterwards Townshend, who had discountenanced George's European policy, was dismissed from office, and was followed by Walpole. In June 1717 the Triple Alliance between Great Britain, France, and Holland was concluded. For a brief period Britain was seriously menaced by the schemes of Charles XII and Alberoni, in conjunction with the malcontents in France, in favour of a Stuart restoration. These were thwarted by the death of Charles in the next year. Alberoni aimed at the destruction of the Treaty of Utrecht, and directed his efforts against the Austrians in Italy. Admiral Byng was therefore sent to the Mediterranean, and Austria joined the Triple Alliance, which thereupon became a Quadruple Alliance. The Spanish fleet was destroyed off Cape Passaro, and Alberoni fell. An abortive expedition to the Highlands fitted out in favour of the Pretender was one of his last efforts. Sweden and Denmark were compelled to desist from hostilities, and in 1720 Stanhope had secured the peace of Europe. Meanwhile, at home, the impeachment of Oxford was a complete failure. The Schism Act was repealed; but the Peerage Bill (q.v.), a Whig measure, was rejected through the influence of Walpole, now leader of the opposition (December 1719). The year 1720 witnessed the disastrous collapse of the South Sea Scheme (q.v.). The directors were punished; Sunderland was forced to resign, and the death of Stanhope left Walpole without a rival. For a brief period the hopes of the Jacobites revived; but information of Bishop Atterbury's plot (q.v.) was given to the British government by the French minister, Dubois. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended for a year, sums were granted for an increase of the army, a tax of £100,000 was collected from the Non-jurors, and Atterbury was forced to leave the kingdom. Soon afterwards Walpole's jealousy caused a quarrel to break out between himself and Carteret; the latter withdrew to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland (1724). Then the country was wildly excited by the government patent granted to Wood, giving him power to coin farthings and halfpence to the amount of £108,000. [WOOD'S HALF-

PENCE.] Walpole was obliged to withdraw the obnoxious patent. Great excitement was also caused in Scotland by the malt-tax being changed into a charge of threepence upon every barrel of ale. The remainder of the reign offers little interest in home affairs. Abroad, Walpole was thwarted by the intrigues of the Spanish minister, Baron Ripperda, who wished to upset the arrangements of the Congress of Cambrai for the maintenance of the Quadruple Alliance, and to revive the old connexion between Spain and Austria. Accordingly, in August 1725, the Treaty of Vienna was concluded between Austria and Spain, with a secret treaty arranging marriages between the two houses, the restoration of the Stuarts, and the surrender of Gibraltar and Minorca. The Jacobites were very active in these intrigues with the Spanish court. In opposition to these designs the Treaty of Hanover was signed by Great Britain, France, and Prussia. Ripperda fell, but his policy was still continued. There was great excitement in England, and a squadron was dispatched to blockade Porto Bello. Austria, influenced by the policy of Prussia, determined to withdraw from her unpleasant position, and preliminaries of peace were signed at Paris (May 1727). At home, the opposition were vehement in their attacks on Walpole, and urged the full restoration of Bolingbroke. Their intrigues were cut short by the death of George I's character is perhaps a better estimate than that of some more pretentious writers. "George was not a lofty monarch certainly; he was not a patron of the fine arts, but he was not a hypocrite, he was not revengeful, he was not extravagant. Though a despot in Hanover, he was a moderate ruler in England. His aim was to leave it to itself as much as possible, and to live out of it as much as he could. His heart was in Hanover. . . . He was more than fifty years of age when he came amongst us; we took him because he served our turn; we laughed at his uncouth German ways, and sneered at him. He took our loyalty for what it was worth; laid hands on what money he could; kept us assuredly from Popery and wooden shoes. Cynical and selfish as he was, he was better than a king out of St. Germain's, with the French king's orders in his pocket, and a swarm of Jesuits in his train."

[F. S. P.]

George II (b. October 30, 1683, s. June 12, 1727, d. October 25, 1760), was the only son of George Louis, Elector of Hanover, afterwards George I of England, and the unfortunate Sophia of Celle. In 1706 he became a peer of England, with the title of Duke of Cambridge. He had married Caroline of Anspach. In spite of his laxity of morals, he was much attached to his wife, and strongly influenced by her. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Oudenarde (1708). Towards the end of 1713 the Whig leaders proposed that his writ as Duke of Cambridge should be asked for in order that he might be present to thwart the designs of the ministry in favour of the Pretender. Anne was greatly offended, and although the writ was issued, the measure was given up. In 1714 he accompanied his father to England, and became Prince of Wales. In 1716 the smouldering quarrel between the king and his son broke into flame. The prince insulted the Duke of Newcastle, who was present as proxy for the king at the christening of the prince's eldest son. George was expelled from St. James's and his children taken under charge of the king. He became popular with the nation, and openly raised the standard of opposition to the court and ministry. It was impossible, however, to ignore his claims to the regency during his father's absence from England. In 1719 Stanhope and Sunderland introduced the Peerage Bill (q.v.), as a blow at his power when he should ascend the throne. But the measure was thrown out by a large majority in the Commons. A formal reconciliation was effected by Walpole between the prince and the king in 1720. In June 1727, on the death of his father, George ascended the throne.

His reign may be roughly divided into two parts: (1) the peace period to the fall of Walpole in 1742, and (2) the war period to the death of the king in 1760. For a little while it seemed as if Walpole had fallen. Sir Spencer Compton was directed to form a ministry; but Walpole explained his views on foreign policy to the king, supported by the influence of the queen, and wisely offered to increase the civil list. Accordingly Walpole continued prime minister, opposed by the Whig malcontents whom his love of power had caused to desert him, and supported by a bought majority. The difficulties with Spain were settled, in November 1729, by the Treaty of Seville (q.v.), a defensive alliance between Great Britain, Spain, France, and eventually Holland. British trade with South America was thus restored, and the Asiento confirmed to the South Sea Company. The emperor, finding himself deserted, joined with Great Britain, Holland, and Spain in the second Treaty of Vienna (March 1731), which practically confirmed the Treaty of Seville. In this year Walpole, by compelling Townshend, as leader of the Upper House, to reject the Pension Bill, caused him to retire from the ministry. For two years Walpole devoted himself to reforms at home. In 1733 his excise on salt was followed up by a proposal for a tax on wine and tobacco, and a system of warehousing to prevent frauds on the customs. Such was the unpopularity of the measure that the minister was compelled to withdraw it. He held aloof from the war which broke out in the following year between the Empire, France, and Spain. Through the mediation of France and Britain, the Definitive Peace of Vienna was eventually signed in the year 1738. The elections of 1735 were stubbornly contested, but Walpole retained his majority. Bolingbroke retired to France, and the Prince of Wales assumed the leadership of the opposition. In 1736 Edinburgh was agitated by the Porteous riots (q.v.). In 1737 a public quarrel broke out between George and his son on the subject of the prince's jointure. The ministry was victorious, but the opposition rallied round the prince at Norfolk House. Shortly afterwards the death of the queen deprived George of a faithful wife, and Walpole of a true friend. The latter retained, however, his influence over George. The opposition attacked his peace policy, the story of "Jenkins's ear" (q.v.) was brought up against him, and the king was eager for war with Spain. Failing to carry their motion against Walpole's convention with that country, the opposition seceded from the House. Walpole was, however, forced to declare war (October 1739), rather than resign, and at once the Jacobite hopes revived. The expeditions to Spain were not successful. In 1742 the elections gave the government but a small majority, and, being defeated on the Chippenham Election Petition, Walpole resigned. A new ministry, in which several of Walpole's supporters had places, was formed under Lord Wilmington, formerly Sir Spencer Compton. On the death of Wilmington, in the following year, Henry Pelham defeated Lord Bath, the rival candidate for the premiership. Europe was now menaced by the question of the Austrian Succession. Subsidies were promptly voted to Maria Theresa, and an army of 30,000 British and Hanoverians was sent to the Low Countries. The British fleet forced the Neapolitan king to assume neutrality. The battle of Dettingen (June 27, 1743), the last in which an English king took part, and in which George distinguished himself, resulted in a defeat of the French, after ineffectual negotiations for peace. Great Britain joined Holland, Austria, Saxony, and Sardinia in the Treaty of Worms, September 1743 (q.v.), for the maintenance of the Pragmatic Sanction. A counter-league, known as that of Frankfort, with France at its head, was soon formed. The French then prepared an expedition under Marshal Saxe to invade England and restore the Stuarts, but a violent storm prevented the transports from sailing. There was now a change of ministry; Carteret being driven from office, and the Pelham administration established on a "broad bottom." The system of German subsidies was continued. The campaign in the Netherlands of 1745 terminated in the defeat of Fontenoy. The same year was rendered memorable in British annals by the invasion of Prince Charles Edward. [JACOBITES.] He defeated Cope at Prestonpans in September, and marched as far as Derby, to the great alarm of the government. He then retreated into Scotland, and won the battle of Falkirk, but his army was cut to pieces at Culloden, in April 1746, and he escaped with difficulty to the continent. In the midst of this crisis the Pelhams, failing to procure the admission of Pitt to office, had resigned; but, on Grenville's failing to form a ministry, they returned to power, having gained their point. Abroad, the Duke of Cumberland's campaign in the Netherlands was not successful. At length the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (q.v.) brought the struggle to a close, the terms being a mutual restoration of conquests (1748). Pelham thereupon introduced an important financial measure, proposing to reduce the interest on the national debt to three per cent. This was followed up by the reform of the calendar in 1751, and two years later by Hardwicke's Marriage Act. A bill for the naturalization of Jews was carried, but popular sentiment necessitated its repeal. The Wesleyans became numerous, and exercised a reviving influence on religion. In 1754, on the death of Pelham, the incompetent Newcastle assumed the government. "Now I shall have no more peace," said George II. A new war was breaking out with France in India and America, and the Seven Years' War was on the verge of beginning. In 1756 war began. Minorca was captured by the French owing to the conduct of Admiral Byng (q.v.); and Newcastle, deserted by Fox, was obliged to resign. Pitt failed to form a durable ministry, until, by a coalition with Newcastle, the ministry was constituted which so gloriously carried on the war. Vigorous measures were at once set on foot on the continent. Austria, France, and Russia fought against Great Britain and Prussia. The traditional policy of Britain was truly upset. [SEVEN YEARS' WAR.] A long series of expeditions kept up the fame of the British arms. The attack on Rochefort was unsuccessful, nor was the enterprise against Louisburg, in America, attended with better results. Finally, the Duke of Cumberland, beaten at Hastenbeck, and surrounded by the French at Kloster-Seven, was compelled to capitulate. In India, however, Clive had gained the great victory of Plassey. In 1758 Ferdinand of Brunswick was appointed commander in the place of Cumberland. After his victory at Crefeld a large body of troops was sent to assist him. The expeditions against Cherbourg and St. Malo were productive of little result. In America the British took Louisburg, Fort Duquesne, and Ticonderoga, and in Africa Goree (December). The year 1759 was one of the most glorious in British history. In June Guadeloupe was captured; in August, Ferdinand of Brunswick gained a great victory at Minden, and saved Hanover; and Admiral Boscawen defeated the French off Lagos; in November Wolfe beat them at Quebec, and Hawke defeated Conflans off Quiberon. In India the siege of Madras was raised, and Coote took Wandewash (January 1760). The victories of Frederick the Great in the following year may be said to have concluded the war. At the moment of prosperity George died suddenly on October 25, 1760. Lord Stanhope's estimate of his character is that "he had scarcely one kingly quality, except personal courage and justice. Avarice, the most unprincely of all passions, sat enshrined in the inmost recesses of his bosom. . . . Business he understood, and transacted with pleasure. Like his father, he was far too Hanoverian in his politics, nor wholly free from the influence of his mistresses. But his reign of thirty-one years deserves this praise, that it never once invaded the rights of the nation, nor harshly enforced the prerogatives of the Crown; and that it left the dynasty secure, the constitution unimpaired, and the people prosperous."

George III (b. June 4, 1738, s. October 25, 1760, d. January 29, 1820) was the eldest son of Frederick, Prince of Wales (q.v.), and the grandson of George II. His father died in 1751, leaving him to the care of his clever mother, Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, and of Lord Bute, by whom he was brought up in the anti-Whig principles set forth in Bolingbroke's "Idea of a Patriot King." After a love affair with Lady Sarah Lennox, which was nipped in the bud, George married, in 1761, the Princess Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. Immediately upon his accession, the king set himself to break the power of the Whig houses. By the aid of the "King's Friends" (q.v.), Pitt was driven from power (1761), and his policy reversed by the Peace of Paris (1763). The incompetence of Lord Bute, however, postponed the triumph of Toryism, and George was forced to submit to the obnoxious administrations of George Grenville (1763), and of Rockingham (1765). At length Pitt, now Earl of Chatham, who had broken with the Whigs, consented to come to the king's rescue, but a nervous disorder soon forced him to retire, and the administration was continued by the Duke of Grafton, the king all the while steadily pursuing his policy of breaking up party ties, and so making supreme the influence of the Crown. The persecution of Wilkes (q.v.) was made a personal question; but the king was as yet popular, and the unconstitutional conduct of the government excited little indignation outside London and Middlesex. At length, in 1770, ten years after his accession, George found himself in a position to appoint Lord North prime minister, and for twelve years personal government obtained in England, the premier being nothing more than a passive instrument in the hands of his sovereign. They were years of disaster and disgrace. At home, the royal influence was used unscrupulously to further particular measures and to browbeat the opposition, appointments in the army were tampered with, and the business in parliament controlled. Abroad, the policy of coercing the American colonies, continued in accordance with the express wish of the king, was at first extremely popular in England, nor did opinions begin to change until the declaration of war had been followed by Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga, and by the intervention of France in the struggle (1778). Then North wished to resign in favour of Chatham, but George declined to "possess the crown under shackles"; and by the death of the great statesman in the following year he was left free to carry on the "king's war," in spite of the misgivings of the prime minister, and the numerous resignations of his colleagues. The storm was, however, gathering to a head; disaster followed disaster in America; at home the sullen discontent of the masses found expression in the dangerous Gordon Riots (q.v.); there was a strong demand for economical reform; John Dunning moved his famous resolutions against the increasing influence of the Crown. George attempted to stave off the inevitable by negotiating through Lord Thurlow with the opposition, but he was checkmated by the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, and North resigned in March 1782. Once more the king was placed under the hateful thralldom of the Whigs. During Rockingham's brief second ministry he was forced to consent to the acknowledgment of American independence, and though he found Lord Shelburne more pliable, the coalition of Fox and North, formed in 1783, came into office with the express determination to break the royal authority. George resolved to appeal to the country against the government. By a most unconstitutional use of his personal influence in the House of Lords, he procured the rejection of Fox's India Bill; ministers were dismissed, and after Pitt, the new prime minister, had roused the enthusiasm of the nation by his gallant struggle against the majority in the Commons, parliament was dissolved in 1784, and the elections resulted in the complete victory of the Crown over the Whig oligarchy. For the second time in the reign the king had been able to override the House of Commons, and he again found himself in possession of a long lease of power checked only by the fact that his minister was not a mere servant like Lord North.

A period of considerable material progress followed, during which Pitt's excellent administration gained for the Crown much popularity, unchecked by the king's well-known dislike to parliamentary reform. It was, however, a time of much misery to the king, who was distressed by the irregularities of his sons, and who became afflicted in 1788 with that mental aberration of which symptoms had appeared soon after his accession. At first he was made considerably worse by the incapacity of the court doctors, but under the skilful treatment of Dr. Willis he rapidly recovered, and on April 23, 1789, personally attended the Thanksgiving Service at St. Paul's. His popularity, which was partly due no doubt to the distrust with which the heir apparent was regarded, was at its height when the outburst of the French Revolution frightened even the greater part of the Whig malcontents, as well as the mercantile and propertied classes, into lending their support to the throne. It was with the approval of the upper classes that the king and his minister entered upon that course of repression of opinion which tended, more than anything else, to make the lower orders espouse the new gospel of democracy. It is unnecessary to describe in detail Pitt's splendid efforts to keep together the European coalition, which opposed such a wavering front to the determined progress of the French arms. The burdens imposed upon the nation, added to the sufferings produced by bad harvests and depression of trade, rapidly made the war very unpopular, and with it the king, who was assaulted by the mob when he went to open parliament for the autumn session of 1795. Nevertheless, the struggle continued, though Napoleon had appeared, and though the victories won by English seamen could not atone for the defeats experienced by continental generals. In 1800 a lunatic named Hatfield made an unsuccessful attempt to shoot the king. Once more England's weakness was Ireland's opportunity, and Pitt wished to stave off rebellion by emancipating the Catholics. The king refused to agree to such a measure, alleging that it would be a violation of the coronation oath, and finding the minister determined, he was forced to accept his resignation (March 1801). The shock to George was so great that it brought on a fresh attack of insanity, from which, however, he soon recovered. Pitt's successor was Addington, who was a second North in point of subservience. He was enabled to conclude the short-lived Peace of Amiens in March 1802, but few believed it to be real, least of all the king. War was again declared in May 1803, and it was while he was urging forward with the utmost zeal the preparations that were being made to resist the French invader that the king became once more a prey to madness. He rallied to discover that both the people and parliament were weary of the incapacity of Addington, and clamouring for the return of Pitt to power. Negotiations were opened; Pitt wished to form a ministry on a broad basis, but the king declined to admit Fox, whom he personally disliked, and a government was at length created of a completely Tory colour. It carried on the struggle against Napoleon with indifferent success until 1806, when Pitt died, the news of the victory of Trafalgar being insufficient to rescue him from the dejection caused by the defeat of Austerlitz. Again the king was forced to have recourse to the opposition, and, sorely against his will, was compelled to accept Fox and Grenville as leaders of a wide "Ministry of All the Talents" (q.v.). Grenville, weakened by the death of Fox, attempted to bring forward the Catholic claims again, in the form of a small measure for the relief of officers in the army and navy. It was about to become law, when the king, alarmed by the resignation of Lord Sidmouth (Addington), and encouraged by the promise of the Duke of Portland to form a government suitable to his wishes, called upon the ministers to drop the bill. They obeyed, but at the same time drew up a minute reserving their right to revive the question. This George desired them to withdraw, and to give him a written engagement that they would never offer him any advice upon the subject of Catholic concession. With great propriety they declined to give any such pledge; they were promptly dismissed and replaced by a ministry led nominally by the Duke of Portland, and really by Spencer Perceval. A dissolution resulted once more in the national ratification of the sovereign's unconstitutional action (1807). This was the king's final triumph. The ministry, of which Spencer Perceval became the head in 1809, was supported by too large a majority to be overthrown by any amount of blundering in its dealings with America, and gained some credit from the accidental discovery of the talents of Wellington in Spain. In 1811 the reign came, to all intents and purposes, to an end. The health of George III, which had been gravely affected by the failure of the Duke of York in the Walcheren expedition, broke down after the death of the Princess Amelia, and he became hopelessly insane. For nine more years he lingered on, mad, blind, and melancholy, but the glories of the Peninsular War and of Waterloo, as well as the social misery that followed the downfall of Napoleon, have little to do with a king who, if in full mental vigour, would certainly have identified himself with the praise, and would not have shrunk from his share of the blame.

George IV (b. August 12, 1762; s. January 29, 1820; d. June 26, 1830) was born upon the forty-eighth anniversary of the accession of the house of Brunswick. The education which his parents gave him was of so strict and dull a kind that it would have caused any boy of spirit to revolt. The coldness and tedium of his father's court developed quickly the worst side of the prince's character. At twenty he fell desperately in love with a Mrs. Fitzherbert (q.v.), whom he privately married, a marriage void by reason of the Royal Marriage Act; if it had not been, it would have cost

George the throne, as Mrs. Fitzherbert was a Roman Catholic. On his attaining twenty-one his father had settled on him £50,000 a year; the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall amounted to £13,000; and parliament voted him £30,000 to start with, and the same amount to pay off his debts. Within a year his debts amounted to £160,000. The king added £10,000 to his allowance, which only served to encourage his reckless extravagance. In the hope that it might come into power and so help him, he allied himself closely with the Whig party, which his father hated. The action of Fox in 1788 with regard to the Regency Bill raised his hopes of improving his position; but they were disappointed by the king's recovery. The Whigs were evidently a broken reed to lean upon; and Pitt with inexorable coldness refused to help him in any way. The prince was thus thrown back on his father; and the king insisted on his marriage. He was engaged in countless intrigues; and to settle down into wedlock was utterly distasteful to him. Yet it was his only chance of clearing himself from his embarrassments; and in 1795 parliament undertook to discharge his debts, which amounted to £370,000, on his marriage with Princess Caroline of Brunswick, whom George III had selected as an eligible wife for his son. The prince was drunk when he married her (April 8), and before nine months passed by had openly separated from her, to return to his old habits of vice and profligacy. The prince continued to affect an attachment to the Whigs and their political principles, and in the meantime lived the life of a reckless debauchee, day by day disgusting his friends by his faithlessness, and alienating the people's affections by the unconcealed profligacy of his life. In 1803 Addington's government had the boldness to procure an addition of £60,000 to his income. In 1811 he found himself compelled to accept the regency on terms which he did his best to have modified. But his conduct had disgusted his best friends, the Whigs, who now began to see him in his true colours. Finding that nothing was to be got from them, he deserted them in a moment, accepted the regency on the terms proposed, and retained Perceval as prime minister. His heartless conduct to his daughter, the Princess Charlotte, increased his unpopularity. In 1817 the feeling of the people made itself felt by publicly insulting the regent on his way back from opening parliament. On coming to the throne (1820), George attempted to divorce his queen, but the case had to be abandoned, and she died in 1821. Without his father's virtues, George IV had as narrow-minded a horror of change as the old king himself. Fortunately for the country he had not the moral strength, or even the obstinate courage, which had enabled George III always to gain his point. In deference to the king's conscientious scruples Pitt had consented to waive the Catholic question. The notion of conscientious scruples influencing

George IV was nothing short of ludicrous. He too, however, refused to submit, whereupon Peel and the Duke of Wellington offered their resignations (1829). They were accepted, but before the next day the king had reflected that it was impossible for him to form another ministry, and that his father's old threat of retiring to Hanover would be only too gladly received by the nation: he surrendered and wrote to them a note begging them to remain in office, and allowing them to have their own way. Little more than a year after this event he died.

George V (b. June 3, 1865, s. May 6, 1910), second son of King Edward VII and Queen Alexandra, spent his early career in the navy. He became a naval cadet in 1877 and made voyages to the West Indies, South Africa, Ceylon, Palestine, and Greece. He became a lieutenant in 1885, a commander in 1891, a rear-admiral in 1901, and a vice-admiral in 1903. In 1892 he was created Duke of York, and in the following year married Princess Victoria Mary, daughter (b. 1867) of Francis, Duke of Teck. In 1901 he became Prince of Wales, and spent the next two years touring the British Empire. On the death of Edward VII (May 6, 1910) he became king, the coronation taking place on June 22, 1911. During the Great War the king paid many visits to the Grand Fleet and to munitions centres, and in 1917 he visited France. In 1917 also he abandoned all German titles for himself and his family, and proclaimed that the royal house should be known henceforward as the House of Windsor. In June 1921 the king and queen inaugurated the new parliament of Northern Ireland. Next year they visited Belgium, and in 1923 Italy. In 1924 and 1925 the king opened the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley.

George, PRINCE OF DENMARK (1653-1708), was the second son of Frederick III of Denmark and Sophia of Lüneburg. On July 28, 1683, he married Princess Anne, daughter of James II. It was hinted to him that the claim of his wife and himself to the throne might be preferred by James to that of William and Mary if they became converts to Catholicism; and George seems to have been attracted by the idea. The marriage was perhaps intended as a blind to the English Protestants. When William of Orange landed in England, George deserted James at Andover. As man after man joined the invader, Prince George uttered his usual exclamation, "Est-il possible?" "What," said the king, when he heard that his son-in-law, influenced by Lord Churchill, had followed their example, "is 'Est-il possible' gone too? After all, a good trooper would have been a greater loss." Soon after the accession of William III, he was created Duke of Cumberland. He offered to accompany William to Ireland, but the offer was declined. When Queen Anne ascended the throne he at once accepted the position of "his wife's subject." He was created lord high admiral, but a commission was appointed to perform his duties. His request to be placed in command of the Dutch army was disregarded in favour of Marlborough. In 1702 he was compelled to vote for the bill against Occasional Conformity, although himself a notorious example of it. In 1707 an attack was directed against the naval administration. The object of censure was, however, not so much the prince as Admiral Churchill, the brother of Marlborough. Towards the end of his life the Tories used him as an instrument to push their interests with the queen. As he lay on his death-bed, the Whigs, in order to procure the admission of Somers to office, threatened again to assault the management of the navy. George was an exceedingly incompetent man. "I have tried him drunk," said Charles II, "and I have tried him sober, and drunk or sober there is nothing in him." He was a good husband, and Anne was much attached to him.

Gerberoi, THE SIEGE OF (1080), was an incident in the struggle between William the Conqueror and his eldest son Robert, who, aided by the French king, sought to establish himself in Normandy. During the skirmishing which accompanied the siege Robert is alleged to have unhorsed and wounded his father. Subsequently he expressed penitence for his rebellion, and a reconciliation was effected. The story of the personal encounter between the king and his son is, however, of doubtful authenticity.

Germain, GEORGE SACKVILLE, 1ST VISCOUNT SACKVILLE (1716-85), was the son of Lionel, Duke of Dorset. He served at the battle of Fontenoy, and fought under the Duke of Cumberland at Culloden. In 1753 he was sent as secretary to Ireland, and quarrelled with the Speaker, Boyle. In 1758 he refused the command on the coast of Brittany, preferring to serve in Flanders, on the ground that he was "tired of buccaneering." He commanded the British and German cavalry on the right of the allies under Ferdinand of Brunswick at the battle of Minden, and when orders were sent him to charge, he obstinately refused to do so, affecting to misunderstand the order. After enduring several slights from Ferdinand, he resigned his command, and on his return home a court-martial adjudged him unfit to serve in any military capacity (April 5, 1760). On the death of George II he attempted to return to court. In the year 1761 he was elected member for Hythe; and in 1762 we find him complaining of the expenses of the war. In 1766 he was restored to the privy council. In 1770, in consequence of inheriting an estate, he assumed the name of Germain. In the following year he fought a duel with Governor Johnstone of Pensacola. In 1775 he was made secretary of state for the colonies, but his military knowledge and talents ill-atoned for his rash and violent temper. He quarrelled with his subordinates, especially Sir Guy Carleton and Sir William Howe, and in 1778 threatened to resign, in a fit of anger, on Carleton's being appointed governor of Charlemont. He superintended the preparations for the American War. In the year 1782, in order to rid themselves of him, the ministry persuaded the king to raise him to the peerage. There was great outcry at this, and his first speech in the House of Lords was an attempt to remove the imputation of cowardice at Minden. We subsequently find him acknowledging the fact that the king was his own minister. Lord Sackville was a man of undoubted talents and great ambition, but of a violent temperament, which urged him to ill-judged courses.

Germantown, THE BATTLE OF (October 4, 1777), fought between Washington and Lord Howe at Germantown, on the Schuylkill River, north of Philadelphia. The British held Germantown to protect Philadelphia, which they had recently occupied. Washington attacked them with great success at the outset, but becoming panic-stricken, the Americans fled, leaving the British in possession of the town.

Germanus, St. (d. 448), Bishop of Auxerre, is said to have visited Britain (A.D. 429) to combat Pelagianism. He converted to Christianity those British tribes which still remained heathen. Encouraged by him the Britons won a bloodless victory (known as the Alleluia Victory—(q.v.)) over the combined Picts and Saxons. As a result central Britain appears to have been saved for several years from a repetition of the barbarian attack. He revisited the island in 447. The dedication of several churches in Wales and Cornwall to him attests the memory of his visits.

Germany, RELATIONS WITH, AFTER 1870. [For relations down to 1870 see PRUSSIA and EMPIRE.] The difficult period of Anglo-German relations from 1870 to 1914 has not yet been completely elucidated. But the main threads are fairly clear. During the twelve years in which Bismarck was building up the Triple Alliance of 1882 (q.v.) his attitude towards Great Britain was one of caution and cordiality, illustrated in his negotiations with Beaconsfield in 1876 and his abortive proposal of 1879 that Great Britain should associate herself with the Austro-German treaty concluded against Russia in the latter year. After the accession of the Emperor William II (1888) relations remained cordial until 1894. The Kaiser paid annual visits to Cowes Regatta, and Heligoland was ceded to Germany in 1890. But during the chancellorship of Prince Hohenlohe the Kaiser began to develop his own foreign policy, and rivalry grew between the two nations in various parts of the world, aggravated by a personal antipathy between the emperor and the Prince of Wales. In the Balkans Great Britain feared the German Baghdad Railway scheme and German penetration in Turkey and Palestine. In Africa the dispatch of German warships to Delagoa Bay in 1894, and the telegram in which the Kaiser congratulated Kruger on the result of the Jameson Raid, made for temporary bitterness and threatened to drive Great Britain into a rapprochement with France. In the Far East Germany leased Kiaochow in 1898 during the powers' scramble for stations on the coast of China after the Chino-Japanese War of 1894, and Great Britain countered by the occupation of Wei-hai-wei. Meanwhile a delicate issue was rising also in the spheres of trade and sea-power, exemplified in the underselling of British by German traders, and in the formation of the Navy League in 1897. Germany was irritated at finding her colonial aims—the result of an urgent economic problem at home—forested by the British. During the Boer War relations improved, but although an Anglo-German treaty was concluded regarding Portuguese South-West Africa, the efforts of Joseph Chamberlain met with indifferent success; and co-operation during the Boxer Rising [CHINA] was neutralized by the German Navy Bill of 1900. Growing rivalry at sea led to the introduction of dreadnoughts by Lord Fisher in 1905, and played its part also in producing the Anglo-French understanding of 1904 [ENTENTE]. The Second Hague Conference was unable to check the competition in naval armaments. Similarly Lord Haldane's mission to Berlin in 1908 was of little avail, while the moderating counsels of the new chancellor, Bethmann-Hollweg (1909) fell on deaf ears. Matters were not mended by the Agadir crisis in 1911 (q.v.), when the firm attitude adopted by Mr. Lloyd George resulted in a diplomatic rebuff for Germany. Lord Haldane went again to Berlin in 1912 to endeavour to revive friendly relations, but Admiral von Tirpitz declined his proposals for mutual accommodation in the naval question. The Balkan crisis of 1912-13 further accentuated the division of Europe into two armed camps, both engaged in a race for armaments. The simultaneous "reinsurance" of Great Britain and "encirclement" of Germany, accelerated by the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1907, produced a widening breach which August 1914 converted into war. The British government's ultimatum, expiring at midnight on August 4 with German troops already across the Belgian frontier and the other Entente armies already in motion, opened the four years of war which were to end in the abdication of the Kaiser (November 9, 1918) and the inauguration of the German Republic.

The outstanding problem after the war was that of reparations. Great Britain dissented from the declaration of the Reparations Commission which charged the German government with "intentional default" in 1922, and the occupation of the Ruhr by French and Belgian troops in January 1923 was deplored by Bonar Law's government. The advent of Labour governments in France and Britain, however (1924), resulted in an improvement of the financial position of Germany on the inauguration of the Dawes Plan, which sought to stabilize German currency and to collect a debt rather than inflict penalties. Two years later Germany entered the League of Nations in accordance with the Locarno Treaties (q.v.).

Gertruydenberg, THE CONFERENCE AT (1710), was an unsuccessful attempt to bring the War of the Spanish Succession to a close. The seat of the negotiations, which were begun on the side of France, was moved from The Hague to Gertruydenberg, a village at the mouth of the Waal. The Dutch demanded that the terms of the previous year, viz., the resignation of the whole of the Spanish succession and the restoration of Newfoundland to Great Britain, should be enforced with the terrible condition that Louis should assist in ejecting his grandson from Spain. This the French king declined (June), although he offered a monthly subsidy towards defraying the expenses of the allies. Although this point was waived, the opposition of Austria and Savoy to these terms of peace necessitated the continuation of the war. [SPANISH SUCCESSION, WAR OF THE.]

Gesith (companion) was the old English equivalent of the Latin comes. Tacitus gives us a description of the primitive comitatus of the old German king. The comites were his personal dependents, fighting his battles, living in his house, and wholly occupied in his service. The position was coveted by the most noble youth of Germany. As the comitatus reappears in England, the increased dignity of the king has immeasurably increased the distance between him and his companions in arms. He now gives dignity and importance to his followers. The gesith becomes the thegn; the companion the servant. The royal gesiths are strongly marked out from the gesiths of the ealdorman or bishop, who are merely his retainers or wards. Ultimately large grants of land reward the services of the faithful thegn. [THEGN.] A new nobility of service ultimately develops from the comitatus. Extinct on the continent, the comitatus becomes in England a chief source of feudalism. The huscarls of Canute reproduce the earlier gesiths of the heptarchic kings. The gesithcundman was a man in the rank of a gesith, and ennobled by his service.

Ghazni, THE SIEGE OF (January 21, 1839), occurred during the first Afghan War. The fort was garrisoned by 3,000 men commanded by Hyder Khan, the son of Dost Mohammed. A nephew of Dost Mohammed turned traitor and gave an accurate description of the condition and character of the defences. It was determined to blow up the gate, and then rush into the fortress. Nine hundred pounds of powder, packed in bags, were conveyed under cover of darkness to the gate and successfully exploded. Colonel Dennie rushed in with the storming party over the debris, and drove back the enemy who were hastily assembling behind the breach, and a mortal struggle ensued which lasted some hours. At dawn of day the British ensign floated over the citadel of Ghazni, which was thus won with a loss of 180 men. [AFGHAN WARS.]

Ghilzais, THE, are inhabitants of the province lying to the north-east of Kandahar. They have been the most resolute opponents of every invader, and have never submitted to the rulers of Kabul or Kandahar, but have continued their hereditary profession of levying blackmail on all who traverse their mountains.

Gibbet Rutts was the scene of an unfortunate massacre of a body of Irish rebels during the rebellion of 1798. Sir James Duff advanced on the camp from Limerick, and the garrison offered to surrender, but by some accident a gun was discharged, and the troops, fearing treachery, charged with the bayonet, and killed over 200 of the rebels (May 26, 1798).

Gibraltar, a promontory at the entrance to the Mediterranean, is situated in the Spanish province of Andalusia. The natural strength of the position—it is, in fact, the key of the Mediterranean—attracted attention at a very early date. From 711 to the beginning of the fourteenth century it was in the hands of the Saracens, by whom it was again retaken from the Spaniards, in 1309. In 1411 the rock was taken by the Moorish King of Granada, and in 1462 fell into the hands of the Spaniards, by whom it was formally annexed, 1502. In 1704 a combined British and Dutch fleet, under Sir George Rooke (q.v.), compelled the governor, the Marquis de Salines, to surrender, and Gibraltar has ever since remained in the possession of the British, sustaining a well-conducted siege in 1705. In 1713 it was formally ceded to Great Britain by the Treaty of Utrecht. Many attempts have been made by the Spaniards to recover so important a position. In 1718

Stanhope was almost induced to surrender what he regarded as of little value and an insuperable obstacle to peace with Spain. In 1720 a projected attack, under the Marquis of Leda, came to nothing, and in 1727 the Count de la Torres and 20,000 men also failed to take the rock. In 1757 Pitt was willing to surrender the rock if the Spaniards would help in the recapture of Minorca from the French; but they persevered in neutrality, and in 1761 joined the Family Compact (q.v.), largely in consequence of a desire to win it back. The most famous siege of Gibraltar lasted from 1779 to 1783 and was undertaken by a combined force of Spaniards and French, which was successfully withstood by the British under General Eliott (q.v.), afterwards Lord Heathfield; a siege almost unparalleled in the annals of ancient or modern warfare. The possession of Gibraltar gives Great Britain a commanding attitude at the entrance to the Mediterranean. The administration is in the hands of a military governor who exercises all legislative power.

Giffard, WILLIAM (d. 1129), who was probably related to Walter Giffard, Earl of Buckingham, was chancellor under William II and Henry I. He was appointed to the bishopric of Winchester by Henry I in 1100, although his consecration was delayed until 1107, as a result of the dispute between Henry and Anselm over lay investiture. He introduced the Cistercians into England, and founded the first Cistercian house at Waverley in Surrey (1128). Contemporary historians describe him as a man of true piety and gentleness.

Gifford, GILBERT (1561?-90), a Jesuit, was induced, during the reign of Elizabeth, to turn traitor to his friends by Walsingham's bribes. The treasonable correspondence of the Queen of Scots passed through his hands for delivery, and copies were taken by him, and sent at once to Walsingham. By this means the details of every Catholic plot were made known to the ministers almost as soon as conceived.

Gilbert, SIR HUMPHREY (1539?-83), a half-brother of Sir Walter Raleigh and nephew of Catherine Ashley, by whom he was introduced to the notice of Queen Elizabeth, first distinguished himself as a soldier in the expedition to Havre, 1563, and subsequently was made governor of Munster. In 1578, having obtained from Elizabeth a patent empowering him to take possession of any unappropriated lands he might discover, he sailed to North America, but returned without accomplishing anything. In 1583 he again set out on a voyage of discovery, and took possession of Newfoundland, but whilst on his return was lost with all his crew.

Gilds. Following Dr. Gross's arrangement, it is convenient to make a division of gilds into three classes: (1) The religious and social fraternity; (2) The gild merchant; (3) The craft gild and mystery.

1. THE RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL GILD. This is the class which is met with first in England; in fact the one thing common to all the gilds of which we have knowledge before the Conquest is their non-trading character. It does not follow, of course, that no mercantile gilds existed in Anglo-Saxon times. What we do find evidence of are clubs of knights, or fighting men, formed "for religious and convivial purposes," and associations for mutual assistance in distress, banqueting, the maintenance of a standard of moral conduct, and so on. The Judicia Civitatis Londoniæ of the time of Athelstan describes itself as "ordained and confirmed by the bishops and reeves of London among our frithgegildas (brethren of a peace gild), as well eorlish as ceorlish," to supplement the decrees of recent witenagemots. It provides for common banquets, and the [singing of funeral psalms. But its chief object is the enforcement of mutual defence; payment is made towards a common insurance and police fund; directions are given for the pursuit of thieves and the exaction of compensation; and the members are arranged in bodies of tens and hundreds under headmen. While social and religious gilds existed to the close of the Middle Ages, there is no mention of frith-gilds after the Conquest. Some of these early associations may have had a continuous history over the ridge of the Norman Conquest, and gained a more commercial character, thus becoming merchant gilds. Religious gilds appear to have been formed frequently throughout the Middle Ages and to have flourished in many towns, founding schools, keeping up roads, and acting as charitable associations and friendly societies. In 1547 the funds of the religious gilds, and the religious funds of the other gilds (many gilds had a semi-religious character), were confiscated.

2. THE GILD MERCHANT, OR HANSA (gilda mercatoria, ceapmanne gilde). The earliest reference to a merchant gild is in the charter given to the town of Burford (1087-1107) by its lord. After this, evidence grows thick. Altogether, some hundred towns must have had merchant gilds, and among these it was in the smaller boroughs that this form of association became the most important and powerful institution. Certain large towns, like London, Norwich, and the Cinque Ports, seem never to have had one. It may have been that with their bigger and more varied trade a gild merchant would have been unwieldy. Although the gild was "an official organ or department of the borough administration" and was recognized as such in borough charters, it was nevertheless a distinct organization; it had a later birth than the burghal entity, and, as gildsmen, its members were concerned only with the care of the town's trade, not with its civil and military government. In a few cases it has been difficult to distinguish the gild from the town government, partly because the personnel of the two was almost identical. A fundamental privilege of the gild merchant was the right of its members to exclusive trade, both wholesale and retail, within the town, without toll or hindrance. Protection from competition was thus one of the reasons for its formation. In practice it was useless to attempt a complete exclusion of foreign (i.e., extra-burghal) merchants, and these would generally be admitted to part of the trade under certain conditions. Some royal charters gave the members of merchant gilds exemption from toll throughout the kingdom, and thus "the grant of incompatible privileges to rival communities was a source of profit to the mediæval monarchy; the Crown secured payment in hand for the charters, and reaped the benefit of the inevitable dispute that followed." There was a certain communal quality about the relations of gild members. The right of Lot gave each the privilege of sharing in any purchase made by one of his fellows. In Southampton it was ordained that "a gildsman shall have a share in all the merchandise which another gildsman buys, if he is on the spot where the merchandise is bought." The officials of the gild, generally an alderman supported by two or more wardens or masters, had sundry duties to perform. The gild was responsible for the supervision of manufactures and the fixing of wages, until its functions were taken over by craft gilds. It had to carry out a number of charitable obligations when its members in one way or another came to grief; it had to take responsibility for its members' debts, which were a not infrequent cause of inter-municipal strife. Its court met regularly and strove to control the town's trade. The great period of the merchant gild in England was that covered by the reigns of Henry II, his sons and his grandson. In the fourteenth century the merchant gild is in decay and many of its functions are already being undertaken by industrial fellowships organized according to their trading functions. The "aggregate of the crafts superseded the old general gild merchant" (Gross). In some few places the gild merchant, shorn of many of its ancient privileges, survived for centuries.

3. THE CRAFT GILD AND MYSTERY. The problem of the origin of the craft gild has not the constitutional importance as that which pertains to the gild merchant. We shall not go far wrong in supposing that the craft gild arose spontaneously in a number of places round about the first quarter of the twelfth century as a result of the call for more specialization in the organization of industry and retail trading. The process began in the textile and leather industries, where considerable division of labour was already practised, and the first mention of the craft gild occurs in the Pipe Roll of 1130. The purpose of the association was the protection of a single local industry and not (at least yet) of local trade as a whole. In consequence of a division of interests and of the claim of yet another form of organization to a share in local political control it was inevitable that there should be friction between craft gild and town government. The craft gilds were seldom successful in winning more than conditions for a stable existence in the town's economy, for they encountered much opposition from borough authority, they were weakened by their own rivalries, and in some cases their growing importance stimulated the antagonism of the merchant gild. But any struggle there may have been between the craftsmen and the local aristocracy, whether of commerce or chivalry, had little of the bitterness of the great conflicts on the continent, and the view which was once held that the craft gilds forced their way in England to positions of predominance by dint of fierce attacks on the power of the merchant gilds is now discredited. Where the merchant gild existed, the master craftsman of the craft was probably a member. The master craftsman was a member of one of the three main classes of his own gild. Under him, but not necessarily as his social subordinates, were the journeyman and the apprentice. "The trade gilds became completely self-governing, and imposed on their members minute regulations as to trade processes and personal morality. In was an industry of small shops and of general equality; for each master employed only two or three workmen (who earned at least half as much as he did, and might fairly hope to become masters in their turn), together with an apprentice or so. But with the beginning of the fifteenth century it became in some crafts very difficult to rise to the position of master, and there are traces of the formation of separate yeomen's—i.e., journeymen's—gilds." Industrial control was the main activity of the craft organization. It existed to protect the consumer against defective wares, advancing a claim, in so doing, to the support of the local authorities; it existed, further, to protect the members of the craft against the disloyalty of those who might be tempted to employ cheap or unskilled labour. Its ordinances regulated the hours and conditions of work and the charges imposed on customers. The length and terms of apprenticeship were fixed by common agreement. Religious and social functions were secondary to these, although the association might often have its beginnings as a religious fraternity and maintain thereafter an elaborate programme of ritual observance. The craftsmen's plays and pageants in large towns like York and Chester and Coventry have left interesting material for the student of mediæval social life. The craft gild also undertook the functions of a friendly society and provided arbitration machinery for members involved in mutual disputes.

In the fourteenth century the craft guilds approached as near as they ever did to the ideal condition of mediæval craft organization. But already the formation of societies to protect the interests of the journeyman indicates a change of balance in distributive justice, and in the same period we begin to notice those complex changes in the interrelations of the separate guilds which the late Professor Unwin has so brilliantly analysed. The tendency was for a class of capitalist employers to obtain control of the craft. Processes were often numerous, and in the various steps in the passage of an article from raw material to marketable commodity the members of several guilds were frequently employed. Those engaged in a certain process would gain predominance and hand out work to the others. Sometimes a guild which had found this way to prosperity would become a purely trading organization, keeping the industrial processes under its control. In 1517 the Leathersellers of London had swallowed up the Glovers, the Pursers, the Whitetawyers, and the Pouch-makers. In other cases (e.g., in the cutlery trades) a single industrial group destroyed the independence of the other crafts engaged in a chain of production. In the fifteenth century a good many of the smaller crafts, which were often specialized to a ridiculous degree, disappeared entirely or were absorbed by others which had acquired big capital resources. Sometimes a number would combine for predatory or, more generally, for defensive purposes. Especially in London are the changes noticeable. The fifteenth century saw the rise of the great livery companies, which included many crafts and, growing powerful, sought legal incorporation. "In some towns all the crafts were consolidated into a single fraternity; in this case a body was reproduced which regulated the whole trade monopoly of the borough, and hence bore some resemblance to the old guild merchant." Elsewhere several groups remained, and industrial and commercial capital struggled for control. Attempts were made to compel these masters' organizations to submit to supervision. A series of acts of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries made it necessary for guilds to seek confirmation of their ordinances by municipal and, later, by national authority; an act of 1536 forbade restrictive agreements on the part of masters to prevent apprentices and journeymen starting in trade on their own account; another in 1531 instituted maxima above which no fees should be charged to youths entering or leaving apprenticeship.

The beginning of the break-up of the guild system is clearly perceptible in the Tudor period. New industries, or old ones re-established on a more effective basis outside the towns, challenged the old traditions. Within many of the guilds themselves the journeymen and sometimes the smaller masters were forced into an inferior organization, under the control of the mercantile element. At the end of the sixteenth century the small industrial craftsmen were often in revolt. When strong enough they succeeded in breaking away and in setting up a new fellowship. But those who were not independent masters were never powerful enough to recover their old position as partners in a mutual brotherhood of employers and employed. In the seventeenth century trade unions first make their appearance. [BOROUGHES; BURGESS; TRADE UNIONS; APPRENTICES.]

Gin Act, THE (1736), was proposed by Sir Joseph Jekyll, in order to check drunkenness. He advocated a prohibitive duty of 20s. on every gallon sold by retail, and £50 yearly for a licence to every retailer. The measure was disliked by Walpole, who inserted a clause that £70,000 should be granted to the king to compensate him for the consequent diminution of the civil list. The act was repealed in 1743; and a new bill was passed, by which "a small duty per gallon was laid on spirits at the still head, and the price of licences reduced to 20s."

Ginkel, GODERT DE, EARL OF ATHLONE (1630-1703), was one of the Dutch officers who accompanied William of Orange to England. In 1689 he reduced some Scottish regiments which had mutinied at Harwich when under orders to be in readiness to cross to the continent. He accompanied William to Ireland, and commanded a body of horse at the battle of the Boyne. When William left Ireland, Ginkel was appointed commander-in-chief. He reduced Ballymore without difficulty and proceeded to lay siege to Athlone, which he carried by assault, and subsequently won the victory of Aghrim (q.v.) over St. Ruth. This victory completed the conquest of Ireland (July 12). Ginkel then besieged Limerick, which he captured (October 2), and granted fairly favourable terms to the defenders. A violent dispute arose between Ginkel and Sarsfield, the Jacobite leader, as to the destination of the Irish troops; till at length it was decided that they might make their choice between England and France. For these services Ginkel was created Earl of Athlone. The small estate that was given him in Ireland for his services was one of the objects of the Commons' attack in 1700. [RESUMPTION BILL.] After the declaration of war with France he competed unsuccessfully against the Duke of Marlborough for the position of commander of the Dutch forces. Before the arrival of the great duke in Flanders, his clever occupation of Nimeguen prevented its seizure by Marshal Boufflers. Ginkel had little knowledge or understanding of English feelings and institutions; but his abilities as a general were certainly conspicuous.

Gipsies in England. The gipsies first appeared in England in 1514, and in Scotland rather earlier. In 1531 an act banished them from England, and in 1540 from Scotland, under pain of death. Henry VIII, as a milder measure, shipped some gipsies to Norway. A statute of 1562 made even intercourse with gipsies felony; and in 1592 five men were hanged at Durham "for being Egyptians." Not till 1783 was the act of 1592 repealed. In Scotland there are cases of executions of gipsies, for no other crime than their origin, in 1611 and 1636. Since 1866 gipsies have become Rumanian citizens.

Girig, the son of Dungal, was associated with Eocha, son of Run, in the government of the Pictish kingdom (878-89). He is the hero of many stories, mostly dubious. He is said to have freed his country from the Danes, to have overrun Lothian, and to have subjugated Ireland; while, in consideration of certain privileges conferred on the monks of St. Andrews, he has been called "the Liberator of the Scottish Church."

Gisors, THE TREATY OF (1113), was concluded between Henry I and Louis VI of France, by which Louis resigned his claims to the overlordship of Brittany, Belesme, and Maine to Henry.

Gladstone, WILLIAM EWART (1809-98), son of Sir J. Gladstone, a Liverpool merchant, was born in Liverpool and educated at Eton and Oxford. He entered parliament in 1832 as Conservative member for Newark, and soon distinguished himself as an orator. He became a junior lord of the treasury under Peel in 1835, and in 1841 vice-president of the board of trade and master of the mint. When Newark rejected him on account of his free-trade principles he migrated to Oxford University until the fall of Peel. His reputation as a financier had meanwhile been achieved by the revised tariff of 1842, which had been largely his work. From 1847 until 1852 he studied the Italian question, and in 1851 wrote his famous letter to Aberdeen on the Neapolitan prisons. Under Aberdeen he was chancellor of the exchequer (1852); and when Roebuck's motion and the disasters of the Crimean War drove him into opposition he resisted the Divorce Bill of 1857. In 1858 he was sent by Derby on a special mission to the Ionian Islands, whose union with Greece (achieved in 1864) he warmly advocated. Next year he returned to the exchequer under Palmerston, when the financial experience which he had gained under Peel bore fruit in a series of notable budgets. On Palmerston's death Gladstone became leader of the House of Commons (1865) and (a Liberal now and representing South-west Lancashire) introduced the Reform Bill of 1866, which temporarily ousted the government until it returned on the Irish Church agitation. In 1868 he became prime minister. Gladstone's first ministry (1868-74) is notable in domestic politics for the Irish Church Disestablishment Act (1869), the first Irish Land Act (1870), the Elementary Education Act of 1870, the reform of the army, the abolition of religious tests in universities, and the Judicature Act (1873). In foreign affairs the ministry preserved a neutral attitude throughout the Franco-Prussian War (1870-1), concluding a treaty with each belligerent for the preservation of Belgian independence; harboured the Black Sea Conference of January 1871; and concluded the Treaty of Washington (q.v.). Gladstone resigned in 1874, and until his second administration he occupied himself chiefly with the Bulgarian massacres of 1876, the Balkan wars of 1875-7, the Treaty of Berlin (1878), and the Afghan and Zulu Wars (1879). His famous Midlothian campaign occurred in 1880. His second administration (1880-5) was concerned at home chiefly with Irish affairs—in particular the second Land Act of 1881 and the Phoenix Park murders—and with the Franchise Act of 1884, the Redistribution Act of 1885, and the Inland Revenue Bill of 1885. Attention abroad was concentrated in Egypt and Afghanistan: Gladstone stoutly resisted the claims of Arabi Pasha, and was alarmed in 1885 by the danger of Russian expansion in Afghanistan. [PANJDEH.] On his resignation in 1885 his party suffered in the general election as a result of its Egyptian policy and the death of Gordon. Gladstone returned to power in 1886, but fell again on his first Home Rule Bill. His fourth administration (1892-4) succeeded in passing the (second) Home Rule Bill. In 1895 he withdrew from public life, only emerging in 1896 to denounce the Armenian massacres. He died on May 19, 1898.

Glamorgan Treaty, THE (1645). Charles I, in 1644, unable to turn the Cessation (q.v.) to the advantage he had expected, and Ormonde being unwilling to grant more to the Catholics, sent Lord Herbert, son of the Marquis of Worcester, to Ireland, creating him at the same time Earl of Glamorgan. He was entrusted with a commission sealed with the king's private signet, dated March 12, 1645, at Oxford, authorizing him to grant all the Catholics might demand, if they would send over 10,000 men to his aid. Glamorgan arrived at Kilkenny and concluded a public and a secret treaty with the Catholics (August 25 and December 20). By the first the demands that a Catholic deputation had made at Oxford in 1644 were granted. These were: the abolition of the Catholic disabilities of Poynings' Law, a general amnesty, and a period of limitation for all inquiries into the titles of land. The secret treaty granted to the Catholics the public exercise of their religion in all churches not actually in possession of the State Church; in return, 10,000 men under Glamorgan were to join the king in England, and two-thirds of the Church revenues were to be set aside to provide for their pay. This secret treaty was discovered among the papers of the Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, on his repulse from before Sligo. After this discovery, January 29, 1646, the king sent a message to the two Houses, denying that Glamorgan had any such powers; he wrote to Ormonde in the same strain. There can be no doubt, however, that Glamorgan only fulfilled the king's instructions.

Glanvill, RANULF DE, a famous judge, statesman, and administrator of Henry II's reign. He first appears as sheriff of Yorkshire between 1163 and 1170. In 1174 he did much to save the north from the revolt of feudal barons and the Scottish invasion, and was present at Alnwick. He succeeded Richard de Lucy as justiciar in 1180, and continued in office till Henry's death. It is probable that Glanvill inspired some of Henry's legal reforms. Richard I displaced him from office and compelled him to pay the enormous fine of £15,000. This was the end of his political career. He accompanied Richard on crusade and died at Acre in 1190. He has been generally credited with the authorship of the important treatise "De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ," which appears to have been completed about 1187; but although the book may have been written under his supervision, it is improbable that it was actually his own composition. It is of great importance as the earliest treatise on English law, and throws much light on many reforms of Henry II, of which otherwise we should know very little; and it long remained the standard text-book for English lawyers.

Glasgow owes its origin to the establishment in the sixth century by Kentigern, the apostle of Strathclyde, of a church which became the seat of a bishopric. The town which grew up round the see was in the domain of the bishop. In 1450 Bishop Turnbull founded the university. In 1491 the see was made an archbishopric. Alone of the Scottish cathedrals the church survived the Reformation. In 1638 a famous general assembly at Glasgow accepted the Covenant. The Treaty of Union first gave Glasgow importance as a port, by opening to Scotland the colonial trade. Since then the city has rapidly increased. It rivalled Bristol in the tobacco trade, and, when that was diverted by the American War of Independence, Glasgow industry took new channels. At last Glasgow became the great manufacturing centre of Scotland, while the improvement of the Clyde (chiefly since 1840) made it the first port.

G. E. Todd, "The Story of Glasgow," 1911.

Glassites, THE, were members of a Scottish sectarian body which originated about 1730, when its leader, John Glas, was driven from his parish by the general assembly for a heresy on the kingdom of Christ. Glas taught the "voluntary principle" for the first time in Scotland, and his system of church government was practically congregational. Robert Sandeman, one of Glas's followers, gave another name to the sect and distinguished it by his doctrine of faith as "bare belief of the bare truth." The public worship of this small sect is of a peculiar character.

Glastonbury Abbey. The early history of this great monastic foundation is obscured by a mass of legend; but of its great antiquity there can be no doubt. It is perhaps the only monastic settlement which "carried the traditions of the British Church in unbroken sequence down to Saxon times." Dismissing the fable of its foundation by Joseph of Arimathæa, we have sufficient evidence that it existed long before the conquests of the western districts of Cenevalh and Ine under English sway. It was famed as the burying-place of Arthur, who was almost certainly the donor of the land known as Brent Knoll (Mons Ranarum). After Ine's second foundation, Dunstan's famous reformation and introduction of the Benedictine rule is the next great event in the history of the abbey. The church was rebuilt by Dunstan (946-57), the abbot Herlewin (1101-20), and by King Henry II. At the end of the twelfth century there began a long struggle between the Bishop of Bath and the monks, who eventually succeeded in securing the independence of their abbey (1218-19). It became immensely rich and influential. Its last abbot, Richard Whiting, was hanged by Henry VIII as a traitor, on the top of Glastonbury Tor (1539).

Glen Malure, THE BATTLE OF (1580), was fought in the Wicklow Mountains. Lord Grey de Wilton here suffered a severe repulse from the Irish septs.

Glencairn, EARLS OF. [CUNNINGHAM.]

Glencoe, THE MASSACRE OF (February 13, 1692), has left a dark stain on the reign of William III. The civil war continued to smoulder in the Highlands for several years after the death of Dundee. The management of affairs in Scotland was at this time in the hands of the Dalrymples (q.v.). Viscount Stair, their head, was president of the Court of Session, and Sir John Dalrymple, the Master of Stair, was secretary for Scotland. A proclamation was issued promising pardon to all who should swear, before December 31, 1691, to live peaceably under the existing government. Macdonald of Glencoe, who dwelt at the mouth of a ravine near the south shore of Lochleven, deemed it a point of honour to take the oath as late as possible. On the appointed day he went to Fort William, but, finding no magistrate there, he had to go to Inverary, which he did not reach until January 6. This delay gave his enemies, the Campbells, a pretext for destroying him. Argyll and Breadalbane plotted with the Master of Stair. William was not informed that Macdonald had taken the oath at all. An order was laid before him for the commander-in-chief, in which were the words, "It will be proper for the vindication of public justice to extirpate that set of thieves." The excuse usually advanced for William, that he signed the order without reading it, is probably true, but it is at best a lame one. The order was remorselessly executed. A band of soldiers were sent to the glen, where they were hospitably received by the Macdonalds. At last, on a given day (February 13, 1692), the passes having been stopped by previous arrangement, the soldiers fell upon their entertainers. A failure in the plan led to the escape of many; but the houses were destroyed, the cattle stolen, and thirty-eight men killed on the spot. Others perished of want or cold on the mountains. The effect of the massacre was to promote better feeling between highlands and lowlands and so remove a great obstacle to Scottish national unity.

Glendower, OWEN, or GLYNDWR; more accurately, GLYNDYFRDWWY; called in his own time OWAIN AP GRUFFYD (1359?-1416?), was reputed a descendant of Llewelyn, the last native prince of Wales. He inherited considerable estates in Merioneth, and, coming to London, entered one of the Inns of Court, and subsequently became squire to Henry of Bolingbroke, afterwards Henry IV. A persistent tradition has associated him with Richard II rather than with his rival; and Welsh authorities assert that he accompanied Richard on his Irish campaign and was captured with him in 1399 at Flint Castle. The immediate causes of his hostility to Henry IV must, however, be sought elsewhere than in loyalty to the deposed king. Lord Grey of Ruthin, one of the lords marchers, and Glendower's neighbour, appropriated some of Owen's lands, and the latter's appeal to parliament was disregarded. Provoked by further injustice at the hands of Grey, Owen in 1400 took up arms, and, assuming the title of Prince of Wales, ravaged the lands of his enemy, and bursting into the Marches, wrought great havoc there. The Welsh, whose agrarian grievances were serious, repaired to him in thousands, and the strong Edwardian castles of Conway, Ruthin, and Hawarden soon fell into his hands. Early in 1401 Owen turned his attention to South Wales. Next year he repulsed three formidable armies led against him by Henry IV in person. Among the prisoners taken by him at Pilleth was Sir Edmund Mortimer, uncle of the young Earl of March; a capture which led him to enter in 1403 into a treaty with the Mortimers and Percys having for its object the overthrow of Henry. This alliance was dissolved by the battle of Shrewsbury, but Glendower continued the contest; and official record remains of many acts that prove the reality of his power in Wales. He displaced the Bishop of Bangor, and appointed with the concurrence of the Avignon pope a partisan of his own; and the Bishop of St. Asaph was his ambassador to the French king, with whom he made a treaty in 1405. It was probably in this year that he concerted with Northumberland and Mortimer plans for a tripartite division of England. Receiving aid from France and Scotland, he captured many English towns and castles, and at one time penetrated with his forces as far as Worcester. In perpetual inroads he harried all the Marches in a most merciless way. By the end of 1405, however, his influence had begun to wane. His armies suffered several heavy defeats, and South Wales was reconquered by Henry in 1408, but Owen still held out in the mountains of the north. Henry V, when about to embark on his expedition against France, endeavoured to enter into an arrangement with him, and twice offered him free pardon. But Owen never submitted, and died, probably in 1416, still maintaining his independence. His objects were the political and ecclesiastical independence of Wales, and the revival of learning by the creation of two national universities. In personal character and disinterestedness of aim he contrasts sharply with his contemporaries.

Glenelg, CHARLES GRANT, LORD (1778-1866). [GRANT.]

Glennfruin, THE BATTLE OF, or "Slaughter of the Lennox" (February 7, 1604), is the name given to a sudden incursion of the Macgregors and other clans into the Lennox, and their slaughter of about 80 Lennox men; an affray for which James I never forgave them.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Glenlivet, THE BATTLE OF (October 4, 1594), was fought near Aberdeen, between the forces of James VI, commanded by the Earl of Argyll, and the rebellious Earls of Huntly and Errol. The rebels were inferior in numbers, but were well armed and well led, and defeated Argyll's troops.

Glenmarreston, THE BATTLE OF (Mureston Water, flowing from the Pentland Hills), was fought in 638. Donald Brec, King of Dalriada, was defeated by the Angles.

Gloucester was the Roman municipality or "colonia" of Glevum, founded by Nerva (A.D. 96-8). It was early settled by the English, for Beda speaks of it as a noble city. In 681 the monastery of St. Peter was founded here by Ethelred, and in 1022 it was brought by Bishop Wulfstan under the Benedictine rule. Gloucester was a frequent seat of courts and gemots. In 1541 it was erected into a bishopric by Henry VIII. It was united in 1836 with the see of Bristol, but separated again in 1897.

Gloucester, EARLS OF. [CLARE.]

Gloucester, PEERAGE OF. Robert, a natural son of Henry I, was created Earl of Gloucester in 1122. He married Mabel, daughter and heiress of Robert Fitz-Hamon, Earl of Shrewsbury. His son William, who died 1183, transmitted the title to his three daughters: first, through the youngest, Hawise (or Isabel), to her successive husbands, John, afterwards King of England, and Geoffrey Mandeville, Earl of Essex; then to the issue of her eldest sister, Mabel, who married the Count of Evreux; and finally to the son of the second sister, Amicia, who married Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Hertford. Three generations of the de Clares were Earls of Gloucester, until the widow of the last, Johanna, daughter of Edward I, communicated the title, during her lifetime, to her second husband, Ralph de Monthermer, who, however, never acquired full comital rank. On the death of Johanna in 1307, the title passed to her son, Gilbert de Clare, killed at Bannockburn, whose second sister, Margaret, married Hugh of Audley, created Earl of Gloucester in 1337. At the latter's death, ten years later, the title was presumed to be extinct: it was, however, revived in 1397, in favour of Thomas, Lord Despenser. Thomas was degraded in 1399, when his honours became forfeit. In the meanwhile, 1385, a dukedom of Gloucester had been created for Thomas of Woodstock, sixth son of Edward III, who was succeeded by his son Humphrey. The latter died childless in 1399. Afterwards three several princes of the blood were created dukes by this title, none of whom left issue; namely (1) Humphrey, son of Henry IV, murdered in 1447; (2) Richard, brother of Edward IV, and afterwards king, and (3) Henry, youngest son of Charles I (d. 1660). There was a plan in 1717-18 of reviving the dukedom in favour of George I's grandson, Frederick, afterwards Prince of Wales; but this never took effect. Frederick's younger son, William Henry, however, was created Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh, in 1764, and the peerage lasted until the death, without issue, of this prince's son, William Frederick, in 1834. [CLARE.]

Gloucester, HENRY, DUKE OF (1639-1660), was the third son of Charles I and Queen Henrietta Maria. From the place of his birth he is often known as Henry of Oatlands. Charles, just before his execution, had an interview with his young son, in which he made him promise not to accept the crown from parliament to the detriment of his elder brothers. After his father's death he remained in the charge of parliament till 1652, when he was permitted to join his mother in France, Cromwell being anxious to get rid of one whom many were anxious to proclaim king. The queen exhausted all entreaties and threats to induce him to become a Romanist, but he remained staunch to his religion; and in 1654 left her and joined Charles at Cologne. In 1658 he fought in the Spanish army, and distinguished himself in the battle of Dunkirk. On the Restoration he returned to England, but died of small-pox very shortly afterwards.

Gloucester, HUMPHREY, DUKE OF (1390-1447), was the fourth son of Henry IV. He was created Duke of Gloucester in 1414, and took part in the French wars of Henry V's reign, being wounded in the battle of Agincourt. On his death-bed Henry appointed him regent of England during his son's minority, but parliament refused to allow this, and a council of regency was appointed with Bedford as protector, and in his absence from England, Gloucester. By his reckless folly in marrying Jacqueline of Hainault, and prosecuting her claims in Hainault and Zealand, Gloucester did much to alienate the Duke of Burgundy from the English, while his attempts to gain a foreign principality for himself were fruitless. In 1425 began Gloucester's quarrel with Beaufort, which continued with temporary reconciliation during the whole of his lifetime. The bright spot in Gloucester's character was his affection for his brother Bedford, who was frequently able to restrain his folly and recklessness. After Bedford's death (1435) his opposition to Beaufort became more and more violent, Gloucester representing the war party, popular in parliament and the nation, while Beaufort was the leader of the peace party, which was strongly represented in the council. It was the old struggle of the court and constitutional parties in another form. The trial and conviction for witchcraft of Eleanor Cobham, his second wife, was a great blow to Gloucester's influence, and this was still further injured when, in 1442, Henry VI came of age, and the protectorate was at an end. Suffolk and the Beauforts established themselves as the chief advisers of the Crown, and in 1447 Gloucester was accused of treason at their instigation. The merits of the case it is impossible to decide upon; it is not improbable that Gloucester may have entertained the idea of making himself king, but on this point there is no evidence. At all events, Gloucester was suddenly arrested on February 18, 1447, at Bury St. Edmund's, and placed under arrest, and five days after was found dead in his bed. It is impossible to decide on the cause of his death; it may have arisen from chagrin, or have been the work of some person who hoped thereby to ingratiate himself with the court party, or it may (as popular legend with great probability asserted) have been caused by the orders of the Duke of Suffolk. It is certain that there is nothing to connect it with Cardinal Beaufort, who had now for several years retired from active participation in politics, and who himself died only six weeks after his ancient rival. As a patron of learning, and a benefactor to the University of Oxford, Gloucester deserves high praise, but his public and private career alike are stained with grievous errors, and his influence on English politics was only mischievous. Still, he was popular with the literary men for his patronage of learning, and with the people for his advocacy of a spirited foreign policy. From these causes he was known as the "good Duke Humphrey."

K. H. Vickers, "Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester," 1907.

Gloucester, ROBERT, EARL OF (d. 1147), natural son of Henry I, was the great supporter of the claims of his half-sister Matilda against Stephen. In 1139 he landed in England, and became the empress's commander-in-chief during the war that ensued. In February 1141 he relieved Lincoln and captured Stephen, only to be himself captured at Stockbridge seven months later. Soon after he was exchanged for Stephen, and resumed the active conduct of the war. He died of fever at Bristol in 1147, having lived long enough to witness the collapse of the Angevin cause. He married the heiress of Fitz-Hamon, and so added the lordship of Glamorgan to the earldom of Gloucester.

Gloucester, THOMAS OF WOODSTOCK, DUKE OF (1355-97), was the youngest son of Edward III. He married Eleanor de Bohun, elder daughter and co-heiress of Humphrey, Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton. In 1377 he was created Earl of Buckingham, and in 1380 he became in his wife's right Earl of Essex. Five years later he was created Duke of Gloucester. He served in the French wars, and on his return to England in 1381 took a leading part in the affairs of state. The unpopularity of John of Gaunt, caused by his abandoning the traditional policy of the house of Lancaster in favour of a court policy, and his subsequent absence from England during his fruitless expeditions to Spain, made Thomas the natural leader of the constitutional opposition. His chief aim seems to have been his own aggrandizement, though the misgovernment and extravagance of the king gave him sufficient excuse for interfering. The heavy taxation demanded for the expenses of the French war gave Gloucester the opportunity he desired, and in 1386 he threatened the king with deposition unless he consented to the impeachment of his chief minister, de la Pole, and the appointment of a commission of reform. Richard consented for the time, but attempted, directly parliament was dissolved, to raise a force and assert his independence. But Gloucester was superior in strength, and the king's friends were either executed or obliged to seek safety in flight. Gloucester was the leading spirit in the Merciless Parliament (1388) (q.v.), and practically ruled the kingdom till 1389, when Richard declared himself of age to manage his own affairs, and assumed the government himself. By John of Gaunt's influence a reconciliation was effected between Gloucester and the king, and matters went on smoothly enough—though Gloucester held somewhat aloof from the court—till 1397, when Richard exacted his long-deferred revenge. Alleging that Gloucester was plotting against him, Richard secured the duke's arrest, at Pleshey Castle. He was shipped forthwith to Calais, and when parliament met in September it was informed that the duke was dead. There can be little doubt that he was murdered by Richard's orders. A confession extorted from him on the day before his death was read in parliament, and he was declared guilty of treason and his estates and goods forfeited.

Gloucester, WILLIAM, DUKE OF (1689-1700), was the son of Prince George of Denmark and Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne. He was informally created duke soon after his birth. The untimely death of the young prince—a boy of great promise—was received with sorrow by the nation. It necessitated the passing of the Act of Settlement.

Glynne, JOHN (1603-66), eldest son of Sir William Glynne, of Carnarvonshire, was educated at Westminster School and at Oxford, attained great reputation as a lawyer, and represented Westminster in the Long Parliament. He was a strong Presbyterian, took a prominent part in the attack on the bishops and helped to draw up the charge against Laud and conduct the trial of Strafford. In June 1647 he was one of the members whose punishment was demanded by the army, and was expelled from parliament till the summer of 1648, when he was restored, only to be expelled again by Pride's Purge (q.v.). He sat in both of Cromwell's parliaments, presided at Penruddock's trial (1655), and supported the offer of the crown to the protector. In July 1655 he became chief justice, and held the post till the fall of Richard Cromwell. He assisted in promoting the Restoration, and on the return of Charles II was made king's serjeant and knighted. He was employed in the prosecution of the regicides, and in Vane's trial. Public opinion condemned him as a renegade, and rejoined in an accident which befell him on the day of the coronation.

Goderich, FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON, VISCOUNT (1782-1859). [ROBINSON.]

Godfrey, SIR EDMUND BERRY (1621-78), was a London magistrate, before whom Titus Oates made a deposition concerning the Popish Plot. Some three weeks after this deposition was made, Godfrey was found dead in a ditch near Primrose Hill (October 17), with his own sword run through his body, a livid crease round his neck, and his pockets unrifled. It was at once assumed that he had been murdered by Roman Catholics, but there is not even now sufficient evidence to prove whether a Romanist was guilty or whether the crime was committed by the party of Titus Oates to further their own ends. Three of the queen's servants were tried for the murder, and executed. The Popish Plot agitation really began in the excitement which Godfrey's murder caused.

A. Marks, "Who Killed Sir E. Godfrey?" 1905.

Godfrey (GUTHRED) MacWilliam (d. 1212) was the son of Donald Bane MacWilliam, and, like his father, attempted, in 1211, to wrest the Scottish crown from William the Lion. The royal troops under the Earls of Atholl and Fife achieved various successes, but the rebellion was not crushed until Godfrey was betrayed into the hands of the Earl of Buchan and beheaded at Kincardine (1212).

Godolphin, SIDNEY, LORD, afterwards EARL (1645-1712), was educated as a page at Whitehall. He held various offices at the court of Charles II, including that of groom of the bedchamber, and sat in parliament for Helston. In 1678 he was sent as envoy to Holland, and on his return was sworn of the privy council. In 1679 he was placed on the treasury commission. In 1680 he supported the Exclusion Bill, and persuaded Charles to dismiss the Duke of York to Scotland before parliament met. He became secretary of state in 1684, and in the same year, on the resignation of Rochester, he took his place on the commission of the treasury. On the accession of James he was removed from the treasury, and made chamberlain to the queen. In his official capacity he did not scruple to conform to Roman Catholic observances. In 1687, on the fall of the Hydes, he was again placed on the treasury commission. He was sent as a commissioner to treat with William. On the accession of William and Mary, the treasury business was placed in his hands. In 1690 he resigned, but was recalled as first commissioner against the will of Carmarthen. He had a large share of William's confidence, but influenced by Marlborough, he intrigued with the Jacobites, especially with Middleton, James's secretary of state. He was implicated in the confession of Sir John Fenwick (q.v.); but William, with great magnanimity, ignored the charges brought against him. But the Whigs resolved to drive him from office, and were successful. In 1700 he was recalled to the king's councils; but on the fall of his party, in the last year of William's reign, he was again dismissed. On the accession of Anne he was made lord treasurer, through the influence of Marlborough, whose daughter had married Godolphin's eldest son. In 1708 Godolphin, seeing that his attempt at a composite ministry was a failure, determined to join the Whigs. He was compelled to dismiss Harley and the moderate Tories. For the rest of his administration he was under the rule of the Whig junto. In 1710 he agreed to Sunderland's advice and impeached Sacheverell. The popular outcry proved that the queen and the Tories might venture to upset the ministry. Without Godolphin being consulted, Shrewsbury was made lord chamberlain. Godolphin swallowed the insult; but the dismissal of Sunderland was shortly followed by his own. During the tumult that followed Sacheverell's trial both he and Marlborough intrigued with the Jacobite court at St. Germain. He died of the stone on September 15, 1712.

H. F. Elliot, "Life of Godolphin," 1888; and biography by Spencer Walpole.

Godwin (GODWINE), EARL (c. 990?-1053), was, according to the most probable account, the son of Wulfnoth, the South Saxon who was outlawed in 1009. Of his early life nothing certain is known, but from 1018 onwards we find him witnessing charters as dux, and shortly after marrying the king's cousin Gytha. In 1020 he was made Earl of the West Saxons, and towards the end of the reign of Canute he enjoyed a position in the realm second only to that of the king himself. On the death of Canute, Godwin at first espoused the cause of Hardicanute, and when the latter obtained Wessex he became one of the chief advisers of Emma, who acted as regent. It was at this time that Alfred the son of Ethelred came to England, and was murdered by Harold Harefoot. It seems impossible in the face of the evidence of contemporary writers to doubt that Godwin betrayed the young Etheling to Harold, though the accusation of complicity in Alfred's death, which was brought against Godwin in 1040, resulted in the acquittal of the earl. In any case, Godwin transferred his support in 1037 to Harold, who remained supreme until his death in 1040. Thereafter for two years Hardicanute ruled in England. On his death in 1042 Godwin was foremost in procuring the election of Edward the Confessor to the throne, and during the early part of the reign of that prince he exercised the chief power in the kingdom. His daughter was married to the king, and his sons promoted to earldoms. During this period (1043-51) we find Godwin supporting the English interest, and strenuously opposing that introduction of foreigners which was the great weakness of Edward's reign. But the Normans were too strong for him. The appointment of Robert of Jumièges to the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1051 marked the decline of Godwin's power, and the triumph of the Norman party. The refusal of Godwin to punish the burgesses of Dover for the riot occasioned by the insolence of the followers of Eustace of Boulogne led to the outlawry of Godwin and his family (1051). The next year the tide turned; feeling showed itself in favour of Godwin. He came back from his shelter in Flanders at the head of a fleet. In most parts of England he was welcomed; he sailed up the Thames to London; the army gathered by the king refused to fight against him; and he and his family were restored to all their offices and possessions. The next year Godwin was smitten with a fit at the king's table, and died April 15, 1053. Godwin has been portrayed as the representative of all English feeling, as the leader of every national movement, and as enjoying in consequence an extreme popularity; but the attempt to make a national hero of him is futile. He was an acute and wary statesman, able to practise the baser as well as the nobler arts of statesmanship. His vast wealth suggests a covetous disposition, and he certainly promoted his sons without much care for their deserts. But he could show astonishing moderation at moments of crisis, and as a strong man and a vigorous ruler he was of the type of which England had at that time the greatest need.

E. A. Freeman, "Norman Conquest," 1867-71.

Godwin, WILLIAM (1756-1836), was born at Wisbech and educated locally under Robert Akers. He went to London in 1773, became successively minister of Ware, Stowmarket and Beaconsfield, and cultivated the friendship of Thomas Holcroft and Horne Tooke (q.v.), under whose influence, as well as that of Thomas Paine (q.v.), he published in 1793 his "Political Justice," the first philosophical exposition of English Radicalism, and the precursor of anarchist doctrines during the nineteenth century. The ideas of "Political Justice" were embodied in 1794 in Godwin's novel, "Caleb Williams." They included a belief in the fundamental goodness of man, a denunciation of governmental restraint, a condemnation of punishment, and a spirited attack on private property. By his attack on property (book 8) Godwin links Individualism with Communism. In 1797 he married Mary Wollstonecraft, the author of the "Vindication of the Rights of Women," who died, however, in the following September. He fell now under the influence of Coleridge, who won him over from atheism to agnosticism, and moderated his politics. But his later life was spent in comparative seclusion and poverty, embittered by the suicide of his step-daughter Fanny (1816) and the elopement of his daughter Mary with Shelley (1813). In 1833 Lord Grey made him yeoman usher of the exchequer, a sinecure office in which he continued till his death.

Goffe (or GOUGH), WILLIAM (d. 1679?), was son-in-law to Colonel Whalley, and consequently connected with Cromwell, to whom he was strongly attached. He fought in the Parliamentary army, was one of the members of the High Court of Justice, and signed the warrant for Charles I's execution. He accompanied Cromwell to Scotland in 1651, and assisted in clearing out the Barebones' Parliament. He was one of the major-generals appointed in 1655, and a member of Cromwell's House of Lords. He was one of the few officers in favour of Cromwell's assuming the title of king, and attached himself subsequently to Richard Cromwell. On the Restoration he fled with Whalley to America, where he remained during the rest of his life.

Golab Singh, originally a running footman, attracted the attention of Ranjit Singh and rose to favour. As a Rajput, he was detested by the Sikhs. On the death of Ranjit Singh, 1839, he aimed at becoming supreme in Kashmir, and even engaged in a war with Tibet. At the end of the first Sikh war the principality of Kashmir was sold to him by the British (1840). A formidable opposition was organized against him, which was with difficulty suppressed by Major Henry Lawrence.

Gold Coast. [WEST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Good Parliament, THE (1376), gained its title from the beneficent measures it passed and its bold attitude in reforming abuses. Edward III, old before his time, was entirely under the influence of a worthless woman, Alice Perrers, through whose means John of Gaunt contrived to appropriate to himself the whole of the royal authority, and to appoint his own creatures to all the great offices of state. The parliament which met in April 1376, after an interval of three years, determined to do away with this state of things, and in this resolution they were strongly supported by the Black Prince. Peter de la Mare (q.v.) was chosen as spokesman by the Commons, and he at once demanded in their name that the national accounts should be audited, and that trustworthy counsellors and ministers should be appointed. The Commons next proceeded to accuse certain persons—of whom the chief were Lord Latimer and Richard Lyons—of malversation and fraud, and they were condemned to imprisonment and forfeiture. This is the first instance of impeachment. Alice Perrers was next attacked, and it was ordered that henceforward no woman should interfere in the administration of justice, on pain of forfeiture. The Black Prince having died in the meantime (June 8), the parliament demanded that his son Richard should be brought before them, that they might see the heir to the throne. This, which was intended to checkmate John of Gaunt, who was supposed to be aspiring to the throne, was forthwith done. The Commons also proposed that an administrative council of twelve should be appointed, some of whom were always to be in attendance on the king; this, with certain modifications, was agreed to. But besides these acts, they presented to the king no fewer than a hundred and forty petitions on various subjects, of which the most important were that parliament might be held annually; that the knights of the shire should be freely elected, not merely nominated by the sheriff; the sheriffs should be elected, and not appointed at the exchequer; the law courts should be reformed; the abuse of papal provisions, etc., should be removed. The work of the Good Parliament could be carried out only under the leadership of some powerful personage, such as the Black Prince. Now that he was dead, the power passed once more into the hands of John of Gaunt, who, when once the Good Parliament was dissolved, immediately proceeded to destroy its work. Not one of the petitions became a statute. Alice Perrers regained her place and influence at court, Lyons and other offenders were pardoned, Peter de la Mare was sent to prison, and the council of reform dismissed. But though the work of the Good Parliament was for the time rendered nugatory, the year 1376 forms, nevertheless, an important epoch in the history of parliament. The responsibility of ministers, the rights of impeachment and of inquiry into grievances and abuses, were tentatively asserted, and were destined to receive extension and confirmation in the ensuing period.

"Rolls of Parliament," II, 321 et seq.

Goodman, CARDELL (1649 ?-99), was a Jacobite adventurer in the reign of William III. He had been an actor, a paramour of the Duchess of Cleveland, two of whose children he had attempted to poison, and a forger of bank notes. In 1696 he was confined to jail for raising a Jacobite riot in London in conjunction with Charnock (q.v.). He was one of the conspirators in the Assassination Plot (q.v.), and as his evidence could procure the conviction of Sir John Fenwick (q.v.), efforts were made to get him out of the country. An adventurer named O'Brien met him in a tavern in Drury Lane, and persuaded him to go abroad by offering him an annuity of £500. This he accepted, and arrived safely at St. Germain, where he died of fever in 1699.

Goodrich, THOMAS, lord chancellor of England (d. 1554), made Bishop of Ely by Henry VIII, was a staunch supporter of the Reformation. In December 1551 he succeeded Sir Richard Rich as lord chancellor, and in that capacity was induced, after much solicitation, to set the great seal to the patent altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey. He continued to support Northumberland until he saw that the cause was lost, when he at once resigned his office and retired to his diocese, where, partly from his sacred character and partly from his real insignificance, he was not molested.

Gordon, THE FAMILY OF. The origin of this great Scottish house is extremely obscure. The first prominent bearer of the name was Sir Adam Gordon, justiciar of Lothian under Edward I (1305). His adhesion to Bruce gave him estates in the north that transferred the chief seat of the house from the Merse to Deeside and the Spey valley. The direct male line died out in 1402; but from his female and illegitimate descendants a large circle of Gordons sprang up. His grandson was made Earl of Huntly (1445), a peerage which, elevated to a marquise in 1599, and a dukedom (of Gordon) in 1684, became extinct in 1836. But the title of Marquis of Huntly passed to another branch of the family, which had acquired the title of Viscount Melgund and Aboyne in the year 1627, and Earl of Aboyne in 1660. Other peerages in the family were—the earldom of Sutherland (1512), the barony of Lochinvar and viscounty of Kenmure (1633)—in abeyance since 1847—and the earldom of Aberdeen (1682), belonging to a collateral branch traceable from the fifteenth century.

Gordon, "Genealogical History of the House of Gordon."

Gordon, LADY CATHERINE (d. 1537), was a daughter of the Earl of Huntly, and, on her mother's side, a cousin of James IV, by whom she was married to Perkin Warbeck. Taken prisoner by Henry VII, with her husband, she became an attendant to his queen, and afterwards married Sir M. Cradock.

Gordon, CHARLES GEORGE (1833-85), known as Chinese Gordon, received a commission in the Royal Engineers in 1852, and saw service in the Crimea. In 1862, as commander of the Ever-Victorious Army, he suppressed the formidable Tai-ping rebellion in China. In 1874 he was appointed governor of the tribes in the Sudan by the Khedive of Egypt, and signalized his two years of office by putting down the slave trade, an object to which he again addressed himself when, in 1877, he became governor-general of the Sudan and the Equatorial Provinces. In 1882 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Cape forces; and in 1884 was sent to Khartoum to bring away from the Sudan several garrisons that were hemmed in by the followers of the Mahdi. He was, however, himself shot in the city of Khartoum, and the avant-coureurs of the relief expedition arrived only to find that the city had fallen, and that its heroic defender was slain (February 26, 1885).

Gordon, GEORGE, 4TH EARL OF HUNTLY (1514-62), was one of the last peers in Scotland to oppose the Reformation. He was a man of vast power and wealth, his possessions lying chiefly in the north and west of the Highlands. In his earlier years he defeated the English troops at Haddenrig (1542), and at the head of the Scots army narrowly watched the Duke of Norfolk's invasion of the same year, on which occasion, though avoiding an engagement, he succeeded in materially checking the progress of the English. He was one of the commanders at the battle of Pinkie, where he was taken prisoner (1547). After escaping from prison he became a great supporter of Mary of Guise, the queen-regent, and in later years a strong opponent of the Lords of the Congregation. When Mary, Queen of Scots, returned to her own country (1561) the Earl of Huntly found part of the estates which had been in his possession transferred to James Stuart, the queen's half-brother (Earl of Moray), and plotted the murder of that nobleman. In 1562 he took up arms, and openly denied Mary admittance to her castle of Inverness, which he then held. The castle, however, was soon taken by the royal troops, and shortly afterwards Huntly was defeated and slain at Corrichie, near Aberdeen.

Gordon, GEORGE, 5TH EARL OF HUNTLY (d. 1576), second son of George, 4th earl (q.v.), for whose rebellion the family estates had been forfeited to the Crown, was restored to his title and possessions, August 1565. Soon afterwards his sister, Lady Jane Gordon, was married to Bothwell, while Huntly himself married a daughter of the Duke of Châtellerault. After the murder of Darnley (1567) Huntly accompanied Mary to Seton, and was one of the councillors who presided at Bothwell's trial. Having afterwards taken up arms against the Regent Moray, he was forced to make submission (1569), and to join the party of the government. On Moray's death (1570) Huntly once more raised forces on behalf of Queen Mary, but was soon forced to enter into a pacification with the new regent (1573). He died suddenly in 1576.

Gordon, GEORGE, 6TH EARL AND 1ST MARQUIS OF HUNTLY (1562-1636), only son of George, 5th earl (q.v.), was one of the supporters of James VI after the Raid of Ruthven (q.v.). A staunch adherent of the Catholic faith, he was accused in 1589 of being in league with Philip of Spain, and a year or two later signed the "Spanish Blanks" (q.v.). In 1592 he put the Earl of Moray to death, nominally as an accomplice in Bothwell's rebellion (1591), but most probably in revenge for the treatment which the Gordons had experienced from the Regent Moray. In 1594 he defeated the Earl of Argyll, who attacked him at the instance of the government; but became reconciled to him in 1597, when he also changed his faith and obtained the reversal of his forfeiture. He was not, however, a particularly zealous convert; in 1616 he was excommunicated on suspicion of receiving and protecting Jesuits in his castle. In 1630 his feud with the Crichtons culminated in the loss of his eldest son at the "burning of Frendraught" (q.v.). Shortly afterwards he himself died of a broken heart (1636).

Gordon, GEORGE, 2ND MARQUIS OF HUNTLY (d. 1649), eldest son of George, 1st marquis (q.v.), was appointed Charles I's lieutenant in Scotland, and after having refused all the overtures made to him by the Covenanters took the field in opposition to the Marquis of Argyll (1644). Next year he refused to lay down his arms even at the command of the king, who was then under the control of the Parliament. In 1647 he was taken prisoner, and ultimately beheaded at Edinburgh on March 22, 1649.

Gordon, LORD GEORGE (1751-93). [GORDON RIOTS.]

Gordon, GEORGE HAMILTON-, 4TH EARL OF ABERDEEN (1784-1860), in 1801 began his diplomatic life as attaché to Lord Cornwallis at Paris when engaged in negotiating the Peace of Amiens. In 1806 he was elected a representative peer of Scotland. In 1813 he was employed on a mission to induce Austria to break with Napoleon, and in this he was highly successful. He followed the allied armies; was present at Lützen, Bautzen, and Leipzig; was employed to detach Murat from Napoleon; and was the colleague of Lord Castlereagh at the Congress of Châtillon. He took no further share in public life until 1827-8, when he was offered the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster by the Duke of Wellington with a seat in the cabinet, and shortly after was promoted to the foreign office. In this capacity he took a prominent share in the management of the Greek question, and the formation of the Hellenic kingdom, recognized by the Porte in 1830. In general, however, he was in favour of a policy of neutrality in continental questions. He recognized Louis Philippe immediately; he refused to employ the British power to dispossess Dom Miguel of the crown of Portugal; and he strongly objected to the Quadruple Alliance which Lord Palmerston negotiated. His first tenure of office ended in 1830. He was colonial secretary under Sir Robert Peel in 1834-5, and foreign secretary to the same statesman in 1841. He assisted in carrying the repeal of the Corn Laws and the commercial reforms of Peel, and on the death of that statesman he became the acknowledged head of his party. When in succession both Whigs and Tories had failed to carry on the government, and there was no course left but to apply to the Peelites, Lord Aberdeen was invited to form a government, 1852. He formed a coalition ministry, embracing "men of all parties, from the extreme Tory to the extreme Radical." It was his misfortune to be met by the complications in foreign politics which led to the Crimean War. It was thought at the time, and the opinion has been frequently expressed since, that a greater display of vigour on the part of the ministry might have averted the war. The mismanagement of the campaign completed the unpopularity of the ministry. On January 25, 1855, J. A. Roebuck (q.v.) moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of the army and the conduct of the war. On the motion being carried Aberdeen resigned, and during the remainder of his life took no further share in public affairs. In his home policy he represented the advanced section of the Conservatives, regarding Catholic Emancipation and the repeal of the Corn Laws as advantageous measures rather than as necessary evils. In foreign politics he was the advocate of the principles of friendship with foreign powers, and non-intervention, which he perhaps attempted to apply too indiscriminately. Lord Aberdeen, "the travelledthane, Athenian Aberdeen," of Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," was an accomplished scholar, specially learned in Hellenic antiquities.

Gordon, Sir John (d. 1562), was the third son of the 4th Earl of Huntly. He was one of the numerous suitors of Mary, Queen of Scots, whose favour, however, he lost on the occasion of a brawl in the streets of Edinburgh. He was beheaded at Aberdeen for treason in 1562.

Gordon Riots, THE (June 1780), were the most formidable popular rising of the eighteenth century. In 1778 a bill, brought in by Sir George Savile and Dunning, for the relaxation of some of the harsher penal laws against Catholics, passed almost unanimously through both Houses. Protestant associations were formed in Scotland; a leader was found in Lord George Gordon, a son of Cosmo George, 3rd Duke of Gordon, a young man of twenty-eight years of age; and the agitation spread to England. On June 2, 1779, a body of 50,000 persons met in St. George's Fields to petition for the repeal of the Catholic Relief Act. The mob forced their way into the lobby of the House, and, continually encouraged by Lord George Gordon, prevented the conduct of business. The House adjourned till Tuesday, the 6th. The mob dispersed; but only to begin their work of destruction by demolishing the chapels of the Sardinian and Bavarian ministers. In the evening of the next day the mob renewed their ravages in Moorfields. On Sunday, the 4th, they proceeded to worse extremities. The next day they attacked the house of Sir George Savile, which was carried and pillaged. The alarm spread. Burke had to leave his own house, and take refuge with General Burgoyne; and Lord George Gordon himself saw that the riots were proceeding too violently, and disavowed his old friends. On the 6th the Houses met after their adjournment. A motion was passed that the petitions should be considered "as soon as the tumults subside which are now subsisting." On the very same evening, one detachment of the rioters broke open Newgate and released the prisoners; others were meanwhile releasing, in the same violent way, the malefactors at Clerkenwell. The Fleet Prison was burnt and towards midnight the rioters burnt Lord Mansfield's house in Bloomsbury Square, with its priceless library, the occupants barely escaping. The magistrates did not venture to read the Riot Act; and the Guards would not act until this formality had been gone through. On the 7th the king called a council, and showed, as usual, that where courage was required he would not be wanting. The cabinet wavered on the right of the troops to interfere until the Riot Act had been read; but the attorney-general, Wedderburn, disposed of this difficulty, and the king insisted on prompt action. A proclamation was issued, warning all householders to close their houses and keep within doors; and orders were given to the military to act without waiting for directions from the civil magistrates. Soldiers everywhere drove the rioters before them; but in some cases it was necessary to resort to the use of musketry. The returns sent in show that 200 persons were shot dead, while 250 more were lying wounded in the hospitals, and still more were no doubt carried away and concealed by their friends. On Thursday morning the plunder and conflagrations were completely at an end. One hundred and ninety-two of the rioters were arrested; twenty-five were executed. Lord George Gordon subsequently became a convert to Judaism, and died in Newgate in 1793, having been convicted for libel in 1787.

Gorges, Sir Ferdinando (1566?-1647), was one of the supporters of Essex in his rebellion of 1601. He saved his life by releasing the ministers whom the earl had taken prisoner, and by appearing as a witness against Essex at his trial.

Goring, George, Baron (1608-57), afterwards Earl of Norwich, was a Royalist partisan who betrayed the Army Plot (q.v.) to Pym, but got command of Portsmouth and held it valiantly for Charles I. Afterwards he fought at Lincoln, Preston, and Marston Moor, commanded the Royalist army in the south-west, and attempted to capture Taunton. In 1649 he went abroad, taking service later in Spain, where he died in poverty.

Gorst, Sir John Eldon (1835-1916), after a distinguished career at Cambridge, was for a time (1861-3) civil commissioner of Waikato, New Zealand. Called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1865, he took silk in 1875, and in 1885 was appointed solicitor-general. In 1886 he became under-secretary for India, and in 1890 a privy councillor. He was financial secretary to the treasury in 1891-2.

Goschen, GEORGE JOACHIM, 1ST VISCOUNT (1831-1907), was educated at Rugby and Oriol College, Oxford. Elected one of the members for the City of London in 1863, he became vice-president of the board of trade in 1865, and in 1866 entered the cabinet as chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1868 he was appointed president of the board of trade, and in 1871 first lord of the admiralty. In 1880-1, as ambassador-extraordinary to the Porte, he effected the settlement of the Greek and Montenegrin frontier questions. His tenure of the office of chancellor of the exchequer (1887-92) was signalized by a measure for the conversion of the National Debt. From 1895 to 1900 he was first lord of the admiralty. In 1900 he retired and was created Lord Goschen of Hawkhurst, in Kent.

Gossiped, or compaternity, is a widespread custom amongst the Irish. The extremely strong feelings of attachment arising from it were among the most powerful agents in completely denationalizing the Norman invaders. The Statute of Kilkenny, 1366 (q.v.), made it felony to enter into this relation of godfather with natives, but exemptions were very often granted.

Gough, HUGH, VISCOUNT (1779-1869), entered the army and distinguished himself on many occasions during the Peninsular War. In 1837 he commanded the British army in the Chinese War, and achieved the capture of Canton. For his services he was created a baronet (May 1841). In 1843 he was appointed commander-in-chief in India. He commanded during the first Sikh War, and for his services was created Baron Gough. He also commanded during the second Sikh War, and his crowning victory of Gujarat (q.v.), 1849, was rewarded with a viscounty.

Gough, WILLIAM (d. 1679 ?). [GOFFE.]

Goulburn, HENRY (1784-1856), became member for Horsham in 1808. In 1810 he was made under-secretary of state for the home department. At the general election of 1812 he was elected for St. Germans. From 1812 to 1821 he was under-secretary of state for the colonies. He accepted the post of chief secretary for Ireland in 1821, and held that office until 1828, when he became chancellor of the exchequer. He went out of office in 1830, was elected member for Cambridge University in 1831, and in December 1834 was appointed home secretary. In 1839 he was proposed as Speaker of the House of Commons, but the Whigs carried Charles Shaw-Lefevre. In 1841 he was again chancellor of the exchequer. He retired with Sir Robert Peel in 1846, and from that time took no very active part in politics.

Gowrie, EARLS OF. [RUTHVEN.]

Gowrie Conspiracy, THE (1600), is a name given to a mysterious affair which occurred during the reign of James VI of Scotland. On August 5, 1600, while the king was hunting in Falkland Park in Fife, he was met by Alexander Ruthven (brother of the Earl of Gowrie) who invited him to Gowrie House near Perth, saying that he had caught a Jesuit with a large sum of money in his possession. James, being in need of money, accepted the invitation, and after dinner went with Alexander Ruthven alone, to interrogate the captive. Instead of a prisoner, however, he found an armed retainer of the earl, named Henderson; Ruthven at once told the king he was a prisoner, reminding him of the execution of his own father (William Ruthven, 1st Earl of Gowrie—q.v.) in 1584. James, however, managed to raise an alarm in spite of Ruthven's efforts to stab him, and his attendants hastened to his assistance. Sir John Ramsay, his page, forced his way up a stair to the turret where the struggle was going on, and stabbed Ruthven twice; his brother, Lord Gowrie, was subsequently dispatched by Sir Thomas Erskine and Sir Hugh Herries. The king had considerable difficulty in escaping from Gowrie House, as the citizens of Perth, with whom Gowrie was very popular, wished to put him to death. It was said at the time by the king's enemies that the whole affair had been arranged by James, who wished to get rid of the Ruthvens, but subsequent evidence indicated that there had been a conspiracy between Lord Gowrie, his brother, and Robert Logan, to seize or kill the king. It has also been said that Elizabeth was privy to the scheme.

Grace, THE ACT OF (May 20, 1690), was issued by William III (2 Wm. and Mary, s. 1, c. 10), and as such was received with peculiar marks of respect, and read only once in the Lords and once in the Commons. It excepted from its operation the survivors of the High Court of Justice which had sat on Charles I, and his two nameless executioners. "With these exceptions, all political offences committed before the day on which the royal signature was affixed to the act were covered in general oblivion." The act was opposed by the more violent Whigs because, they said, it had completely refuted his declaration.

Grace, PILGRIMAGE OF. [PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE.]

Graces, THE. In 1628, the government of Ireland being greatly embarrassed by James I's prodigality, an arrangement was concluded by which, in return for the Voluntary Aids, Lord Falkland, as lord deputy, granted, in the king's name, some fifty-one "graces" or concessions. The most important were: (1) Recusants to be allowed to practise in courts of law, and to sue for livery of their lands in the Court of Wards, on taking the oath of allegiance only; (2) the claims of the Crown to land to be limited by a prescription of sixty years; (3) inhabitants of Connaught to be permitted to make a new enrolment of their title-deeds; (4) a parliament to be held at once to confirm these "graces." A parliament was indeed held, but as it was called by Lord Falkland in defiance of Poyning's Law, its acts were considered null and void by the English council. In 1634 Strafford, Falkland's successor, promised, if parliament voted a subsidy in its first session, to hold a second one for considering the "graces." He broke his promise and declared that the most important could not be conceded. When the system of "Thorough" broke down in England, a deputation went over to England and contrived to get all its requests granted by Charles I, 1641, but of course the Parliament was not bound thereby. Graham, JAMES, 5TH EARL OF MONTROSE (1612-50), at first espoused the cause of the Covenanters, whose troops he commanded in the north of Scotland. Having got possession of his enemy, Huntly, by violating his safe-conduct (1639), Montrose sent him to Edinburgh, and continued his movements against the Gordons and other Royalists, whom he defeated at Stonehaven, subsequently routing them again at the Bridge of Dee. In 1641, annoyed at the Covenanters refusing him the supreme command, Montrose went over to the side of the king, who created him a marquis in 1644. In his Highland campaign (1644-5) he was most successful, defeating the Covenanters at Tippermuir, Aberdeen, Inverlochy, Auldearn, Alford, and Kilsyth, though he was himself beaten at Philiphaugh (September 1645). In 1650 he undertook a fresh invasion of Scotland on behalf of Charles II, but was defeated at Invercarroll, taken prisoner, and hanged at Edinburgh.

Graham, SIR JAMES ROBERT GEORGE (1792-1861), son of Sir James Graham, of Netherby, entered parliament in 1818 for Hull. In 1824 he succeeded to the baronetcy, and being returned in 1826 for Carlisle, soon became a prominent Whig. On the formation of Earl Grey's ministry, he was made first lord of the admiralty. In 1834 he retired from Lord Grey's cabinet owing to dissensions within it on the Irish Church question, and with a small party of friends formed an intermediate party known by the sportive title of the "Derby Dilly" (q.v.). In 1841 he accepted office under Sir Robert Peel as home secretary. He was exposed to an attack of extraordinary bitterness in consequence of his ordering the correspondence of Mazzini to be opened at the post office (1844). The way in which he dealt with the question of the Scottish Church, especially at the crisis of the Disruption, produced a most exasperated feeling against him in Scotland. He supported Peel during the crisis produced by the repeal of the Corn Laws; and in 1852 he was appointed by Lord Aberdeen first lord of the admiralty, and now incurred more unpopularity than in any former tenure of office. He underrated both the charges and responsibilities of the war. Sir Charles Napier's failure in the Baltic and quarrel with the admiralty damaged Graham's reputation, and he retired from politics.

Biography by T. MacCullagh, 1863.

Graham, JOHN, OF CLAVERHOUSE, VISCOUNT DUNDEE (1649?-89), was the captain in a troop of horse employed in coercing the Covenanters and Cameronians in the latter part of Charles II's reign and that of James II. His cruelty made him specially hateful to the rebels. He was defeated by the Cameronians at Drumclog (June 1679), but subsequently had a large share in Monmouth's victory over them at Bothwell Bridge a few days later (June 22). In 1688 he was made a peer. He was at the head of the opposition to William III's accession in Scotland, and after vainly trying to interrupt the work of the Convention of Estates, he retired to the Highlands and raised a body of troops there for King James. On July 27, 1689, he defeated Mackay at the pass of Killiecrankie, but was himself killed in the battle.

Graham, SIR ROBERT (d. 1437), was the uncle of Malise Graham, Earl of Strathern, and the chief conspirator against James I of Scotland. On February 20, 1437, he led a band of 300 men to the abbey of Black Friars, at Perth, where the king was residing, and slew him with his own hand. The indignation aroused by this crime was so great that all the conspirators were speedily brought to justice, Sir Robert Graham being tortured to death at Stirling.

Graham, THOMAS, BARON LYNEDOC (1748-1843), a gentleman of fortune in Perthshire, served as a volunteer under Lord Mulgrave at the siege of Toulon, in 1794, and showed such military genius and courage that he was publicly thanked by the commander. Returning to England he raised the 90th Foot in Perthshire, and was appointed colonel of it. For the next few years he served with the Austrian army, and then returned to his regiment at Gibraltar. In 1808 he accompanied Sir John Moore to Sweden as his aide-de-camp, and afterwards followed him to Spain. On the return to England after Corunna he was appointed to command a division at the siege of Flushing; but he was soon afterwards ordered to the Peninsula, where he was nominated second in command. During the winter of 1810 he held Cadiz; but in the spring of the following year, by a series of masterly tactics, he brought on a battle with Victor, whom he defeated at Barrosa (March). He then joined Wellington, and was present with him at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, after which he went to England to recruit his health. He returned to Spain in time to take part in the campaign of 1813. He commanded the left wing of the army at Vitoria, and to him was confided the whole charge of the siege of San Sebastian, which, after two partial failures, his firm resolution and skilful management at length reduced. After crossing the Bidassoa he was compelled again to seek rest; but in the following year was appointed to command the expedition to the Low Countries (1814). The expedition was a failure; not, however, in any way through the fault of the commander-in-chief. In May 1814 he was raised to the peerage.

Gramont, PHILBERT, COMTE DE (1621-1707), a French noble, was for a long time one of the most brilliant and characteristic members of the court of Charles II. His memoirs, written up by his brother-in-law, Anthony Hamilton, give a lively picture of the licence allowed by that monarch amongst his courtiers. [HAMILTON, ANTHONY.]

Grampound, in Cornwall, is one of the most famous historical examples of a rotten borough. It returned two members to parliament from 1553 onwards, though it contained hardly fifty freemen. Its disfranchisement occurred in 1821, as the result of an inquiry into the wholesale corruption which had characterized the elections of 1812 and 1818. In 1812 each supporter of one of the candidates had received £100.

Granby, JOHN MANNERS, MARQUIS OF (1721-70). [MANNERS.]

Grand Alliance, THE, was the name given to the alliance between Great Britain, Holland, and the Empire concluded at The Hague, September 7, 1701. The treaty declared the desirability of compensating the emperor for the loss of Spain, and of providing for the security of England and Holland. The allies also demanded of Louis XIV a pledge that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united. As, however, William III could not at the moment be sure of energetic support in England, he pledged himself, in case the overtures of the allies were rejected by France, to attempt only to conquer Milan for Austria, and the barrier fortress for Holland. The alliance was afterwards joined by Prussia, January 20, 1702; by Portugal, May 16, 1703; and by Savoy, October 25, 1703. Its object became the conquest of all the Spanish Empire, and especially of Spain itself. [PARTITION TREATIES; SPANISH SUCCESSION, WAR OF.]

Grant, CHARLES, LORD GLENELG (1778-1866), was the eldest son of Charles Grant, for many years M.P. for Inverness-shire. He was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, and entered parliament as member for Fortrose, 1811. He represented Fortrose from 1807 to 1818, and Inverness-shire from that date till 1835. From 1819 to 1823 he was chief secretary for Ireland; from 1823 to 1827 vice-president, and from 1827 to 1828 president, of the board of trade. From 1830 to 1834 he was president of the board of control, and from 1834 to 1839 secretary to the colonies. But the Canadian rebellion of 1838 was fatal to his reputation. He approved of Lord Durham's famous ordinance, the gist of which was that those of the rebels who had acknowledged their guilt and submitted to the queen's pleasure were to be sent off to Bermuda, but under constraint, and punished with death if they returned. The ordinance was disallowed; Lord Durham was recalled, and Lord Glenelg retired from public life.

Grattan, HENRY (1746-1820), was born in Dublin, and educated at Trinity College. In 1772 he was called to the Irish bar; but practice did not flow in, and in 1775 he was raised to a more congenial sphere by his return to parliament for Charlemont. He at once joined the opposition, and acquired almost unprecedented popularity by drawing up the Irish Declaration of Rights. He was the leading orator of the party whose success secured the repeal of Poynings' Act and the legislative independence of Ireland. In 1785 it was proposed that "the Irish legislature should from time to time adopt all such Acts of the British parliament as related to commerce." The popularity of Flood had for a time almost eclipsed Grattan's, but his successful opposition to this measure quite restored him to extreme popularity. In 1790 he was elected to represent the city of Dublin. During the unhappy period between 1790 and 1800

Grattan urged the government to adopt a conciliatory policy, and he was strongly in favour of granting the claims of the Catholics. On the question of the Union he held consistently to his old wish to see Ireland independent, and consequently did his utmost to prevent the passing of the Act of Union. In 1805 he was returned to the British parliament as M.P. for Malton, and he afterwards represented his old constituents of Dublin. His oratory was as brilliant as ever, but his views had become more moderate; and he did not escape the suspicion of having abandoned his old patriotism under the influence of flattery from high quarters. The suspicion was groundless. His old ideal of an independent Ireland had been swept away by the Union, in spite of his strenuous resistance; but the policy which held the next place in his heart—Catholic emancipation—seems to have become a more and more engrossing passion. On June 4, 1820, he died in London.

Gray, PATRICK (d. 1612) (the Master of Gray), was educated in France, whence he returned to Scotland (1581), and speedily became a favourite of James VI. He was sent on a mission to Elizabeth, to whom he is said to have revealed many of the secrets of Mary, Queen of Scots; and while at the English court concerted measures for the ruin of Arran, which he accomplished on his return to Scotland (1585). In the following year he was sent, in company with Sir Robert Melville, to intercede for Queen Mary, whose cause, however, he is not likely to have aided by the private intimation which he is said to have given to Elizabeth that James was, in reality, in no way averse to his mother's execution.

Gray, or GREY, JOHN DE (d. 1214), was one of King John's ministers. In 1200 the king gave him the bishopric of Norwich, and in 1205 John caused him to be elected Archbishop of Canterbury. But the pope refused to confirm the election, and appointed Stephen Langton in his stead. He, with Peter des Roches, was the only bishop to abstain from flight during the period of the Interdict, and he is charged by Matthew Paris with being one of the king's evil counsellors throughout that time. In 1210 he was appointed justiciar of Ireland, an office which he held till 1213. In that year he went to Rome to obtain absolution from the pope, and while returning to England next year died at Poitiers.

Gray, or GREY, WAITER DE (d. 1255), was the nephew of John de Gray. He was chancellor from 1205 until 1213, when, while on a mission to Flanders, he was superseded by Peter des Roches, but reinstated in 1214 until his election to the see of Worcester in the same year. During John's struggle with the barons, he supported the king, who rewarded him with the archbishopric of York (1215). He devoted himself to the cause of Henry III, with whom he subsequently stood in high favour. After being employed by the king in various capacities, particularly of a diplomatic nature, we only meet with him when he was appointed regent in 1242 during Henry III's absence in France.

Great Britain is a name originally applied to the whole island of Britain, to distinguish it from Britannia Minor, or Brittany, and often used in poetry or exalted prose, but never for official purposes until after the accession of James I; though the Lords of the Congregation, in 1559, had suggested the union of the two kingdoms under this name. James's assumption of the title of King of Great Britain meant that he claimed, as the old-English monarchs had done, to be lord of the whole island, and not merely king of both halves separately. Much opposition was raised against this title in parliament, and the judges declared it illegal. But in 1604 James definitely styled himself King of Great Britain on his coins. [UNITED KINGDOM.]

Great War, THE (1914-18). [The origin of the war and the assessment of "War Guilt" are problems too complex for discussion here. See G. P. Gooch, "Recent Revelations of European Diplomacy," 1927.] The immediate cause, the assassination of the Austrian Archduke Franz Ferdinand at Sarajevo on June 28, 1914, was the work of the widespread Jugoslav revolutionary movement which had long been growing up within the Habsburg Empire. The Serbian government was not to blame: but the impossibility of preserving friendly relations between Serbia and Austria-Hungary led the latter to charge Serbia with responsibility for the crime and adopt an alternative policy of destroying her Serbian menace. Serbia's inability to accept two of the ten demands contained in the Austrian ultimatum of July 23 led to war on the 28th. The rest of the powers were soon involved, in virtue of their individual obligations under the Triple Alliance

(q.v.) and the Triple Entente (q.v.). Sir Edward Grey's proposal for mediation went astray in Berlin; Russia began mobilization in the interests of Serbia, July 31; Germany replied with an ultimatum to Russia, and ignored Grey's question, addressed to both Berlin and Paris, regarding Belgian neutrality; Germany declared war on Russia on August 1 and demanded to know the attitude of France, who mobilized in reply and was offered naval support by Great Britain; on August 3 Great Britain mobilized, and Germany declared war on France and crossed the Belgian frontier. The British ultimatum of August 4 to Germany, expiring at midnight unanswered, ushered in four years of war destined to be waged on many fronts—Flanders and France, Italy, Russia, South Europe and the Balkans, Egypt, Syria, and Palestine, all the German colonies—and on the sea and in the air.

The German plan for a rapid invasion of France, culminating in an attack on Paris within six weeks, before Russia could come into action, was put into operation in several regions, but chiefly in Belgium, where the advancing armies took Liège, Brussels, and Namur by August 23, while a French offensive in Lorraine was crushed at Lunéville by the Crown Prince of Bavaria. By August 17 Sir John French had landed in Flanders with 110,000 British troops, but the German onset forced a retreat from Mons on August 23, accompanied by the breaking of the French line at Charleroi and the fall of Châlons and Rheims. The allied armies fell back to the Marne by September 3, where von Kluck's abrupt turn southwards brought on the battle of the Marne (q.v.—September 6–9), resulting in his failure to break the line. The German advance received a fateful check. By September 18 the line was stabilized on the Aisne, and held in the north from Arras to Lens. With the repulse of a German attack on Verdun (October 3) and the extension of the British line to the coast at Nieuport on the advice of Generals French and Joffre (October 3), a western front was established from the coast to the Alps. Its southern part—from Rheims to Verdun and St. Mihiel—remained almost unaltered throughout the war. But by October the Germans held Arras, Lille, Douai, and Antwerp, and were perpetrating atrocities in Malines and Louvain in reply to sundry Belgian sorties. France and Flanders gradually settled down to what was for four years "a single battle, varying in its intensity from season to season and place to place, but constant in its continuity and in its absorption of the principal forces of the belligerents." The casualties were already enormous.

The eastern front underwent many changes before its ultimate collapse. Russia mobilized with surprising rapidity, and invaded East Prussia under the Grand Duke Nicholas while Austria attacked her at Lemberg. But Hindenburg rushed German troops across, and two-thirds of the Russian army were lost at the disastrous battle of Tannenberg (August 26–9). The fall of Lemberg and Przemyśl to Russia, however, enabled the Russians to take Cracow (the key to Berlin and Vienna) on December 8. Austria was meanwhile driven out of Serbia by August 24, and her renewed invasion after the entry of Turkey into the war on November 1 failed to take Belgrade. Hindenburg concentrated next on Warsaw, launching three attacks by January 1915. By February he had rolled back the whole 900 miles of the Russian front, in an endeavour to drive Russia out of the war and so be free to concentrate on the western front; while the Turks advanced to Ardahan and the Russians regained Przemyśl and secured Erzerum. To relieve the pressure on Russia the allies landed forces in the Persian Gulf (November 22) and at the Dardanelles (April 25, 1915). But in the summer of 1915 Russia became the main object of the German offensive, weakened as she was by the lack of munitions and by the vulnerability of her Polish defences. Mackensen advanced from Gorlice in April, Bülow got half way to Riga in May, the Austrians took Lemberg on June 22, and Warsaw fell to Leopold of Austria on August 5, followed by Kovno and Brest-Litovsk (August 17) and Vilna. Russia had collapsed as the result of inefficiency in her Tsarist bureaucracy; and only with terrible difficulty was her line repaired by Ruzsky. The Russian prisoners went to make munitions for Germany. Early in 1916, however, recoveries were made. Brussilov won Trebizond (April 29) and bombarded the whole front from the Pripiet marshes to the Rumanian border, advancing fifty miles in a fortnight and entering Czernowitz (June 17) and Brody (July 28). Ludendorff organized a successful defence of Kovel during the July rains, but 16 German divisions had to be withdrawn from the western front and sent east; while Rumania, encouraged by the German hold-up at Verdun and the losses of Turkey in Asia Minor, joined the allies on August 27 at the dictates of her desire to obtain parts of the Habsburg Empire. The Rumanian campaign was at first successful; but 8 German divisions under Falkenhayn contrived to capture Bucharest by December 5. Three months later came the first Russian Revolution, heralded by the execution of Rasputin on December 29. It began on March 8, 1917, and produced within a week the abdication of the Tsar (March 15) and the formation of a Soviet led by Lvov, Miliukov, Guchkov, and Kerensky. The hopes of the allies were raised at this prospect of increased efficiency in the Russian administration; but power gradually passed to the Bolshevik extremists of the Social Democratic party. The appointment of Kerensky as war minister (May) led to a disastrous attack on Lemberg which wilted under the severe summer rain and a German counter-attack (June–July), involving the loss of Czernowitz and the revolt of Lenin at Petrograd. Kerensky proclaimed a dictatorship on October 15, but the revolt of Trotsky (Leo Braunstein) on November 5-7 forced him to flee. The government fell to a self-constituted body of People's Commissars under Lenin and Trotsky, who at once opened negotiations with Germany (November 22). Russia retired completely from the war by the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, March 2, 1918.

The Balkan campaigns were not everywhere conspicuous for decisive results. The Dardanelles expedition (q.v.), planned as early as January 1915, suffered from lack of reinforcements. An Anglo-French attack on the Narrows on March 18 was succeeded by the landing of Sir Ian Hamilton's 120,000 men on April 25. With the withdrawal of the Queen Elizabeth in June the attack became a military siege. A landing was made at Suvla Bay on August 6, marked by feint attacks at Anzac Cove, but only six miles of front were established. Ultimately the reports of Sir Charles Monro (October) and Lord Kitchener (November) resulted in the evacuation of the troops with great skill from Anzac (December 18-19) and Cape Helles (January 7-8, 1916). Championed by Kitchener and Winston Churchill from the outset, in opposition to Lord Fisher, the expedition had not been useless. Neglect of the east in the autumn of 1915 would have left Greece and Egypt at the mercy of Germany and her allies. In October 1915 Bulgaria entered the war, and Serbia, who had refrained (at the advice of the allies) from anticipating the move by an attack on Sofia, was rapidly overrun. Mackensen, joined by the Bulgars, won Belgrade by October 15. The defence of Serbia fell to the allies, Greece declining to accept her treaty-obligation to help Serbia (Venizelos resigned in protest on October 5). In these circumstances a Franco-British expedition was landed at Salonika under Generals Sarraill and Bryan. But its arrival (October 5-7) came too late: the Serbians were being forced into Albania by the German-Bulgar advance; Prilep and Novibazar fell, the Salonika railway was cut, and Monastir fell on December 5. At the same time Montenegro collapsed on the capture of Cettinge by Austrian troops (January 13, 1916). By January 1916 all the Balkans were in enemy hands, save Salonika and Avlona. Before the end of that year the entry of Rumania (August) was neutralized by the fall of Bucharest on December 5; while the outbreak of civil war in Greece on the establishment of a provisional government by Venizelos in September resulted in the repulse of the allies from the Piræus by the troops of King Constantine (December 1). The Bulgarian advance into Greece, however, was checked on the Bistritza by Sarraill and the Serbians (October). In the summer of 1917 the Russian reverses facilitated another onslaught on Rumania by Mackensen, which was with difficulty held up on August 19 at the battle of Marasesti. But the Turks had meanwhile been suffering at the hands of the British. Cyprus had been annexed on November 5, 1914, and a landing effected in the Persian Gulf to strike northwards. Basrah and Amara fell, and by June 1915 Sir John Nixon had opened the way to Baghdad. Trouble arose simultaneously in Egypt, where the Arabs proclaimed their independence and a British campaign reduced Sollum and El Arish by May. The Mesopotamian advance was continued to Kut (q.v.) by September 29. A pro-German revolution in Persia meanwhile led to a Russian occupation of Teheran (November 1916). But the Russians were unable to relieve Kut, which surrendered to the Turks after a five months' siege (April 29, 1916). Sir S. Maude resumed the Syrian offensive on December 12 from Sanna-i-Yat on the Tigris, regained Kut, and entered Baghdad on March 11, 1917; while the fall of Senussi to British troops secured the safety of Egypt as a base against the Turks. Maude now linked up with the Russians, won Samara, and forced the Turks back to Gaza. Here the resistance was strong, but Beersheba and Gaza had fallen by November 7, and Allenby entered Jaffa (November 14) and Jerusalem (December 9). Jericho fell in February 1918.

Meanwhile Germany had lost all her colonies. Japan had entered the war on August 23, 1914, and reduced Tsing-Tao by November; Australia had taken German New Guinea and the Gilbert and Caroline Islands; New Zealand had taken Samoa and the Marshall Islands. In Africa the struggle lasted longer. Togoland and the Cameroons fell to allied troops by September 1914, but General Smuts's campaign in South-West Africa (October) had to be renewed by Botha in February 1915 and was not completed until July; while East Africa was regained by the Germans in 1915 and not reduced until Smuts's offensive of March 1916.

In southern Europe, Italy entered the war against Austria in May 22, 1915, according to a treaty signed in London on April 26 guaranteeing to her at the close of the war parts of "Italia Iridenta" and Dalmatia. (She did not declare war on Germany, however, till August 27, 1916.) Her first offensive, towards Trieste, won Caporetto by June 20, but then degenerated into indecisive fighting until Austria attacked along the Isonzo in 1916. Cadorna checked the advance in June, and countered by an Italian advance along the Isonzo and Carso during the Russian offensive in the summer, with great success. In 1917, however, Italy suffered grievously. Ludendorff's plans for a German offensive on the western front in 1918 (below) included a diversion in the Alps directed by Bülow. The Italian flank, exposed at Caporetto, was turned in October after an abortive movement by Cadorna towards Trieste in August; and, using gas-shells in place of a preliminary bombardment, Bülow effected a speedy advance with 13 divisions. The Italians were driven back with terrible losses to the Piave—within their own frontier—where they rallied.

Fighting on the sea was spasmodic. The weakness of naval attacks on strongly-defended coasts was forcibly demonstrated at the Dardanelles; and Great Britain retained the command of the sea throughout. The return of the German fleet to Kiel on August 26, 1914, left several vessels abroad, of which the Goeben and Breslau fled to Turkey and the rest were either interned or sunk; notably the Emden, sunk off the Cocos Islands on November 9, 1914. Mine-sowing and submarine warfare began early, but apart from naval battles off Heligoland Bight (q.v.—August 28), Coronel (q.v.—November 1), the Falkland Islands (q.v.—December 8), the Dogger Bank (q.v.—January 24, 1915), and Jutland (q.v.—May 31, 1916) the sea witnessed only skirmishes and raids, among which the sinking of the Lusitania by a German submarine on May 7, 1915, and of the Hampshire (with Lord Kitchener on board) by a mine on June 5, 1916, will never be forgotten. Unrestricted submarine warfare was declared by Germany early in 1917, with considerable effect. One-quarter of the ships which left British ports in April 1917 did not return. This U-boat campaign was the final straw which brought the United States into the war.

Parallel with it went a policy of air-raids on England (q.v.), lasting from January 19, 1915, to May 19, 1918, with the first aeroplane raid on November 28, 1916. The menace from the air brought the war home to civilians in Great Britain. Conscription was introduced at Christmas 1915 for all single men under the age of 42, following the recruiting scheme of Lord Derby, and was extended to married men in May 1916 and to an age-limit of 51 during the German offensive in April 1918. Defence of the Realm Acts were passed, the Press was muzzled, and England became a "vast laboratory of death," rationed in food during the later stages of the war, and inflamed by such acts as the shooting of Edith Cavell (October 12, 1915) and Captain Fryatt (July 27, 1916). Discontent due to lack of munitions led to the appointment of Lloyd George as minister of munitions in May 1915, while Fisher left the admiralty because of a quarrel over the Dardanelles, and a coalition government was formed under Asquith. The collapse of the Balkans and the indecisiveness of the Somme campaign of 1916 (below) wearied public opinion. Lloyd George became premier in December 1916 and Nivelle succeeded Joffre in France. The Kaiser's peace-offer of December 12 was rejected on December 30. Similar proposals put forward by the pope in August 1917 were also declined.

But the war was won on the western front, in campaigns of unprecedented length and intensity, involving casualties of fabulous numbers. The extension of the line to the Flanders coast was effected by a double movement northwards from La Bassée, the Germans aiming to reduce the Channel ports, the French to isolate Antwerp, relieve Brussels, and threaten the German rear on the Aisne. In October the Germans entered Bruges and Ostend. The first battle of Ypres (q.v.) which followed was hardly a contest of strategy, for the chance to outflank had passed and left a deadlock. The battle gave the allies Arras and the Germans Neuve Chapelle (October 20 and 27); necessitated the flooding of the Nieuport-Dixmude area by the Belgians; and degenerated thereafter into winter torpor, during which the Germans utilized French and Belgian mines and the allies recruited troops at a feverish pace. In March 1915 the allies opened an offensive round Lille and Neuve Chapelle (q.v.) which succeeded in part, simultaneously with a French advance near Verdun, but was followed by the first gas attack of the war at the second battle of Ypres (q.v.) on April 22. By May 24 the line had to be shortened at a point only three miles from Ypres. The allied offensive failed with an unsuccessful attempt (May 9) to capture Lille and Loos via Vimy Ridge. Two months later the Germans introduced liquid fire, at Hooge (July 30). In the autumn the allies resumed the offensive from La Bassée to Arras and in Champagne (September 23) in an endeavour to cut the enemy's Aisne communications, but by October 30 all their gains had been lost. The British attack at Loos (q.v.—September 25) just failed to take Lens. From 1916 onwards, however, Germany's efforts were directed more to prolonging her defence and securing a profitable negotiated peace than to achieving a military victory. The plan for 1916 centred on the reduction of Verdun in February, the crushing of Italy in May, and the defeat of Russia in the summer. The Verdun attack opened on February 21 on a limited front and secured the key to the last line of defence, but was then checked by Pétain, who held his ground on the Meuse. It was revived on May 3 with more success, penetrating to within four miles of the town; but was again held up in August. To relieve the pressure on the French, the British Fourth Army (and the French Sixth Army) opened the Somme campaign (q.v.) on July 1. The first phase secured meagre results; the second captured the bulk of Delville Wood; the third stage in September culminated in a general attack at Thiepval, but the advent of the rainy season left the Germans secure in the Bapaume salient after an allied attack (November 15) on Beaumont Hamel. The total casualties on the Somme were about a million. Early in 1917 Haig began an advance on the Ancre round Arras (q.v.) which forced the enemy to retreat along the full 100 miles of the Somme salient to the Hindenburg (Siegfried) Line. This line ran from Arras to a point seven miles west of Cambrai and thence to near St. Quentin, where the French continued it to Moy (on the Sambre canal) and the Aisne. Its flanks lay at Vimy Ridge in the north and the Chemin des Dames in the south. Haig took Vimy Ridge on April 9 and threatened Lens. In June, when the first American divisions landed in France (the United States declared war on April 5), Nivelle's offensive on the Aisne, which had opened in April in an endeavour to outflank the enemy and win Rheims, concluded in failure, though Haig balanced it by capturing Bullecourt on May 17. The attack then shifted northwards to Messines and Wytschaete, to turn the north flank and win the coastal submarine bases. The ridges fell in June and the front was active all through the summer. On November 6 it ended after the fall of Passchendaele to the allies (October 4), with a net gain of five miles in three months. Pétain meanwhile restored the Meuse line round Verdun to its position prior to the German 1916 advance, where it remained unaltered. But not so the northern parts of the front.

Ludendorff was preparing a gigantic offensive for the spring of 1918, to anticipate the arrival of American troops. In the winter Haig employed tanks in an attack on the high ground round Cambrai, finding them useless in the mud of the plains. These tactics, however, of a surprise attack without preliminary bombardment, were returned by the Germans in November with equally devastating effect. Ludendorff opened his final offensive on March 21, 1918, against 14 divisions under General Gough, from Arras to Rheims. Favoured by dry weather and fog, the attack crossed the Somme, won Péronne and Combles, and within five days had cleft gaps between the British and French and between Byng and Gough. In the north the advance ended at Beaumont Hamel, but Gough had to retire in the Arras sector. On March 25 the allies secured unity of command under Foch. The second German attack (April 9) in the north, though on a smaller scale, won Neuve Chapelle, Armentières, and the Ridges; but in an effort to extricate himself from the salient so formed Ludendorff wasted energy in consecutive attacks at Ypres, Béthune, and the Kemmel Ridge. His onslaught nevertheless had the effect of drawing forth 300,000 fresh troops from England. The final phase, in June, took place round Montdidier and Noyon, and was aimed at Paris. It penetrated as far as the Aisne position of 1914, advancing thirty miles in three days; but was checked in the north by July 13, and at Rheims by the 17th. On July 18 the tide turned, and the allies began an advance to victory made possible by the arrival of American battalions, the new unity of command, the effects of revolutionary propaganda in Germany, and the fact that the German armies were massed at Amiens and not on the Marne. Foch advanced along the whole front, which on July 18 ran roughly from Nieuport, through Ypres, Merville, La Bassée, Lens, Arras, Albert, Moreuil, Montdidier, Fontenoy, Château-Thierry, Rheims, Varennes, Verdun, and St. Mihiel, to the Swiss frontier. There were really six offensives between July and November, radiating from Dixmude, Loos, Montdidier, Château-Thierry, Varennes, and St. Mihiel. The contest opened at Château-Thierry on July 18; on August 2 the Marne was crossed; on the 24th Bapaume fell, followed by Péronne (September 1) and Lens (September 3). The Verdun salient was flattened out by the Americans (September 12). Austria and Germany began overtures for peace on September 15, influenced by the collapse of Bulgaria (who concluded an armistice on September 30) and Turkey (Allenby won Aleppo on October 26, and an armistice followed four days later). On October 1 the British captured St. Quentin, while a Franco-American advance on the Meuse pushed the Germans back to the Serre. Cambrai fell on October 9, Ostend and Lille and Douai on the 17th, Bruges and Zeebrugge on the 19th. On the 26th Ludendorff resigned, and next day the Italian crossing of the Piave induced Austria to sue for an armistice (concluded November 3). On November 1 the German line was broken by the Americans: Mons fell to the Canadians on the 11th. With the signing of the armistice at 6 a.m. on that day the war ended—where it had begun.

The terms of the armistice were severe. Germany was to withdraw her armies across the Rhine, leaving the bridgeheads to the allies and a neutral zone on the right bank; surrender all prisoners; annul the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk; evacuate Russian, Rumanian, and Turkish territory; and surrender guns and submarines, and her navy. The Kaiser abdicated on November 9.

Greece, RELATIONS WITH, date from 1823, two years after the outbreak of the war of Greek Independence, when Canning recognized the Greeks as belligerents. England became strongly Philhellene, and volunteers went out to join the Greek cause; notably Byron, who perished at Missolonghi in April 1824, and Lord Cochrane and Sir Richard Church, who became commanders respectively of the Greek sea and land forces in 1827. The sympathetic policy of Canning embodied in the Treaty of London (q.v.—July 6, 1827) was, however, modified by the Wellington government of 1828-30 in favour of merely an autonomous Morean Greece. Wellington deplored Navarino (q.v.) as an "untoward event," and succeeded in restricting the frontier of Greece fixed by the protocol of February 3, 1830, though the collapse of Turkey and the Treaty of Adrianople induced him to concede full independence. In the years 1847-50 the affairs of Don Pacifico (q.v.) and Finlay (q.v.) made for strained relations, but in 1862 Prince Alfred, son of Queen Victoria, was chosen king on the expulsion of Otto I, though the self-denying ordinance imposed on Great Britain as a protecting power invalidated the choice and secured instead the accession of Prince William George of Denmark as George I (1863). Great Britain at the same time (June 5, 1863) ceded to Greece the Ionian Islands (q.v.). When the Cretan problem became acute in 1885-6, and again in 1894-7, the powers intervened to prevent fighting and to induce the Greeks to disarm, and finally forced an armistice to conclude the "Thirty Days' War" of 1897 between Turkey and Greece. Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy each occupied a coast town, and Prince George was appointed commissioner in Crete for eight years. In 1905 he resigned and was succeeded by Venizelos, whereupon the annexation of Crete to Greece was again demanded. But no solution was attained until 1909, when the powers evacuated Crete on the restoration of order by Zaimis. Fresh disturbances occurred until the elevation of Venizelos to the Greek premiership in 1910. During the Balkan Wars a conference was held in London on December 13, 1912, presided over by Sir Edward Grey, and the first war was concluded by a treaty signed in London on May 30, 1913. During the Great War of 1914-18 (q.v.) British and French troops under Generals Bryan and Sarraile were sent to Salonika in October 1915 following the entry of Bulgaria into the war. They were repulsed from the Piræus on December 1, 1916, by the troops of King Constantine, after the outbreak of civil war in Greece and the formation of a provisional government by Venizelos. When King Constantine returned to Athens in 1920 the allies curtailed financial assistance to Greece and decided to reconsider the unratified Treaty of Sèvres (August 10, 1920), which had accorded Greece Thrace and a mandate in Asia Minor. In the ensuing Greco-Turkish war the interests of Greece were placed in the hands of Lord Curzon by the prime minister, Gounaris. Peace was ultimately secured at Lausanne (q.v.) on July 24, 1923.

Green, SIR THOMAS (d. 1399), one of the knights of Richard II's household, was used by the king as a tool in the many arbitrary acts of the latter years of his reign, and particularly in the extortion of money by illegal means. On the landing of Henry of Lancaster he fled to Bristol, but was surrendered by the governor of the castle to Henry, and summarily executed.

Green Cloth, THE BOARD OF. A board attached to the royal household, presided over by the lord steward. It had power to punish offenders within the precincts of the palace, and issued the warrants which were necessary before a servant of the household could be arrested for debt.

Green Ribbon Club, THE, was an organization founded by the Whigs in 1675 at the King's Head Tavern, Chancery Lane. It sent out agents to mould opinion in the country, and recruited men of all classes and professions under the presidency of Lord Shaftesbury. The Insurrection and Assassination Plots of 1682, directed against Charles II and James, Duke of York, were the work of the Green Ribbon and its partisans. With Shaftesbury's decline, however, the organization disintegrated, and was extinct by 1688.

Greenwich was the seat of a royal palace much occupied by the Tudor princes, and pulled down after the Restoration. The site was assigned by William III for the erection of his great hospital for retired seamen (1705). Since 1873 the building has been devoted to the Royal Naval College.

Greenwood, JOHN (d. 1593), a prominent Barrowist, was tried on a charge of promulgating seditious and schismatical opinions, and executed in 1593.

Gregg, WILLIAM (d. 1708), was clerk in the office of Harley, Queen Anne's secretary of state. He was first employed by that minister as a spy. In the course of the years 1707 and 1708 he was engaged in a treasonable correspondence with M. de Chamillart, the French secretary of state. He slipped his letters into those of Marshal Tallard, whose correspondence passed through Harley's office. One of these packets was opened on suspicion in Holland. Gregg was tried, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to death. The House of Lords, bitterly opposed to Harley, entered on a searching investigation of the case, with the object of establishing the minister's complicity. Gregg was told that if he would make a full confession he might hope for the intercession of the House. He refused, and was hanged.

Biography by P. Lorrains, 1708.

Grenada, one of the Windward Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1478 and called "Conception." It was included in the 1627 Carlisle grant, but was colonized in 1650 by the French governor of Martinique, who had bought it from the French West India Company, and who massacred the Caribs systematically; and, in 1674, on the collapse of the French West India Company, the island, which it had acquired in 1665, lapsed to the French crown. It was captured by the British in 1762, and was formally ceded to them by the Treaty of Paris (1763). In 1779 the island was retaken by the French, but was restored by the Treaty of Versailles (1783). In 1795 there was a negro insurrection, caused mainly by the intrigues of the French planters. Emancipation in 1837 led to the introduction of coolies in 1877. The government is vested in a governor (who also exercises jurisdiction over the rest of the Windward Islands) and a nominated legislative council of 7 official and 7 unofficial members. Each town has an elective board for local affairs. French law was abrogated by proclamation in 1764.

Grenville, SIR BEVIL (1596-1643), a grandson of Sir Richard Grenville, was a gallant officer who joined the Royalist army in 1642, defeated the Parliamentary forces at Stratton, and was slain at the battle of Lansdown (July 5, 1643). Clarendon declared that the Royalist successes in Cornwall were almost entirely due to his energy.

Biography by Sir Alfred Robbins, 1884.

Grenville, GEORGE (1712-70), was the second son of Richard Grenville, of Wotton, by Hester, Countess Temple. In 1741 he was elected M.P. for Buckingham, which town he continued to represent until his death. In 1744 he was appointed a junior lord of the admiralty, in Henry Pelham's administration. In 1747 he was promoted to the same office in the treasury: and on Newcastle becoming prime minister in 1754 he became treasurer of the navy. In 1762, when Lord Bute became first lord of the treasury, Grenville was made secretary of state in his place, and leader of the House of Commons. On Bute's resignation in the following April, Grenville became at once prime minister and chancellor of the exchequer, on the nomination of Bute, who expected to find him a very willing tool; but he soon discovered his mistake. Grenville, who feared the king as little as he did the people, complained bitterly of Bute's secret influence, and at once became odious to the king in consequence. The death of Lord Egremont, secretary of state, in August, gave George III an excuse for changing his ministry; and accordingly, through Bute's means, he opened negotiations with Pitt. These, however, failed; and he was again obliged to fall back upon Grenville, who strengthened his position by enlisting the Bedford faction on his side. But the new accession of strength did not save the ministry. The issue of general warrants, and the struggle with Wilkes, cost the ministry £100,000, and lost them any share of popularity they ever possessed. This measure was soon followed by the Stamp Act (q.v.). In July 1765 the king, seeing his way to form a new ministry, summarily dismissed Grenville and the Duke of Bedford. In 1769 Grenville became reconciled to his brother-in-law, Lord Chatham, and took an eager part in the debates on the expulsion of Wilkes. In 1770 he carried his bill on Controverted Elections, by which he transferred the trial of election petitions from the House at large to a select committee of the House. [ELECTIONS.] For some time past his health had been declining, and in the autumn of 1770—only a few months after passing his Election Bill—he died. "He took public business," Burke said of him in the House of Commons, "not as a duty he was to fulfil, but as a pleasure he was to enjoy; he seemed to have no delight out of the House, except in such things as some way related to the things that were to be done in it. If he was ambitious, I will say this for him, his ambition was of a noble and generous strain."

Grenville, SIR RICHARD (1541 ?-91), one of the renowned sailors of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was sent out to the West Indies in 1585 to inflict what damage he could on Spanish commerce. In 1587 he was a member of the council of war which was charged with the duty of making preparations to withstand the attack of the Armada; and he did good service for his country against the Spaniards. In 1591 he took part in an expedition under Lord Thomas Howard, which sailed for the Azores to intercept the Spanish treasure ships on their return from South America. The design of the English was discovered by Spain, and fifty-three ships of war were sent out as a convoy. A furious engagement took place, in which Sir Richard, after performing prodigies of valour, was killed on board his ship, the Revenge. His memory was subsequently defended from any blame for the failure of the expedition by his friend Sir Walter Raleigh. "From the greatness of his spirit," says Raleigh, "he utterly refused to turn from the enemy, protesting he would rather die than be guilty of such dishonour to himself, his country, and her Majesty's ship."

Grenville, RICHARD TEMPLE, EARL TEMPLE (1711-79), was the elder brother of George Grenville, and was elected, in 1734, by the help of family interest, to represent the borough of Buckingham, but subsequently for a time represented the county. In 1752 he succeeded to the earldom, and four years later Pitt, who had married his sister Hester, gave him a place in his administration as first lord of the admiralty. In the following April he was summarily dismissed by the king, and Pitt's dismissal followed within a few days. Pitt, however, was recalled, and Lord Temple became lord privy seal, which post he retained until Pitt's resignation in October 1761, when he too withdrew. In 1766 he broke with Pitt on the question of the Stamp Act, Temple upholding his brother's policy while Pitt was bent on obtaining its repeal. And he went farther, by refusing to accept office under Pitt in 1766, not wishing to be "stuck into a ministry as great cypher." A reconciliation, however, took place on Lord Chatham's retirement in 1768. In 1770 Lord North began his long reign. Thenceforth Lord Temple took but an intermittent interest in political affairs, now and then actively opposing the ministry. He has been suspected, not without some reason, of being the author of the "Letters of Junius."

Grenville, WILLIAM WYNDHAM, LORD (1759-1834), youngest son of George Grenville, was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In 1782 he was elected M.P. for Buckingham, and in the same year became secretary to his brother, Earl Temple, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In December 1784 he succeeded Burke as paymaster-general, and began to give his cousin Pitt valuable assistance at a time when he most needed it. In 1789 he was elected Speaker of the House of Commons on the death of Cornwall, but he held the chair for only four months, being then made home secretary, an office which afforded him more active employment. In 1790 he was raised to the Upper House, and in the following year went to preside over the foreign office, where he remained for ten years till Pitt's resignation. As foreign minister he thoroughly carried out Pitt's policy, and rejected all peace with the revolutionary government of France. He was the mover in the House of Lords of the Treasonable Practices Bill (q.v.) in 1795. He was even a stronger supporter of the Catholic claims than Pitt, and during Pitt's last ministry he remained in opposition on this ground. On Pitt's death he combined with Fox to form the administration of "All the Talents" (q.v.). That ministry, however, was but short-lived; and on being dismissed Grenville remained in opposition during the continuance of the war. The close of his life was spent in literary retirement, when he did valuable work, the result of which has been to throw much new light on the inner workings and party intrigues of the early years of the reign of George III. He lived on at Dropmore in Buckinghamshire till 1834, where he died on January 12. Twice had overtures been made to him to take office again—in 1809 and in 1812. But Catholic Emancipation had to be an essential element in any line of policy which Grenville would support. With the high sense of honour and integrity which always distinguished him and Lord Grey, they both excluded themselves from office for twenty years. As a foreign minister Grenville is considered by some to rank above Pitt. His oratorical powers were at times the wonder of the House of Lords; but, like Fox, he was too liberal-minded not to have the misfortune to be generally in opposition.

Gresham, SIR THOMAS (1519-79), a famous merchant, the son of Sir Richard Gresham, lord mayor of London, who died 1549, first attained fame as a financier by negotiating certain loans for Edward VI in 1551. He was subsequently employed on several occasions by Elizabeth, who found him exceedingly useful in obtaining money from foreign merchants and in raising loans from merchants in England. In 1566 he founded the Royal Exchange, which was opened by the queen in person, 1571. [It was totally destroyed in the Fire of London, refounded by Charles II in 1667, and again burnt in 1838. The present building was opened in 1844.]

Grey, ARTHUR, 14TH BARON GREY DE WILTON (1536-93), was the son of a celebrated commander of Henry VIII's time. He was lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1580. In that year he suffered a severe repulse in Glen Malure from the Wicklow sept. It was to him, however, that the suppression of Desmond's rebellion was largely due, and he was in command of the troops at Smerwick (q.v.). As a stern Puritan, he made himself unpopular by his severity, and was recalled in 1582. He was one of the commissioners who passed judgment on Mary, Queen of Scots, and was created a knight of the Garter.

[SEYMOUR, LADY CATHERINE.]

Grey, CHARLES, 2ND EARL GREY (1764-1845), son of Charles, 1st Earl Grey, was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge. He was returned to parliament for the county of Northumberland in 1786, and joined the Whig opposition under Charles James Fox. He displayed such ability in his first speech that he was from that time a prominent leader of the party, and as such was chosen one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1792 he became a member of the great society, "the Friends of the People," the avowed object of which was to obtain a reform in the system of parliamentary representation. In 1795 he opposed the liquidation of the Prince of Wales's debts. In the same year he unsuccessfully moved the impeachment of Pitt. In 1797 he brought forward a plan of reform, which was rejected by 169 votes. He remained one of Pitt's bitterest opponents till his death. On the accession of Fox to power, 1806, Grey, now Lord Howick, was appointed first lord of the admiralty. On the death of Fox he became leader of the House of Commons and foreign secretary. The Catholic Relief question, however, overthrew the ministry. In 1807 he succeeded his father as Earl Grey. In 1810, when the Duke of Portland resigned, negotiations were opened with Lords Grey and Grenville, who, however, refused to unite with the proposed ministry. In 1812 a similar attempt failed. In 1827 Grey declined to support Canning. The sudden termination of the Wellington ministry in 1830 brought him from his retirement as the only man capable of dealing with the difficult question of parliamentary reform. In accepting office he stipulated that the reform of parliament should be made a cabinet question. The support of the great majority of the nation greatly facilitated the task which he had undertaken, and enabled him to construct his ministry without much difficulty, the most serious impediment being created by the position of Brougham, which was got over by making him lord chancellor. A Reform Bill was introduced by Lord John Russell on April 12, 1831, but after a long discussion General Gascoyne successfully carried his motion against the government, and a dissolution became necessary, to which the king at last consented. The danger, however, became pressing, as Lord Wharncliffe had threatened to move an address in the Lords, praying the king not to dissolve. The House was dissolved the very day Lord Wharncliffe's threatened address was to have come on (April 22). The election of 1831 sent back a large reforming majority to parliament, and on June 24 Lord John Russell again introduced the bill, which passed the Commons on July 8 but was thrown out in the Lords. The struggle from this time lay in the Lords. On April 9, 1832, Earl Grey moved that the third Reform Bill be now read a second time. The second reading was carried by the aid of Lord Wharncliffe and the Trimmers. Lord Lyndhurst now moved in committee that the consideration of the disfranchising clauses should be postponed until the enfranchising clauses had been considered. This motion was carried against the government in spite of Grey's warning to the House that he should consider its success fatal to his measure, and he resigned, May 9. The state of the country became terrible. Sir Robert Peel declined office. The Duke of Wellington found it impossible to construct a government. It became necessary to recall Grey, and he obeyed the summons. But before he left the presence of the king he had obtained from him a written promise that he would "create such a number of peers as will be sufficient to pass the Reform Bill." The bill was eventually carried by the personal influence of the king, though violent altercations and recriminations occurred on the subject in the House of Lords. Wellington withdrew sufficient peers to enable it to pass. The reformed parliament gave the Whigs an overwhelming majority. The first business was to consider the state of Ireland, and it was found necessary to pass a Coercion Bill (1833). In 1834 the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Ripon, Mr. Stanley, and Sir James Graham resigned. ["DERBY DILLY."] This shook the ministry, and in order to avoid any further secessions an Irish Church Commission was hastily appointed to procure evidence. Littleton's Irish Tithe Bill gave another shock to the ministry, and the motion of O'Connell and Littleton on the Coercion Bill, which produced the resignation of the premier and Lord Althorp, ended Lord Grey's political career.

He resigned to save the rest of his ministry. From this time he took little part in public affairs.

Grey, EDMUND, EARL OF KENT (d. 1489), known in the early part of his life as Baron Grey of Ruthin, was originally on the Lancastrian side, but during the battle of Northampton (1460) he deserted to the Yorkists, to whose victory he contributed greatly by this piece of treachery. On Edward IV's accession, he was received into the royal favour, and created lord high treasurer (1463) and Earl of Kent (1465). He managed to preserve his titles and estates till his death, notwithstanding the different changes of government.

Grey, EDWARD, VISCOUNT GREY OF FALLODON (b. 1862), entered parliament in 1885 as member for North Berwick, and was under foreign secretary from 1892 until 1895. In 1905 he joined the Liberal ministry as foreign secretary, continuing in that post at the general election of 1906, contributing to the satisfactory issue of the Algeiras Conference (1906) and reaching an understanding with Russia (1907) [ENTENTE]. In the Agadir crisis of 1911 (q.v.) he adopted a firm tone which induced the German Emperor to moderate his demands, and next year he authorized the famous Haldane mission to Berlin. In July 1914 he worked strenuously to avert a European war, but he refused to bargain with Germany for British neutrality at the expense of France or Belgium, and when Germany declared war on France (August 3) he determined on a policy of action. With the support of cabinet and parliament he met the German violation of Belgium by a declaration of war (August 4). He continued to hold the foreign office until forced to resign in December 1916, through failing eyesight, after a tenure of eleven years. For the next few years he entered little into public affairs, devoting most of his energy to the cause of the League of Nations. His "Twenty-Five Years, 1892-1916," appeared in 1925.

Grey, FORDE, EARL OF TANKERVILLE (d. 1701), better known as Lord Grey of Werk, took a prominent part in the debates of 1681 as a most zealous Exclusionist; and for his supposed share in the design for insurrection was committed to the Tower, but escaped by making his keepers drunk. He fled to the continent (1682). There he employed his influence on his friend the Duke of Monmouth to urge him to invade England. He landed at Lyme Regis with Monmouth, and was appointed commander of the cavalry. He was driven from Bridport by the militia. He dissuaded Monmouth from abandoning the enterprise at Frome. At the battle of Sedgemoor his cavalry was easily routed by the royal troops, chiefly, it is said, because of his pusillanimity. He fled with Monmouth, and was taken in the New Forest. In his interview with the king he displayed great firmness, and would not stoop to ask for pardon. He was suffered to ransom himself for £40,000 and went abroad. He returned to England with William of Orange, and attempted to redeem his character by taking an active share in politics. In 1695 he was created Earl of Tankerville. He supported the Association Bill in a brilliant speech, and also spoke in favour of the bill for Fenwick's attainer. He vigorously opposed the bill for disbanding the army (1699). His political services were rewarded by the office of lord privy seal (1700). But his health was broken, and in the following year he died.

Grey, Sir George (1799-1882), was the only son of Charles, 1st Earl Grey. During his long career he held many cabinet posts. He was under-secretary for the colonies for a few months in 1834, and again 1835-9; judge advocate and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster in 1839; home secretary 1846-52, 1855-9, and 1861-6; colonial secretary 1854-5; and chancellor of the duchy again in 1859. His parliamentary career ended with the fall of Gladstone's first ministry in 1874.

Grey, Sir George, K.C.B. (1812-98), was born at Lisbon, educated at Sandhurst, and for some time held a commission in the 83rd Regiment. After conducting explorations in Western Australia, he was appointed governor of South Australia in 1841, of New Zealand in 1845, of Cape Colony in 1853, and again of New Zealand in 1861-7. In 1874 he became superintendent of the province of Auckland; member of House of Representatives for Auckland City (1874-94), and privy councillor on his return to England.

Grey, Henry, 3rd Marquis of Dorset (d. 1554), married Frances, daughter of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and Mary, sister of Henry VIII. By her he became the father of Lady Jane Grey. His weak and ambitious character caused him to lend a ready ear to Northumberland's proposals for obtaining an alteration of the succession in favour of his daughter. When this plot failed, Suffolk was pardoned on payment of a fine, but in the following year raised a rebellion in the midland counties, in conjunction with that of Sir Thomas Wyatt (q.v.) in Kent. His few troops were defeated near Coventry by the Earl of Huntingdon, and the duke, having taken shelter with one of his retainers named Underwood, was by him betrayed to his pursuers. He was condemned, and executed February 23, 1554, a few days after his daughter, Lady Jane Grey.

Grey, Lady Jane (1537-54), was the daughter of Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, and Frances Brandon, daughter of the Duke of Suffolk. On the approaching death of Edward VI becoming apparent in 1553, the Duke of Northumberland conceived the idea of aggrandizing his own family by obtaining the crown for Lady Jane, and marrying her to his son Lord Guildford Dudley (q.v.). Accordingly, he induced Edward VI to alter the succession in her favour. On the young king's death Lady Jane was informed by the duke that she was queen, and was proclaimed by him in various parts of the country, but the people refused to recognize the usurpation. After a brief reign of nine days, the crown was transferred to Mary, and Lady Jane and her husband were sent to the Tower and subsequently condemned to death. They were kept in captivity for some time, and were not executed until after Wyatt's rebellion (February 12, 1554). Lady Jane Grey, whose education had been entrusted to John Aylmer and Roger Ascham, was as accomplished as she was beautiful, and was a fluent scholar in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin.

Grey, John, of Groby, 8th Baron Ferrers (commonly called Sir John Grey) (d. 1461), was a Lancastrian who fell in the second battle of St. Albans (1461). He was the first husband of Elizabeth Woodville, afterwards wife of Edward IV.

Grey, Lord Leonard (d. 1541), was the sixth son of Thomas, 1st Marquis of Dorset (q.v.). He was sent over to Ireland in 1535 to assist Sir William Skeffington. On Skeffington's death he became lord deputy, 1536. Together with Lord James Butler he destroyed O'Brien's Bridge over the Shannon, long an object of alarm to the English, and he induced the O'Connor to come to terms. His sister, Lady Elizabeth Grey, was the second wife of Gerald, 9th Earl of Kildare, and it now became his duty to try to capture his own nephew, that nobleman's heir, an object which he did not succeed in effecting. In 1538 he attacked the Island Scots. He was compelled to retreat, however, in spite of Ormonde's help, before the combined forces of Desmond and the O'Briens. Lord Leonard was a staunch Catholic, and this, together with the favour he showed the Geraldines and the natives, made him hated by Ormonde. Soon after his recall, at his own request in 1540, he was accused of a treasonable understanding with his kinsmen, the Fitzgeralds, and executed in 1541.

Brewer, "Introductions to the Letters and Papers of Henry VIII's Reign."

Grey, Sir Patrick (fl. 1450), was captain of the guard to James II of Scotland. Having a bitter feud with the Earl of Douglas, on account of the murder of his nephew in Douglas Castle, he gave the earl his death-wound, after he had been stabbed by the king, in Stirling Castle (1452).

Grey, LORD RICHARD (d. 1483), was the younger son of Sir John Grey, by Elizabeth Woodville, and consequently half-brother of King Edward V. In 1483 he was seized, together with his uncle, Earl Rivers, at Northampton, by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, and eventually put to death without trial at Pontefract.

Grey, SIR THOMAS (d. 1415), was a knight of Northumberland who, in 1415, joined the conspiracy of the Earl of Cambridge to place the Earl of March on the throne. He was seized, and having confessed his guilt, was immediately executed.

Grey, THOMAS, 1ST MARQUIS OF DORSET (d. 1501), was a son of Elizabeth Woodville, the subsequent wife of Edward IV, by her first husband, Sir John Grey. Sharing in his mother's prosperity, he was created Marquis of Dorset in 1475, and escaped the hostility displayed by Gloucester in 1483 to all the members of the queen-dowager's family by taking sanctuary at Westminster. Escaping thence in safety, he joined with his uncle, Sir Richard Woodville, in an attempt to seize the Tower and raise a fleet; but failure drove him once again to concealment, until Buckingham's rebellion afforded him another opportunity of being actively hostile to Richard III. This movement likewise failing, he forthwith fled over the sea to make one of the powerful party of malcontents supporting the Earl of Richmond in Brittany. On his return from France, where he had been left by Henry VII as security for the French king's loan, he enjoyed the royal favour, though during the Simnel imposture he was imprisoned in the Tower, but soon released. In the same reign he served against the French (1492); five years later he was one of the leaders of the royal army against the Cornish rebels.

Grey, LORD THOMAS (d. 1554), brother of Henry, Duke of Suffolk, joined in the rebellion in the midland counties (1554) organized by the duke in conjunction with that of Sir Thomas Wyatt in Kent. After the defeat of Suffolk's forces by Lord Huntingdon at Coventry, Thomas Grey escaped to Leicester and thence to Wales, but was taken prisoner, and executed (April 1554). He was a man of ambition and daring, and his unbounded influence over his brother, the duke, was believed to have drawn the latter into this enterprise.

Grey, WILLIAM, 13TH BARON GREY DE WILTON (d. 1562), was governor of Berwick in the reign of Edward VI, and in that capacity distinguished himself at Pinkie (1547) and in several raids across the border, in one of which (1548) he took and fortified Haddington. He did much to quell rebellion in the west of England (1549). In 1551 he was sent to the Tower by order of Warwick, who mistrusted him as a friend of Somerset, though a year or two afterwards he is found implicated in the conspiracy to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne. Made governor of Guines by Mary, he kept a close watch upon the French, and had his advice been listened to, Calais might have been saved. The fall of Calais was quickly followed by that of Guines, which Grey found himself compelled to surrender. On his return to England he was sent to the north, where, after a lengthy siege, he made an unsuccessful assault upon Leith.

Grimston, SIR HARBOTTLE (1603-85), a strong Presbyterian, represented Colchester in the Long Parliament. He was one of the members excluded by Pride's Purge (q.v.). On the king's execution he left England, and remained abroad for several years. In 1656 he was elected M.P. for Essex, but was excluded from the House. In April 1660 he was elected Speaker of the Convention Parliament. He was also one of the commissioners sent to Charles at Breda. For his services at the Restoration he was created master of the rolls in November 1660. During the reign of Charles II he distinguished himself by asserting the right of the Commons to choose their own Speaker (1679) and by his hostility to the Catholics.

Grindal, EDMUND (1519?-83), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born near St. Bees and educated at Cambridge. He was made prebendary of Westminster in 1552, and chaplain to Edward VI, at whose death he was obliged to take refuge on the continent. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England a strong Puritan, and greatly influenced by Geneva; but he waived his objections to vestments so far as to accept the see of London on the deprivation of Bonner in 1560. He had taken an active part in the theological controversy at Westminster, 1559, and was a sound theologian and noted preacher; but he constantly incurred the queen's displeasure for his mildness in enforcing the Act of Uniformity. Yet in 1570 he was made Archbishop of York, and on the death of Archbishop Parker, 1575, was translated to Canterbury. His administration was in some ways unsuccessful; his Puritan sympathy made him refuse to put down the "prophesyings," and in consequence he was sequestered from the exercise of his jurisdiction for five years, being restored in 1582, a year before his death, though he never regained the favour of the queen. As Archbishop of Canterbury, Grindal made no mark. His difference of opinion with the queen made it impossible for them to work in harmony, yet he was a man of profound learning, deep piety, and some moderation; mild, affable, and generous, and much admired by his own party.

Griqualand West is separated from Cape Colony by the Orange River. After the discovery of diamonds there in 1867 the district was made a British colony, and in 1877 was made a province of Cape Colony, of which it now constitutes four out of seventy divisions. [SOUTH AFRICA, UNION OF.]

Grith, in Anglo-Saxon law, is a word of narrower meaning than "frith," with which it is often coupled. It signifies a special or localized peace or protection, particularly that granted by the king or a high official. While "frith" was primarily personal, the peace of an individual, the "grith" was territorial, the peace of a district.

Grocyn, WILLIAM (1446 ?-1519), Greek scholar, was born at Colerne (Wilts) and educated at Winchester and Oxford, becoming divinity reader at Magdalen about 1481 and a fellow of New College (1467). He was among the first to teach Greek publicly at Oxford. In 1488 he went to Italy, where he studied for two years and met Linacre and Latimer. On his return he was joined by More and Colet in spreading the New Learning at Oxford. He accompanied Colet to London in 1504, became the firm friend of Erasmus, and occupied the living of St. Lawrence Jewry from 1496 until 1517.

Grosseteste, ROBERT (1175 ?-1253), Bishop of Lincoln, one of the most eminent of mediæval ecclesiastics and schoolmen, was born at Stradbroke, in Suffolk, of poor parents. He studied at Oxford and Paris, where he gained a very great reputation as a student and teacher. He became "rector scholarum" at Paris, and first rector of the Franciscans at Oxford. He received various preferments, but in 1232 resigned all but one in order to continue at Oxford. In 1235 his election as bishop of Lincoln gave him both a wider sphere of work and a special relation to his university. As administrator of his huge diocese he was both active and successful. A long struggle with his chapter was only ended by the personal intervention of the pope, Innocent IV, who at the Council of Lyons practically decided in the bishop's favour. His drastic visitation of the monasteries of his see, though hampered by the disfavour shown to him at Rome, where the gold of the monks was all-powerful, was resolutely carried through. A sturdy champion of liberty, he prevailed in 1244 in preventing the grant of a royal subsidy, and kept together the opposition when likely to be broken up by the king's intrigues; and he ensured the reading of the sentence of excommunication against violators of the Great Charter in every parish of his diocese. A similar spirit actuated the refusal in 1251 to admit foreigners ignorant of English into rich preferment in his diocese, and led to a papal suspension, which, however, was of short duration. In 1252 he prevented the collection of a tenth imposed upon the clergy by the pope for Henry III's necessities. In 1253 he refused to induct the pope's own nephew into a prebend at Lincoln. His celebrated letter of refusal, while accepting the ultramontane position, was thoroughly decided in its tone. After his death miracles were reported at his tomb, but the effort to obtain canonization for so bad a papalist failed. Grosseteste had a wide acquaintance over which he exercised great influence. The spiritual adviser of Adam de Marisco, the intimate friend of Simon de Montfort, and the tutor to his sons, he was yet the friend of the queen and even of the king. The sturdy practical temper illustrated by all his life's acts was combined with vast knowledge, great dialectical and metaphysical subtlety, activity in preaching and teaching, and real spiritual feeling; his leisure, too, was devoted to the cultivation of French love poetry.

Guadeloupe, THE ISLAND OF, is a French possession in the Antilles discovered by Columbus in 1493. Settled in 1635 by the French, it resisted British attacks in 1691 and 1703, but was captured in 1759, restored in 1763, and again captured in 1794. Restored in 1802 by the Peace of Amiens, it was reconquered in 1810, surrendered to Sweden in 1813, and restored to France in 1814. In 1816 the British finally withdrew.

Guader, RALPH, the son of Ralph the Staller and a Breton mother, was born in England in the reign of the Confessor. He was made Earl of Norfolk by William I, but in 1075, being irritated at the king's disapproval of his marriage with the sister of the Earl of Hereford, he organized a conspiracy for the division of England between himself, the Earl of Hereford, and Waltheof, Earl of Huntingdon. The plot was betrayed by Earl Waltheof and Ralph fled to Brittany. Eventually he joined the first Crusade, and died in Palestine. The name of Guader or Wader derives from the castle of that name in Brittany, which was part of Ralph's inheritance from his mother. [NORWICH, BRIDAL OF.]

Gualo was appointed papal legate in England in the year 1216. He strongly supported King John against Louis of France, and on John's death was instrumental in obtaining the recognition of the young King Henry. With William Marshal, who became "ruler of the king and kingdom," Gualo controlled the whole policy of the new reign. In conjunction the cardinal and the regent reissued the Great Charter in 1216, and again in 1217, and secured the pacification of the country. Gualo was replaced in 1218 by Pandulf.

Guiana, BRITISH, the only British possession on the Spanish Main, consists of the three provinces of Essequibo, Demerara, and Berbice, and is bounded by Venezuela on the west and Dutch Guiana on the east. From Columbus to the end of the sixteenth century its history is one of Spanish exploration on the coast line. Then comes a period during which the English and Dutch strove to find Eldorado. The Dutch succeeded in establishing a colony, while every British attempt, Leigh's (1604-6), Harcourt's (1609-12 and 1626-31), and Harvey's (1617), either failed or was crushed by Portuguese or Dutch rivalry. Confirmed to the Dutch by the Treaty of Breda (1667), Guiana remained in their hands until 1814, although it had been captured in 1796 and restored again in 1802, only to be recaptured the following year. The history of the three provinces is not one under the Dutch, separate constitutions having been granted Berbice (1737) and Demerara (1773). The three were united into one colony in 1831. The old Dutch constitution of 1787, slightly modified, was retained until 1891, Wodehouse's constitutional amendments of 1855 having been rejected. The constitution consisted of a governor, who, with the Court of Policy, performed the functions of a British Crown colony executive and legislature, with the exception that six elected financial representatives had to participate in matters of taxation, so forming the combined court. In 1891 the administrative functions of the Court of Policy were transferred to an executive council, while the court (7 officials, 8 elected members) became the legislature. The College of Electors, who had previously chosen the four unofficial members of the Council of Policy, was abolished and unofficial members were to be elected directly by the people. The combined court retained the six financial members, and could discuss taxation initiated by the governor in his executive council of five officials and three others, all nominated by the Crown. In 1909 election qualifications were revised, and in 1917 the Roman-Dutch law, then in force, was greatly changed in favour of the English criminal code. The boundary with Venezuela was defined in 1899 after a long dispute. The British claim (1886) was that of Schomburgk's survey of 1842-3, and was based upon the original Dutch claim to the Essequibo watershed. Venezuela claimed that the Spanish province of Guayana extended to that river. In 1887 Venezuela broke off diplomatic negotiations; in 1897 a treaty was signed providing for arbitration by a court of two judges each from the High Courts of England and the United States. Schomburgk's line was altered a little in Venezuela's favour. [VENEZUELA, RELATIONS WITH.] The boundary with Brazil, about which a dispute had lasted since 1843, was decided in 1904, when the King of Italy, as arbiter, adjudged half the Brazilian claim to Great Britain.

Guilford Court-house, THE BATTLE OF (March 15, 1781), during the closing period of the American War of Independence, was almost the only gleam of success that shone on Cornwallis's fatal advance into the north. At the beginning of the year he entered North Carolina. Nathanael Greene, with much prudence, refused to attack him, and retreated. On February 20 Cornwallis, halting at Hillsborough, invited all loyalists to join him; but a small detachment of them on their way to take advantage of the proclamation were cut to pieces by the Americans, and the rest took flight. Again Cornwallis advanced, and Greene at length determined to give him battle. On some strong ground near Guilford Court-house Cornwallis attacked, and his regulars carried Greene's position despite inferiority in numbers. In results, however, the victory was signally deficient, for Cornwallis, too weak to advance, and receiving no reinforcements, had to fall back on Wilmington. [AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, WAR OF.]

Guilford, LORD FREDERICK NORTH, 2ND EARL OF. (1732-92). [NORTH.]

Guiscard, ANTOINE, MARQUIS DE (1658-1711), was a French adventurer of good family. For some unknown offence he was expelled from France, and came to England after a variety of adventures. Godolphin made him colonel of a regiment of French refugees; and he became a companion of St. John in his wild orgies. In the year 1706 he proposed a descent on the coast of Languedoc, and twelve regiments were placed in readiness, but the expedition never sailed, probably because Godolphin thought his schemes too visionary. Guiscard was discharged with a pension of £500 a year. He almost immediately began a treacherous correspondence with the French court. On its detection he was brought before the privy council. Finding that everything was known, and wishing for a better death than hanging, he stabbed Harley twice with a penknife he had secreted. The wounds were slight. Guiscard was soon overpowered, and died in Newgate from injuries received in the struggle (some accounts say from poison). To the last he denied that the attack was premeditated.

Gujarat, THE BATTLE OF (February 22, 1849), was fought during the second Sikh War, between the British under Lord Gough and Major-General Lawrence, and the Sikhs under Shere Singh. The latter were completely routed by means of an artillery attack.

Gunpowder Plot, THE, is the name usually given to the great Roman Catholic conspiracy of James I's reign. The Catholics were deeply disappointed at finding that the king had no intention of remitting the severe laws against recusancy. In their resentment a plot was formed by several Roman Catholic gentlemen. It was probably originated by Robert Catesby, who was joined by Thomas Winter and John Wright in the spring of 1604; and later by Thomas Percy, Robert Winter, Sir Everard Digby, Rookwood, Tresham, the Jesuit Garnet, and Guy Fawkes, an Englishman, who had long served as a soldier of fortune in Flanders, and was closely connected with the English Jesuits. The plot was matured in the summer of 1605. It was arranged that Fawkes was to secrete some barrels of gunpowder in cellars adjacent to the Houses of Parliament. After the explosion, which was to take place when the king and Prince of Wales were present, the young Prince Charles and Princess Elizabeth were to be seized and a rising attempted in the midland counties. After the prorogation parliament was to meet on November 5, 1605, and this was the day on which the enterprise was to be carried out. Several of the conspirators were, however, anxious to save the Catholic members of the House of Lords. A letter was received by Lord Monteagle from one of the conspirators (probably Tresham) warning him not to be present at the opening of parliament. The letter was shown to Cecil. Orders were given to search the vaults on November 4, and Fawkes was arrested. Most of the other conspirators had taken the alarm and already fled to Dunchurch, where Sir Everard Digby had collected a large number of Catholic gentlemen. They dispersed in various directions. The leading conspirators attempted to make a stand at Holbeach. Several of them were wounded by an accidental explosion. Catesby, Percy, and the Wrights were killed in the course of the flight; most of the other leaders were captured. They were tried, and executed in January and February 1606.

An attempt to show that the Government encouraged the plot so as to trap the conspirators has been made by Father Gerrard, S.J., in his "What was the Gunpowder Plot?" 1897, and replied to by S. R. Gardiner in "What the Gunpowder Plot was," 1897. Later works on the subject by P. Sidney, 1902, and M. W. Jones, 1909.

Gurkha War (1814-16). The Gurkhas had encroached continually on the British frontier, and at last laid claim to two districts, Butwul and Sheoraj, which they had seized, though they had been ceded to Lord Wellesley in the year 1801 by the nawab. Lord Minto remonstrated with them, and Lord Hastings, his successor, ordered their expulsion. Money was obtained from the vizir, and four armies were prepared. The Gurkhas were divided into three; one-third, under Amar Singh, guarded the fortresses on the Sutlej; two thousand were distributed between the Jumna and Kali; the rest protected the capital. The British at first met with nothing but disaster, failing entirely to capture Jitgarh, or to reach the capital. These disasters were somewhat retrieved by the brilliant success of General Ochterlony, who was entrusted with the difficult task of dislodging Amar Singh from the forts on the Upper Sutlej. The discomfiture of their ablest general and loss of their most valuable conquests induced the Nepalese government to sue for peace. The conditions proposed by Lord Hastings were that they should resign all claims on the hill rajas west of the Kali, cede the Terai, restore the territory of Sikkim, and receive a British resident. The treaty was agreed to on December 2, 1816, but the influence of Amar Singh and the other chiefs induced the Gurkha government to break it, and another campaign under Sir David Ochterlony and a complete rout at Mukwanpur were necessary before the treaty of Seganli was finally concluded, March 2, 1816.

Guthrum, or GUTHORM I (Mod. Dan., Gorm), was a Danish chief who became King of East England. After conquering Mercia, he started from Cambridge in 875 with half the "great host," while Halfdene went another way with the other half to colonize Northumberland. With two of his fellow chiefs, he attacked Wessex by land and sea. He withdrew next year to Gloucester, but in 878 he renewed his attack in midwinter, forcing Alfred to take refuge in Athelney. He then raised a great stockade at Chippenham, but after being defeated at Ethandun was besieged there by the English king, and forced by blockade to accept terms of peace. This treaty is still in existence. Guthrum was baptized with thirty of his chief men, and in 880 he settled with his host in Essex and East Anglia. He seems to have done his best to keep the peace, but his followers were not always obedient, and in 886 they seem to have given assistance to the Danish host that attacked Rochester. The outcome was the conclusion of a new peace between Alfred and Guthrum which defined the frontiers between English and Danish territory, and gave London to Alfred. It was not till after the death of Guthrum in 890 that the East English Danes again became a danger to Alfred. Guthrum's baptismal name was Athelstan, which alone appears on his coins. The theory, however, that he, not the English king, was the foster-father of Hakon the Good reposes on a false chronology and is quite unnecessary. Guthrum was succeeded by Eohric, or Yorick, who was possibly, but not certainly, his son. [ALFRED.]

Guthrum II, King of East England, nephew of Guthrum I, succeeded Yorick in 902. He made a peace with Edward the Elder in 906 on the lines of the treaty of 886. It was against him that Edward's policy of building a line of forts (burhs) across the Midlands was chiefly directed, a policy which led to the submission successively of the Danes of Hertford (911), of Bedford, under Earl Turketil (913), and finally to the campaign of 916, in which Edward defeated and slew Guthrum at Tempsford. His death, and the submission of Earl Thurfrið of Northampton, the Danes of Huntingdon, the "host of Cambridge," and the East Anglian Danes, in the same year, brought to an end the Danish rule in East England.

Gwalior is a protected state of Central India, which includes most of Malwa. The capital of the same name is situated on a rocky hill, rising sheer from the level plain. It is ruled by the line of Mahratta princes called Sindhia. The fortress of Gwalior was taken by Major Popham in 1780, and restored to its former ruler, the Raja of Gohad, but in 1784 was recovered by Sindhia. In February 1804 it was again taken by the British under Sir H. White, but was restored to Sindhia the next year. In 1843, on the death of the reigning Sindhia, without heirs, the dissensions at Gwalior led to an expedition to restore order there. The British defeated the Gwalior army at Maharajpur. A treaty was concluded, by which the fortress of Gwalior was ceded to Great Britain and the native army reduced to 9,000 men (1844). In 1857 it was a seat of the Mutiny, but Sindhia remained unwaveringly faithful.

Gwyn, ELEANOR (1650-87), was of humble origin, and was early in life an orange girl at the Theatre Royal. She subsequently became an actress and mistress to Lord Buckhurst, and eventually one of Charles II's mistresses, besides being appointed one of the ladies of the bedchamber to the queen. By Charles II she had two sons, one of whom died very young. The other was Charles Beauclerk (b. 1670), who was created Duke of St. Albans. Her personal beauty was very great, while her generosity and kindness made her more popular than most of the king's favourites.

Gwynedd, the old name for North Wales, was a district roughly corresponding to the domains of the "Princes of Wales" who reigned at Aberffraw. [WALES.]

Gyrth (d. 1066) was the fourth son of Earl Godwin. He shared in his father's banishment and return, and in 1057 he received an earldom which seems to have included Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and Oxfordshire. He took part in the battle of Hastings, where he was killed, it is said, by William's own hand.

Gytha was the sister of Ulf and cousin of Canute. She married Earl Godwin, and was banished with him in 1051. After the battle of Hastings, she begged the body of Harold to inter it at Waltham, but this was refused by William, though she is said to have offered him Harold's weight in gold. In 1067 she took refuge in the Flatholm, and went thence to St. Owen, where she remained till her death.

H

Habeas Corpus, THE WRIT OF, is a writ issuing from one of the superior courts, commanding the body of a prisoner to be brought before it. It rests upon the famous 39th section of Magna Carta: "No freeman shall be taken and imprisoned unless by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." This clause was directed specifically against John's practice of putting execution before judgment; and the theory that it forbade arbitrary imprisonment is now exploded. Arbitrary imprisonment did not cease to be practised by the king's privy council, and in 1352 a statute was passed to prevent this abuse of the liberty of the subject, which was twice re-enacted in the reign of Edward III. Under the Tudors, prisoners, when committed by the council generally, or even by the special command of the king, were admitted to bail on their habeas corpus, but there were frequent delays in obtaining the writ. The question whether a prisoner could be detained by special command of the king, signified by a warrant of the privy council, without showing cause of imprisonment, was argued out in Darnell's case, when the judges, relying upon an obscure declaration of their predecessors in the 34th of Elizabeth, decided for the Crown. The House of Commons retorted by protesting in the Petition of Right against the illegal imprisonment of the subject without cause. They based their protest on clause 39 of Magna Carta, but the interpretation was legally unsound though politically expedient.

The arbitrary arrest of Sir John Eliot (q.v.) and the other members on the dissolution of 1629 was an attempt to evade the Petition of Right, and was met by the provision in the act which abolished the Star Chamber, that any person committed by the council or the king's special command was to have a writ of habeas corpus granted him, on application to the judges of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, without any delay or pretence whatever. Nevertheless, Lord Clarendon's arbitrary custom of imprisoning offenders in distant places revived the grievance, and the Commons, under Charles II, carried several bills to prevent the refusal of the writ of habeas corpus, but they were thrown out in the Lords. In 1676 Jenkes's case called fresh attention to the injustice of protracted imprisonment. At last, in 1679, the famous Habeas Corpus Act was passed. It enacted that any judge must grant the writ of habeas corpus when applied for, under penalty of a fine of £500; that the delay in executing it must not exceed twenty days; that any officer or keeper neglecting to deliver a copy of the warrant of commitment, or shifting the prisoner without cause to another custody, shall be fined £100 on the first offence, and £200, with dismissal, for the second; that no person once delivered by habeas corpus shall be recommitted for the same offence; that every person committed for treason or felony is to be tried at the next assizes, unless the Crown witnesses cannot be produced at that time; and that, if not indicted at the second assizes or sessions, he may be discharged; and that no one may be imprisoned out of England. The defects in this great act have since been remedied by the Bill of Rights, which declares that excessive bail may not be required; and by the act of 1757 "for securing more effectually the liberty of the subject," which extended the remedies of the Habeas Corpus Act to non-criminal charges, and empowered the judges to examine the truth of the facts set forth in the return. By an act of 1862, based on the fugitive slave Anderson's case, it was provided that no writ of habeas corpus could issue from an English court into any colony where local courts exist having authority to grant and issue the said writ. The Habeas Corpus Act was extended to Ireland in 1782; in Scotland the liberty of the subject is guarded by the Wrongous Imprisonment Act of 1701.

In times of political and social disturbance the Habeas Corpus Act has now and again been suspended. It was suspended nine times between the Revolution and 1745; again during the troubles which followed the French Revolution (1794-1800), after which an Act of Indemnity was passed; as again after the Suspension Act of 1817. In Ireland it has been suspended no fewer than six times since the Union; but after 1848 the government, in times of disaffection, had recourse to coercion acts.

Habeas Corpus Act, THE, IN IRELAND, was not passed till 1782, when an act resembling that in England was carried through the Irish parliament. It was suspended in 1797, in 1800, 1802 to 1805, 1807 to 1810, 1814, 1822 to 1824, 1866 to 1869, and partially by the Westmeath Act, 1871, and other coercion acts.

Hacket, WILLIAM (d. 1591), was a fanatic who, with two companions named Coppinger and Arthington, endeavoured to procure a following in London by predicting the immediate end of the world. Their divine mission failed, however, to save them from being convicted as traitors. Arthington was pardoned, Coppinger starved himself to death, and Hacket was executed on July 28, 1591. This fanaticism caused the persecution of the Puritans to be redoubled.

Hackston, DAVID, OF RATHILLET (d. 1680), was one of the party which committed the murder of Archbishop Sharp, though he did not take part in the actual deed. After the crime he escaped into Stirlingshire by giving out that he and his companions were troopers in pursuit of the murderers. He afterwards fought at Drumclog (q.v.) and Bothwell Bridge (q.v.) on the side of the Covenanters. He was captured at Airds Moss (q.v.—1680), and soon afterwards executed at Edinburgh.

Haddington, eighteen miles east of Edinburgh, was burnt by John in 1216, by Henry III in 1244, and by Edward III in 1355. In 1547 it was taken by the English shortly after the battle of Pinkie; but was recaptured by the Scots in the following year. It was here that the Estates of the Realm met to discuss the marriage of their young Queen Mary with the dauphin (1548). In 1715 it was occupied by the Jacobites.

Hadrian, EMPEROR OF ROME (117-38), visited Britain in the year 120. He restored the southern part of the island to order, and drove back the Caledonians. The wall from the Solway to the Tyne was built by his orders. [ROMANS IN BRITAIN.]

Hadwisa, or HAWISA, wife of King John, was the granddaughter of Robert, Earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I. Her marriage with King John in 1189 gave him a share of the great Gloucester earldom of which she was co-heir, but in 1199 she was divorced on the pretext of affinity, and subsequently married Geoffrey de Mandeville, Earl of Essex. [GLOUCESTER, PEEBAGE OF.]

Haig, DOUGLAS, 1ST EARL HAIG (1861-1928), was born at Edinburgh and educated at Oxford. He entered the army in 1885 and served in Egypt (1898), South Africa (1899), and India (1909-12). On the outbreak of the Great War he was placed in command of the 1st Army Corps. At the close of 1915 he succeeded Sir John French in the chief command, in which capacity he was responsible for the launching of a campaign in Flanders in 1917. It was due to his advice that the battle was extended northwards in 1918 and so achieved the breaking of the Hindenburg Line. For his services Haig was raised to the peerage as Earl Haig of Bemsersyde, and awarded a grant of £100,000. He later became president of the British Legion.

Haldane, RICHARD BURDON, 1ST VISCOUNT HALDANE (b. 1856), was educated at Edinburgh and Göttingen, and called to the bar in 1879. He entered parliament in 1885. In 1905 he became secretary for war in the Liberal ministry, and during his term of office was responsible for the abolition of the volunteers and militia, and the introduction of the territorial system. He was raised to the peerage in 1911, and appointed to the judicial committee of the privy council. In 1912 he undertook a mission to Berlin to discuss disarmament proposals. On his return he became lord chancellor, an office which he held again in 1924 in the Labour ministry of Ramsay MacDonald.

Hale, SIR MATTHEW (1609-76), was called to the bar in 1636. He took the side of the king in his struggle with the parliament, and defended the Duke of Hamilton and other Royalists in 1649. Later he took the engagement to be faithful to the Commonwealth, and in 1654 was made a judge of the Common Pleas, in which capacity he showed great fearlessness and impartiality, refusing to assist in the trial of Penruddock in 1655, and on one occasion dismissing a jury which had been illegally returned at Cromwell's bidding. On the death of Oliver Cromwell he resigned his office, but in 1660 was made by Charles II chief baron of the Exchequer, and in 1671 was promoted to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench. In private and public life alike, he was distinguished by his candour, kindly disposition, and piety; his habits and tastes were most simple, and to the end of his life he was an earnest student of theology and law.

Hales's Case, 1686, is an important case in English constitutional history. Edward Hales had been appointed colonel of a foot regiment in 1673, but had not taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy required by the Test Act (q.v.). He was indicted and convicted at Rochester assizes in 1686, when, following his formal reconciliation to the Roman Catholic Church (November 1685), James II gave him a dispensation by letters patent. His case was heard on appeal in the King's Bench. Eleven of the twelve judges decided in his favour and vindicated the royal power of dispensation. Hales subsequently became lieutenant of the Tower and master of the ordnance (1687).

Halfdene (d. 910), a Danish leader, is mentioned in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" as one of the two kings leading the Danish army at the battle of Ashdown (871). Four years later he went with part of the host into Northumbria, subdued the land, and harried the Picts and the Strathclyde Welsh. Next year (876) he divided the south part of Northumbria (Deira) among his followers, who settled down in their new abodes as peaceful inhabitants. At the end of a year, however, Halfdene was expelled by his subjects "because of his tyranny." Many years later the name of Halfdene again occurs in the "Chronicle" in connexion with an expedition that ravaged England as far south as Tottenhall (910). On its return the Danish army was overtaken by Edward the Elder, and put to rout. Several of the Danish leaders were slain in this engagement, and amongst them a King Halfdene. It is probable that he was a son of the Halfdene who had established himself at York in Alfred's day. [DANES.]

Halidon Hill, THE BATTLE OF (July 19, 1333), was fought near Berwick between the English troops, led by Edward III in person, and the Scots under Sir Archibald Douglas. The English were posted on a hill, and also protected by the marshy ground before them. When the Scots advanced to the attack, their troops floundered in this morass, and, being open to the English archers, were reduced to a mere fragment ere they reached the enemy's ranks. Disorganized and hopeless, they were then slaughtered by the English men-at-arms.

Hall, ARTHUR (fl. 1563-1604), member for Grantham, who had been previously arraigned at the bar of the House of Commons "for sundry lewd speeches" (1572), was expelled from the House, fined, and imprisoned in the Tower, for having published a book "not only reproaching some particular good members of the House, but also very much slanderous and derogatory to its general authority, power, and state, and prejudicial to the validity of its proceedings in making and establishing of laws" (February 1581). Hall had previously incurred the anger of the House, which suspected him of having connived at the fraud of his servant, John Smalley (q.v.), whom they had sent their sergeant-at-arms to deliver from jail in 1575. When Hall's book was condemned the author made his submission, but was not liberated till the dissolution of parliament. Notwithstanding his misfortunes on this occasion, he seems to have sat in later parliaments. Hall's Case is the chief precedent for the power of expulsion which the House of Commons has always retained.

Hall, JOSEPH (1574-1656), Bishop of Norwich, was one of the deputies sent to represent the established religion of England at the Synod of Dort (1618). In 1627 he was made Bishop of Exeter, and Bishop of Norwich in 1641, in which year he joined twelve of his fellow-bishops in protesting against all laws passed in their absence from the House of Lords. For this offence he was imprisoned. He died at Higham, near Norwich, in 1656. Hall's chief poetical works are two books entitled respectively "Toothless Satires" (1597) and "Biting Satires" (1598), both of which are of some value as presenting a picture of the manners of his time. He was also the author of a work entitled "Hard Measure" (published 1647), which gives an account of the treatment he met with at the hands of the Puritan party.

Hallam, ROBERT (d. 1417), held the archdeaconry of Canterbury, and was nominated by the pope to the archbishopric of York after the execution of Archbishop Scrope (1405). Henry IV, however, refused his sanction to the appointment, and Hallam had to content himself with the bishopric of Salisbury (1407). In 1411 he was raised to the cardinalate owing to some technical irregularity, but seems never to have enjoyed the full state of a cardinal. From 1414 onwards he took a very prominent part in the Council of Constance. He died at Gottlieben near Constance in 1417.

Hamilton, originally called Cadzow or Cadyow, derives its name from Walter, son of Gilbert de Hameldane or Hamilton, who, according to a persistent but unauthenticated tradition, was descended from the Beaumonts, lords of Hamilton in Leicester. Walter Fitz-Gilbert was granted the barony of Cadzow at the end of the thirteenth century. Hamilton was made a royal burgh by Queen Mary in 1548. Hamilton Palace is noted as the place in which Mary, Queen of Scots, took refuge on her escape from Lochleven (1568), and where her supporters mustered round her. It was the chief seat of the Hamiltons, and was taken by the Regent Moray later in the same year.

Hamilton, FAMILY OF, is descended from Sir Gilbert de Hamilton, who lived in the reign of Alexander II of Scotland. His son, Sir Walter Hamilton, received the lordship of Cadzow from Robert Bruce. Sir James Hamilton, 6th Lord of Cadzow, was created an hereditary lord of parliament, with the title of Lord Hamilton, in 1445. His son James was created Earl of Arran in August 1503. James, 2nd earl, was declared heir-presumptive to the crown in 1543, and in 1548 was created by Henry II Duke of Châtellerauld in France. John, his second son, was, in 1591, created Marquis of Hamilton. James, grandson of this peer, was created Duke of Hamilton, 1643. On the death of William, the 2nd duke, without male heirs in 1651, the duchy descended to his niece Anne, who married Lord William Douglas, and the title has remained with their descendants. The holders of the dukedom of Abercorn are descended from Claud, fourth son of the Duke of Châtellerauld.

Hamilton, DUKES OF. [DOUGLAS.]

Hamilton, ANTHONY (1646 ?-1720), was the son of Sir George Hamilton and nephew of James, 2nd Earl of Abercorn, on his father's side, while on his mother's he was great-grandson of Walter, 11th Earl of Ormonde. He was born in Ireland, and educated in France. Under James II he was given the command of an infantry regiment in Ireland, and the government of Limerick. At the battle of Newtown Butler (1689) (q.v.) he was wounded and defeated, and was also present next year at the battle of the Boyne; but shortly afterwards followed the dethroned king into exile. It was at Sceaux, the seat of the Duchess of Maine, that he wrote his "Memoirs of Gramont," which were first printed anonymously in French in Holland, in the year 1713. An English translation was issued in the following year. This work contains much information on court politics of the reign of Charles II. (Hamilton's eldest sister, Elizabeth, was the Comtesse de Gramont.)

Hamilton, EMMA, LADY (1761-1815), was the daughter of Henry Lyon, a native of Cheshire living in humble circumstances. She lost her character in early years, but after various adventures she was married to Sir William Hamilton, the British ambassador at Naples (1791). At this court she soon became very intimate with the queen, Maria Carolina, and did not hesitate to use this intimacy for the purpose of unravelling state secrets which she claimed to be of importance to Great Britain. In 1793 she made the acquaintance of Nelson (q.v.), whose mistress she soon became. His execution of Caracciolo has been ascribed, though undoubtedly wrongly, to her influence. In 1800 she returned to England with Nelson. Lady Hamilton survived Nelson ten years, and died in mean circumstances in Calais (1815). Before her death she published two volumes containing her correspondence with Nelson (1814).

Hamilton, SIR JAMES (d. 1540), was a natural son of James, 1st Earl of Arran. He was a favourite of James V of Scotland, for whom he superintended the erection or the improvement of many royal palaces and castles, e.g., Falkland, Linlithgow, Edinburgh, and Stirling. He was present at the conflict of "Cleanse the Causeway" (q.v.) in 1520, and took an active part in the martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton (q.v.) in 1528. In 1540, being accused of treason and embezzlement, he was found guilty and executed.

Hamilton, JAMES, 2ND EARL OF ARRAN, and DUKE OF CHÂTELLERAULD (d. 1575), the head of the house of Hamilton, and a near relative of James V of Scotland, acted as regent for some time, until he was displaced by his rival the Earl of Angus, the head of the house of Douglas. On the death of James V he again became regent. The confirmation of a treaty with England, 1543, was quickly followed by a league on the part of the regent and Cardinal Beaton against all English interference, and soon afterwards the English ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler, was requested to withdraw. In 1547 Arran was defeated at Pinkie, and in 1554 the regency was transferred to Mary of Guise, Arran being rewarded for his acquiescence by the dukedom of Châtelherault, conferred on him by the French king. He joined the Lords of the Congregation and supported the reformers; and by his opposition to the Darnley marriage incurred the resentment of Queen Mary, so that he judged it prudent to retire to England. Returning some time afterwards, he was reconciled to the queen, and during the Civil War he and the rest of the Hamiltons supported her against the reforming lords. On the abdication of Mary, 1567, he was named one of the council of regency. In 1569 he was imprisoned by Moray in Edinburgh Castle. He was a man of fickle and vacillating character, of courteous manners and pleasant address, but by no means fitted to fill the high position to which he was called.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Hamilton, JAMES, 3RD EARL OF ARRAN (1530-1609), was the son of the Duke of Châtelherault and the heir of the Hamiltons. Having left France, where his life was in danger from the Guises, he became one of the numerous suitors of Mary, Queen of Scots, whom he planned to carry off in 1561. His failure in his suit seems to have affected his reason. He became mad, and continued so until his death.

Hamilton, JAMES, OF BOTHWELLHAUGH (fl. 1566-80), fought for Queen Mary at Langside and forfeited his estate in consequence of espousing the royal side. On February 23, 1570, he shot the Regent Moray from the balcony of a house in Linlithgow belonging to Archbishop Hamilton. Within a few days he escaped to France, where he lived for some time in receipt of a pension from Queen Mary. In 1572 his name was excepted from the benefit of the truce between the members of the king's party and the queen's party.

Hamilton, JAMES, 3RD MARQUIS AND 1ST DUKE OF HAMILTON (1606-49), succeeded his father, James, 2nd marquis, in 1625, and was sent in 1638 by Charles I as commissioner to the Covenanters, to demand the rescinding of the whole Covenant. Having failed to effect a compromise, he was empowered to make an entire surrender of the Service Book, the Book of Canons, and the high commission. In 1639 he was again sent to Scotland in command of a fleet conveying five regiments of royal troops. In 1643 he was raised to the rank of duke, but was subsequently imprisoned on a charge of disloyalty. In August 1648 he was defeated by Cromwell at Preston and taken prisoner. He was beheaded in London in the following March, after a summary mock trial before Bradshaw.

Hamilton, JOHN (1511?-71), Archbishop of St. Andrews, was the natural son of James Hamilton, 1st Earl of Arran, and is said by Scottish historians to have "ruled all at court," and to have been French at heart. He was also very friendly with Cardinal Beaton. He was appointed privy seal and treasurer (1543), and was strongly opposed to the Duke of Somerset's plan of marrying Edward and Mary (1547). By this time he had become Archbishop of St. Andrews on the assassination of Cardinal Beaton. He was a strenuous opponent of the reformed doctrines, and in 1558 condemned the aged Mylne to be burnt for heresy. He baptized James VI in 1566, and about the same time signed a bond in favour of Bothwell. He was a member of Mary's privy council, and continued faithful to her cause, though in 1563 he was empanelled for saying Mass, and committed to ward by her orders. Hamilton, though an archbishop, lived in open adultery, and had to obtain several acts of parliament for the legitimization of his children. He was a party to Darnley's murder; and it was he who in 1567 divorced Bothwell from his wife, and so enabled him to marry the queen. He was hanged at Stirling in April 1571, shortly after the fall of Dumbarton Castle, in which he had taken refuge. The charges against him were complicity in the murders of Darnley and Moray.

Hamilton, PATRICK (1504?-28), the "proto-martyr of Scotland," had held one of the lay benefices of the Church, being Abbot of Ferne, in Ross-shire. He is said to have studied theology in Germany, under Luther and Melancthon. In 1528 he was accused of heresy and burnt at St. Andrews.

Hamilton, RICHARD (fl. 1688), was the grandson of James Hamilton, 1st Earl of Arran. Though a Catholic by religion he had a seat in the Irish privy council, and commanded the Irish troops sent over to England in 1688. After James II's flight he submitted to William, and was sent over to Ireland by the new king as his envoy, having first pledged himself to return in three weeks. Finding, however, that Tyrconnel was determined on resistance, he broke his parole, marched into Ulster at the head of an Irish force, and routed the Protestants at Dromore, March 1689. For some time he was in command of the besiegers of Londonderry, and at the battle of the Boyne led the cavalry in their gallant efforts to retrieve the day. In their last stand he was severely wounded and captured. William did not revenge himself on him for his treachery, and he was exchanged for Mountjoy in 1692, and died in the service of Louis XIV.

Hamilton, ROWAN (1751-1834). [ROWAN, ARCHIBALD HAMILTON.]

Hamilton, WILLIAM GERARD (1729-96), was elected member for Petersfield in 1754. It was in the next year that he delivered (during the debate on the address) the famous fifteen hours' speech which won for him the title of "Single-speech Hamilton" (November 13). After this occasion he only once addressed the House of Commons again (March 1756), fearing, so it was currently reported, to lose the reputation he had acquired by his great effort. In 1761 he was appointed secretary to Lord Halifax and was for twenty years chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland. He was one of the numerous reputed authors of "Junius," and Fox is credited with having once said, in reference to this question, that he would back him against any single horse, though not against the whole field. Hamilton retired into private life in 1784.

Hammond, ROBERT, COLONEL (1621-54), took part in the siege of Bristol in 1645, and was made governor of the Isle of Wight in 1647. When Charles I escaped from Hampton Court, negotiations were opened on his behalf with Hammond, who, it was hoped, would espouse his cause, as he had often expressed dissatisfaction with the violence of the soldiers. But Hammond was a trusted friend of Cromwell, and, having married a daughter of John Hampden, was attached to the Parliamentary cause. Accordingly he could only be induced to promise that he would treat the king as might be expected from a man of honour, and confined him in Carisbrooke Castle, though with much show of respect. While negotiations were being carried on during the next few months, Hammond frequently requested to be discharged from the care of the king's person, and in consequence was looked upon with more or less suspicion by the officers of the army, till the king was removed to Hurst Castle, whereupon Colonel Hammond was discharged from his government, November 1648. He played no important part in affairs thereafter.

Hampden, JOHN (1594-1643), was the son of William Hampden, of Great Hampden, Bucks, and Elizabeth Cromwell, aunt of Oliver Cromwell. He was born in London, educated at Thame School and Magdalen College, Oxford, and entered the Inner Temple in 1613. In the parliament of 1621 he represented Grampound; in 1626, Wendover; in 1640, Buckinghamshire. In 1627 he was imprisoned for refusing to pay the forced loan. When the second writ for ship-money (q.v.) was issued, by which that tax was extended to the inland counties (1637) he refused to pay it. The case was tried in respect of twenty shillings due from lands in the parish of Stoke Mandeville, and of the twelve judges seven decided for the Crown, two for Hampden on technical grounds, and three for him on all counts. This trial made Hampden "the argument of all tongues, every man inquiring who and what he was that he durst of his own charge support the liberty and property of the kingdom, and rescue his country from being made a prey to the court." When a parliament was again summoned "the eyes of all men were fixed upon him as the pilot which must steer the vessel through the tempest and rocks which threatened it. In the Long Parliament he played an important part, generally moderating by his influence the pressure of the popular party. Thus he urged the Commons to proceed against Strafford by impeachment rather than by bill of attainder, and attempted to arrange a compromise on the Church question. The king's attempt to arrest the Five Members (q.v.) obliged him to alter his policy and urge stronger measures. He was appointed a member of the Committee of Safety, and raised a regiment whose flag bore the significant motto, "Vestigia nulla retrorsum." He distinguished himself by his activity in the first weeks of the war, seizing the king's Commissioners of Array, occupying Oxford, and defeating the Cavaliers in many small skirmishes. He arrived too late to fight at Edgehill, but both after that battle, and after the battle of Brentford, urged vigorous measures on Essex, and in the Committee of Safety argued for a march direct on Oxford. After the capture of Reading in 1643, he again counselled in vain a direct attack on the king's head-quarters. On June 18, 1643, at Chalgrove Field, in endeavouring to prevent the retreat of a body of cavalry which had made a sally from Oxford, he was mortally wounded and died six days later. Clarendon describes him as "a very wise man and of great parts, possessed with the most absolute faculties to govern the people of any man I ever knew."

[C. H. F.]

Hampden, JOHN (1653-96), grandson of the famous John Hampden, distinguished himself by his opposition to the succession of the Duke of York, on the ground of his religion. Later, he was implicated in the Rye House Plot (q.v.), and was arrested, together with Essex, Russell, and others (1683). He was condemned to pay an enormous fine (£40,000). After the Revolution, he was chairman of a committee appointed to prepare an address to William III inveighing against the conduct of Louis XIV. The same year (1689) he attacked Lord Halifax, not only in the House of Commons, but also before the Lords. In 1690 he failed to obtain a seat in the new Tory parliament. Disappointed in his ambition, and perhaps ashamed of the reproaches his own conduct brought upon him, he committed suicide in 1696.

Hampden, RENN DICKSON, THE CASE OF (1847). Notwithstanding the fact that his doctrines were in many quarters considered to be highly unorthodox, especially by the Tractarian party, Dr. Hampden (1793-1868), fellow of Oriel and principal of St. Mary Hall, had been appointed in 1836 Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford by Lord Melbourne. This appointment was censured by the convocation of the university, and in consequence the university authorities deprived him of the privilege of granting certificates to the candidates for holy orders who attended his lectures. In spite of this, in 1847 Lord John

Russell advised the Crown to appoint him to the vacant see of Hereford. This produced a great outcry, and a strong protest from many of the High Church clergy. The forms of election were, however, gone through, in spite of the opposition of the dean of Hereford. The election was formally confirmed in the Court of Arches, and an appeal was made in vain to the court of Queen's Bench.

Hampton Court Conference (1604). On the accession of James I there was a general feeling that some concessions might be made both to the extreme High Church and the extreme Presbyterian sections of the nation. The leading Puritans were ready to soften down their demands, and a great part of the laity—Bacon amongst the number—were, at all events, not opposed to a compromise. On his progress to London, James had received the "Millenary Petition" (q.v.) from the Puritan clergy, and in January 1604 gave orders for a conference to be held between representatives of the Established Church and the Puritans. The conference opened on January 14; the Archbishop of Canterbury, eight bishops, and other Church dignitaries were the champions on the one side; four moderate Puritans on the other. But the nomination of the last party was a mere farce. They were not admitted to the discussions between the king and the bishops, which were carried on in the presence of the lords of the council. In this manner the extent of the concessions that would be granted was arranged before the complainants' case was heard; and when, on the second day, the Puritan spokesman, Reynolds, proposed some alterations in the articles, and proposed to introduce the Lambeth Articles of 1595 (q.v.), and to inquire into the authority for confirmation, Bishop Bancroft interrupted him, and kneeling down before the king, begged him not to listen to a "schismatic speaking against his bishops." Then the conference proceeded to discuss questions of doctrine, and James accepted Reynolds's proposal for a new translation of the Bible. The debate next passed on to the comparative value of a learned and unlearned ministry, of prayers, and of preaching; but each party wished in the first place to make its own views and customs binding on the other; the true spirit of compromise was absent. At last the subject of "prophesyings" (q.v.) came forward, a religious exercise of which many moderate men like Bacon did not disapprove; but unluckily Reynolds proposed that disputes during the prophesyings should be settled by the bishop and his presbytery. James took offence at the word, which reminded him of all that he had endured in Scotland. From this moment the question was settled, and on the third day's conference the king and the bishops agreed to a few trifling alterations in the Prayer Book and to the appointment of commissions with a view to inquire into the best means for obtaining a preaching clergy. It was then announced to the Puritans that they would have to subscribe to the whole Prayer Book, the Articles, and the king's supremacy. And so the Hampton Court Conference ended, without any reasonable concessions having been made to the Puritan party.

Hampton Court Palace was built by Cardinal Wolsey. From Wolsey's possession it passed (1526) into the hands of Henry VIII, and has continued to be the property of the Crown ever since. Henry VIII greatly enlarged it, and formed around it a royal park. Having been, until George II's time, a favourite residence of the kings of England, Hampton Court has naturally been the scene of several interesting events in the history of our royal family. The birth of Edward VI, the death of his mother, Jane Seymour, and the famous conference (q.v.) of James I's reign between the High Church party and the Puritans, all took place there. Charles I was imprisoned there for a time and the palace was the occasional residence of Protector Cromwell during the Commonwealth, and in later years of Charles II and James II. By William III the palace was to a great extent rebuilt, and its park and gardens laid out in the formal Dutch style.

Sir E. Law, "History of Hampton Court Palace," 1890.

Hanover, THE HOUSE OF, is lineally descended from the famous Guelfs, or Welfs of Bavaria, who, in the twelfth century, struggled for the Empire against the Hohenstaufen and gave their name to the papal faction of mediæval Italy. Henry the Proud became Duke of Saxony as well as Duke of Bavaria, and in 1180, on the fall of his son Henry the Lion, the allodial lands of the Guelfic house in the former duchy were saved from the forfeiture which befell their greater possessions. After the last struggle of Otto IV, aided by his uncles Richard and John of England, the Guelfs acquiesced in their new position, and in 1235 the districts of Brunswick and Lüneburg were erected into a duchy in their favour by Frederick II. After various partitions and reunions the whole of the duchy of Brunswick fell, in 1527, into the hands of Duke Ernest, a zealous adherent of Luther. His two sons effected a partition of the duchy, which has continued to the present day. The elder son of Ernest became the Duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel. William, the younger son of Ernest, became Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, and the ancestor of the house of Hanover. A further division of Lüneburg was made in favour of George, the only one of William's seven sons who was allowed to marry. He was made Duke of Calenberg, with the town of Hanover for his capital, Celle being the chief town of Lüneburg.

After various shiftings, his second son, George William, became Duke of Lüneburg or Celle; and his fourth son, Ernest Augustus, Duke of Calenberg or Hanover (1679). The latter was an able and ambitious prince. He introduced primogeniture, and married Sophia, the daughter of Frederick, the Elector Palatine, and Elizabeth, daughter of James I of England. In 1692 his constant adherence to the cause of the emperor was rewarded by the creation of a ninth electorate in his favour, on conditions which ensured his hearty support to the league against Louis XIV. This electorate was properly called the electorate of Brunswick (Kurbraunschweig), but as the dukes of Wolfenbüttel had especially appropriated the title of dukes of Brunswick with their claims over that once free town, the new electors were often called Electors of Hanover, which name, hitherto strictly confined to the town, was henceforth used as the name of the district as well. The Act of Settlement (1701) made the Electress Sophia heiress to the English throne. Ernest had already died in 1698, and their son George Louis, by marrying Sophia Dorothea of Celle, the daughter and heiress of George William of Lüneburg, succeeded on the latter's death, in 1705, to his dominions. Calenberg and Lüneburg were thus reunited, and the new elector put in possession of dominions more adequate to sustain his dignity. In 1714 he became King of England. From that date to 1837 the electorate of Hanover and the English monarchy were united. In 1815 Hanover was erected into a kingdom with large accessions of territory. But in 1837 the accession of Queen Victoria resulted in Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, becoming King of Hanover, as males only were allowed to occupy that throne. Thirty years of arbitrary government and violated constitutions led to the absorption of Hanover into the Prussian state after the war of 1866.

Speaking very roughly, we may divide the Hanoverian period of British history into three sections. From 1714 to 1761 the Whig oligarchy governed the country. After a few years of transition, a long period of Tory rule, 1770-1830, culminated in the reaction against the French Revolution. With 1830 began the period of reform. George I (1714-27) ascended the throne as the pledged supporter of the Whig party, to whose triumph he owed the throne, and by whose principles alone he could claim it. Ignorant of the English language, government, and constitution, he suffered without much difficulty the authority of the Crown to pass into the hands of the ministry which had the confidence of parliament, and was content if his demands for money were satisfied, and if the foreign policy of Great Britain was framed with special regard to the interest of his electorate. Under him, as under his son, George II (1727-60), Great Britain, in the unmeasured language of opposition orators, "became a province of a despicable electorate." But it may be doubted whether the policy of Great Britain and the policy of Hanover did not generally coincide, except perhaps so far as the jealousy of a petty German prince at the rise of Prussia for a time brought British influence rather to bear against the development of the great state which was ultimately to bring unity to Germany. But despite the personal hostility of George II and Frederick the Great, the crisis of the Seven Years' War forced them into an alliance which saved Prussia and covered Great Britain with glory. George II had been content to govern on the lines of his father; but his son Frederick, Prince of Wales, became the centre of a new Toryism that had its highest expression in Bolingbroke's "Idea of a Patriot King." George III, the son of Frederick (1760-1820), began a new epoch in the history of the house of Hanover, by carrying into practice Bolingbroke's theories, and by endeavouring to secure for the king personally the exercise of those prerogatives which the practice of George I and George II had handed over to his ministers. His first triumph under Lord North was for a time ended by the coalition, but under Pitt his ideas finally gained the victory, and the new Toryism of the reaction from the French Revolution found in him a centre for its loyalty. Proud of his "British" nationality, and more intent on home than foreign politics, he allowed the dependence of British policy on Hanoverian interests almost to cease, and the long occupation of that country by Napoleon (1803-14) almost cut the connexion between the kingdom and the electorate. George IV, who, first as regent (1810-20) and then as king (1820-30), was his successor, was too feeble and self-indulgent, too destitute of fixed principle and courage to maintain his father's position. He managed to stave off reform in Great Britain and Hanover; but his brother, William IV (1830-7), while accepting the Reform Bill of 1832 in Great Britain, gave a constitution to Hanover in 1833. In 1837 Queen Victoria ascended the throne, and her constitutional rule, and the practical wisdom of her husband, enabled the transition back from the practice of George III to the practice of George I to be made without friction or difficulty. It is hard to formulate any general characteristics of the rule of the house of Hanover in Great Britain. Under them the constitution was preserved, and the material aspects of the country revolutionized. Without any of the more heroic virtues, and without any lofty ability, their good sense and power to see things as they were made them well adapted to occupy the difficult position into which they were elevated. In 1917 the nominal connexion with Hanover ceased by the proclamation of George V (q.v.) that the British royal line would thenceforth be known as the House of Windsor.

Hanover, THE TREATY OF (September 3, 1725), between Great Britain, France, and Prussia, was rendered necessary by the Treaty of Vienna (April 30 and May 1, 1725) between Spain and Austria, by the secret article of which marriages between the two houses were arranged, Austria and Spain pledged themselves to assist the restoration of the Stuarts, and agreed further to compel, if necessary by force, the restoration of Gibraltar and Minorca. The Jacobite leaders were in direct communication with Ripperda. In opposition to this alliance, Walpole and Townshend obtained the accession of France and Prussia to a confederacy of which Great Britain was the centre. In case of any attack on one of the contracting parties, the others were to furnish a certain quota in troops, or the value in ships and money; and, in case of need, were to confer concerning further succours. The real objects of the treaty were to counterbalance the Treaty of Vienna, compel the emperor to relinquish the Ostend Company (which Austria had established for trade with the Indies in violation of the Barrier Treaty), and to resist any attempts that might be made on behalf of the Pretender. Its objects were successful. The emperor withdrew from his unfortunate position, and peace was signed at Paris in May 1727. The Treaty of Hanover was violently attacked by the opposition during Walpole's administration. Its true justification lies in the terms of the secret Treaty of Vienna.

Hansard, LUKE (1752-1828), was at first a compositor in the office of John Hughs, printer to the House of Commons. After two years he became a partner in the firm, and in 1800 the business passed entirely into his hands. He managed the issue of the report of parliamentary proceedings which, down to the year 1803, is known as Cobbett's "Parliamentary History"; and after that date was continued under the title of "Parliamentary Debates" by Hansard. The official report of the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament is now published under the title of "The Parliamentary Debates." [STOCKDALE v. HANSARD.]

Harcourt, SIMON, 1ST VISCOUNT (1661-1727), was called to the bar in 1683. He was elected member for Abingdon (1690) in the first parliament of William III. He was a strong opponent of the Revolution Settlement, and of the attainder of Sir John Fenwick; and in 1701 he conducted the impeachment of Lord Somers (q.v.) for his share in the Partition Treaty of 1698. Next year he became solicitor-general and attorney-general, and in this capacity conducted the prosecution of Daniel Defoe (1703); but his legal abilities were better employed in framing the bill for the Scottish Union. He followed Harley out of office in 1708. His able defence of Sacheverell (q.v.) two years later resulted in the acquittal of that divine. When the Tories came into power in 1710 he was appointed lord keeper of the privy seal. In the quarrel between Oxford and Bolingbroke he sided with the latter. On the accession of George I, Harcourt was deprived of office. In 1717 he defeated the impeachment of Oxford. [HARLEY.] In 1721 he became a convert to Whig principles.

Harcourt, SIR WILLIAM VERNON (1827-1904), graduated in high honours at Cambridge in 1851, and was called to the bar in 1854, being appointed a queen's counsel in 1866. In 1868 he became Liberal M.P. for Oxford City, migrating to Derby in 1880 and to West Monmouth in 1895. His letters to The Times signed "Historicus," on international law during the war in America, attracted attention. He became solicitor-general and was knighted in 1873. He was made home secretary in 1880. In 1886 and 1892-5 he was chancellor of the exchequer, and effected an important revision of the Death Duties and of the Income Tax. In 1894 he succeeded Gladstone as leader of the House of Commons (a position he resigned in 1898), and remained a prominent parliamentary figure till his death.

Hardicanute, or HARTHACNUT, KING (1040-2), was the son of Canute by Emma. On the death of his father in 1035 he was already in possession of Denmark and proceeded to lay claim to England. He was supported by Godwin and the West Saxons, but the north maintained the cause of his half brother Harold, and eventually a treaty was made whereby Hardicanute was to reign in the south and Harold in the north. In 1037, however, Harold was chosen king over all, and Hardicanute forsaken because he stayed too long in Denmark. At the same time Emma was driven out and fled to Bruges. Here Hardicanute joined her, and was preparing to assert his claims, when in 1040 Harold died. Upon this Hardicanute was unanimously chosen king, but soon proved himself as worthless as his brother. "All his public acts set him before us as a rapacious, brutal, and blood-thirsty tyrant." His first acts were to levy a heavy danegeld (q.v.), and order Harold's body to be dug up, beheaded, and thrown into a ditch. The danegeld led to a revolt at Worcester against the housecarls (q.v.), who were killed in their attempt to collect the tax. This rising was speedily crushed, Worcester was burned, and the whole of the shire ravaged. The only other event of importance in this reign is Hardicanute's accusation of Godwin as the murderer of the Atheling Alfred. The trial which ensued resulted in the triumphant acquittal of Godwin, who, to make his peace with the king, presented him with a ship fully manned and equipped. Probably with the idea of regaining popularity, Hardicanute sent over to Normandy for his half-brother Edward, who came and lived at his court. In 1042, while at the marriage-feast of his standard-bearer, Tofig the Proud, Hardicanute suddenly fell dead as he stood at drink.

Hardinge, Sir Henry, 1st Viscount (1785-1856), entered the army in 1799 and was present at most of the great battles of the Peninsular War. He distinguished himself greatly at the battle of Albuera (q.v.), and later, during the Hundred Days, he was entrusted with the important office of commissioner at the Prussian head-quarters. In this capacity he was with Blücher at the battle of Ligny, but the loss of his left hand, which was taken off by a shot, prevented his presence at Waterloo. During the years of peace that followed he entered parliament and held office under the Duke of Wellington as secretary at war (June 1828—November 1830). Peel appointed him governor-general of India in 1844. His first year of office was marked by the Sind mutiny. In 1845 the disturbances across the Sutlej culminated in the first Sikh War, which lasted till 1846, when Hardinge was able to conclude the pacification of Lahore, by which he hoped to establish the security of the British north-west frontier. The infant Dhuleep Singh was left as nominal maharajah at Lahore under a regency, and it was finally decided that the British troops should remain for eight years, and so ensure the tranquillity of the Sikhs till the young prince came of age. In 1847 Hardinge returned to England as Viscount Hardinge. In 1852, on the death of the Duke of Wellington, he was appointed commander-in-chief, and in 1855 was made a field-marshal.

Hardy, Sir Thomas Masterman (1769-1839), Nelson's favourite captain, was born near Dorchester. He entered the navy at the age of twelve, and was present at the battles of St. Vincent (1797) and the Nile (1798). For his bravery in the latter action Nelson gave him the Vanguard. In 1803 he became Nelson's flag-captain, and it was on board his ship, the Victory, that Nelson received his fatal wound at Trafalgar. In later years Hardy commanded the North American squadron, and in 1834 was appointed a lord of the admiralty and governor of Greenwich Hospital.

Harfleur, a town of France, lying some six miles from Havre, was taken by Henry V on September 22, 1415. It was besieged by the Count d'Armagnac and relieved by the Duke of Bedford the following year. The English were expelled in 1435, but once more obtained possession of the city in 1440, and held it till 1449, when they were driven out by Dunois.

Harlaw, The Battle of (July 24, 1411), was fought between the invading Islesmen, under Donald of the Isles, and the Lowland troops, under the Earl of Mar. Donald was completely defeated. The battle ranks with Carham (1016) in its determining influence on the development of the Scottish nation. Never since it was fought has Teutonic Scotland been in real danger from the Celtic race, to whom it originally owed its being.

Harley, Robert, 1st Earl of Oxford (1661-1724), was the eldest son of Sir Edward Harley, a Puritan who had sat in the Long Parliament, and who declared for William III at the Revolution. Robert Harley began his political career as the Whig member for a Cornish borough (Tregony); but he gradually changed his politics, and adopted Toryism. In 1690 he was appointed one of the arbitrators for uniting the two East India Companies; and in 1696, as leader of the Tories, he proposed the Land Bank scheme as a rival to the Bank of England. Next year he moved that the army should be reduced to what it had been in the year 1680, and when the measure was carried, William was forced to dismiss his Dutch guards. In 1701 he was chosen Speaker of the Commons. In 1704 Marlborough, who had broken with the extreme High Tories, selected him to succeed Nottingham as secretary of state, and in 1706 he was appointed one of the commissioners for the Treaty of Union with Scotland. Finding that the Tories were being gradually ousted from the ministry, he used the influence of his cousin, Mrs. Masham, for the purpose of intriguing against Marlborough. He represented to Anne that Church interests were in danger, and the queen was encouraged to create Dr. Blackall and Sir William Dawes bishops of Exeter and Chester respectively, without consulting her ministers (1707). Marlborough and Godolphin at once determined to break with Harley. It was discovered that one Gregg, a clerk in his office, was in correspondence with France, and this was made a ground for his dismissal. Though the queen was difficult to move, she yielded at last, and Harley resigned his office in 1708. On the sudden fall of the Whigs, however, he became chancellor of the exchequer, and virtually prime minister (1710), with Bolingbroke for his colleague and rival. Harley at once began to negotiate a peace with France, while at the same time he intrigued with the Jacobite court at St. Germain. Guiscard (q.v.), a French refugee, who had frequently been consulted by Marlborough, now offered to betray the British plans to the French, and on the detection of his correspondence he stabbed Harley with a penknife while under examination before the Council. This wounding, and the South Sea Company formed by Harley at this time, made him very popular, and the queen created him Earl of Oxford and lord treasurer (May 1711). Meanwhile the negotiations for peace were being carried on. Marlborough was dismissed from office, and the hostile majority in the Lords was neutralized by the creation of twelve peers. In March 1713 the Peace of Utrecht was signed. But dissensions broke out in the ministry. Bolingbroke wished for a Stuart restoration; Oxford was averse to such an extreme measure. Bolingbroke, in order to get rid of the lord treasurer, introduced the Schism Act, a measure conceived entirely in the High Church spirit. Afraid to offend the Dissenters, Oxford acted with great indecision, and was in consequence dismissed (July 1714). After the accession of George I, he was impeached by the Commons; but the proceedings against him were dropped, as it would have been impossible to substantiate the charges of treason. Enraged at the treatment he had met with, Harley wrote from the Tower, offering his services to the Pretender; but on his release he retired to the country. In 1721 the leadership in Bishop Atterbury's plot (q.v.) was offered him, but he declined it. Three years later he died (May 1724). He was a great lover of literature, and a friend of the leading men of letters of his day—Swift and Pope among the number. His splendid collection of MSS. still forms one of the chief treasures of the British Museum.

Harold I, KING (1035-40), was reported to be the son of Canute, by Elgiva (Ælfgifu) of Northampton, who had been the concubine of Canute before his marriage to Emma. After Canute's death the rival claims of Harold and Hardicanute were eagerly debated, the former being supported by Leofric, the Danish party, and the city of London; the latter by Godwin and the West Saxons, as well as by his mother Emma. The result was that Harold obtained the country to the north of the Thames, and Hardicanute got Wessex, which, during his absence in Denmark, was administered by Godwin and Emma. In 1036 the two sons of Ethelred made an attempt to recover their father's kingdom, but failed; whereupon the younger, Alfred, was taken and put to death by Harold. In 1037, the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" tells us, "they chose Harold over all the kings, and forsook Harthacnut, because he was too long in Denmark." Harold at once banished Emma, who retired to Flanders, but reconciled himself with Godwin and the English party. His reign is not remarkable for anything, and of his own administration absolutely nothing is known. Great corruption, however, appears to have prevailed in the Church under his government. In 1039 Hardicanute, who had joined his mother at Bruges, prepared an expedition against his brother, but before it set sail Harold had died at Oxford, March 17, 1040. He was married, but left no children. He was buried at Westminster, but, by Hardicanute's orders, his body was dug up and thrown into a ditch. Of Harold's character nothing is known. His chief accomplishment would appear to have been swiftness in running, for which he received the sobriquet of "Harefoot."

Harold II, KING (b. c. 1021, s. January 6, 1066; d. October 14, 1066), was the second son of Earl Godwin and Gytha. When still young, he shared in the splendid fortunes of his father, and in 1045 was made earl of the East Angles. Of the early part of his official career no record remains; his public prominence began with the misfortunes of his house. In the struggle of 1051 he led the men of his earldom to Beverstone to his father's support, fell from power, and was outlawed with him; but he and Leofwine, taking a different road from their fellow outlaws, went to Dublin, where they passed the winter. Appearing next year in the Bristol Channel with nine ships, Harold landed at Porlock, slew thirty opposing thanes and many people, ravaged and robbed without stint, and then sailed away to join his father at Portland. In the restoration of the Godwin family that ensued, Harold was reinstated in his former earldom (1052). His successful activity on this occasion, and the death in exile of his elder brother, Sweyn, marked him for special distinction; and in 1053, when his father died, he at once succeeded him as earl of the West Saxons. Henceforward Harold was the foremost figure and the weightiest influence in English politics. Till he became king, almost every important event and action of his own added strength to his position, or increased his reputation. On the death of Siward, in 1055, his brother Tostig became earl of the Northumbrians. In the same year he rescued Hereford and the country round it from the marauding Welsh, under King Gruffyd and the refugee Earl Elfgar of East Anglia, chased the invaders back to Wales, and fortified Hereford. In 1056 Gruffyd was forced to do homage to the Confessor. In 1057, when Earl Elfgar succeeded to his father's Mercian earldom, Harold's brother Gurth was given East Anglia, while the shires of the south-east were grouped into another earldom for Leofwine. In 1058, therefore, Harold was the head of a house whose members divided among them the rule of three-fourths of England. The pious King Edward had practically placed the power of the Crown at Harold's disposal. This power and his own he used to check the spread of Norman influence, and the encroachments of the king's Norman favourites. Nature and fortune now clearly pointed to him as the heir of the almost heirless king. Tall and stalwart, comely and gentle, he drew men's eyes and hearts towards him. He had, moreover, enlarged his mind, and added to his capacity by foreign travel, especially by a journey to Rome. In 1060 he founded the religious house known later as Waltham Abbey. In 1064 he was provoked by the raids of King Gruffyd into a systematic invasion of Wales, in which he overran the country "from dyke to sea," routing the Welsh in every encounter, and slaughtering them without mercy. Eventually Gruffyd was slain by his own subjects, who sent his head to the West Saxon earl. Harold thereupon married his widow, Aldgyth, daughter of Earl Elfgar, and sister to the young Mercian earl Edwin. It was probably in the same year, however, that his position was seriously compromised by an unlucky adventure. Having been shipwrecked on the coast of Ponthieu, he was, after a short captivity, given up by Count Guy to William of Normandy, from whose compulsory hospitality he had to purchase his release by taking an oath to support his host's claim to the English throne. No trace of a belief that this oath was binding can be seen in his subsequent conduct, but it later provided William with a useful weapon against him. In 1065, when the Northumbrians rose against Tostig, a sense of justice or policy made Harold take their part, and gain the king's sanction to the transfer of their earldom to Edwin's brother, Morkere. This proved to be a disastrous step; since it drove Tostig into the arms of Harold's enemies.

On January 5, 1066, Edward the Confessor died. Next day Harold "took," as the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" words it, "to the kingdom," being crowned king by virtue of the election of the witan and the bequest of King Edward. During "the forty weeks and one day" of his reign his vigilance was never once allowed to sleep. His outlawed brother, Tostig, and the rival candidate he had forestalled, were planning and preparing his destruction; and the former, repulsed in one or two attempts on the coast, had allied himself with Harold Hardrada, King of Norway. In September he and his ally made their invasion; and Harold had just time to march to York, meet and destroy them at Stamford Bridge (q.v.), when his more terrible foe, William the Norman, came with a mighty power to challenge his crown. On October 14 the rivals measured their strength at Senlac in Sussex [HASTINGS, BATTLE OF]; and the Englishman, after an unsurpassed display of stubborn valour, was overthrown and slain at six in the evening. His body, mangled by Norman ferocity, is said to have been singled out from the enclosing heap of corpses by a former mistress, Edith "Swan-neck," and buried either on the sea-shore or in the minster at Waltham.

Harold Hardrada (d. 1066), King of Norway, was the son of Sigurd and the half-brother of St. Olaf. In his early years he had served in the emperor's guard at Constantinople and made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He came home and reigned with his nephew, Magnus the Good, becoming sole king after Magnus's death. He had long planned the conquest of England, and was in the Orkneys with a great fleet when Tostig was beaten from the east coast. On his way to the Humber Tostig joined his expedition, and they sailed up the Humber together, and marched on York. Victorious at first at Fulford, they gained possession of York; but Harold proved too strong for them, and the Norwegian force was defeated, and the two leaders slain, at Stamford Bridge (September 25, 1066) (q.v.).

Harrington, JAMES (1611-77), after studying at Trinity College, Cambridge, travelled abroad and entered the service of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia. He subsequently returned to England and entered the household of Charles I. He was, however, a republican, and in 1656 wrote and dedicated to Cromwell a political romance called "Oceana," intended to promote republican principles. With the same view, Harrington formed an association called the "Rota Club." In 1661 he was imprisoned in the Tower, but released on the plea of insanity.

Harrison, THOMAS (1606-60), was a native of Newcastle-under-Lyme. At the opening of the Civil War he entered Essex's body-guard. He was in command of the guard that conveyed the king from Hurst Castle to London; he was also one of the king's judges, and signed his death-warrant. Harrison was commanding on the northern border when the Scots entered England under Charles II. He obstructed their march with great ability, and took part in the battle of Worcester. He had been elected a member of the council of state (1650), but he assisted Cromwell in expelling both council and parliament. In the Barebones' Parliament (q.v.) Harrison was one of the leaders of the advanced party, and an opponent of the dissolution. Cromwell, after vainly trying to conciliate him, deprived him of his commission and relegated him to Staffordshire. Harrison took part in Overton's plot (1654), and was suspected of taking part in Venner's (1657), and other plots, for which he was several times imprisoned. At the Restoration he was condemned to death after a very gallant defence, in which he justified the king's execution. He was beheaded on October 13, 1660.

Harvey, BEAUCHAMP BAGENAL (1762-98), of Bargay Castle, a gentleman of property in county Wexford, was arrested as a rebel in May 1798, and confined, together with Colclough and Grogan, in the city jail. Being sent out to treat with the rebels, after the city had been evacuated by the troops, he was induced to become their leader; but showed such disgust at the massacre of Scullabrogue that he was deposed from his command. When the troops retook the town he concealed himself, together with Colclough, in one of the Saltee Islands, but they were both taken, sentenced to death, and hanged (June 26, 1798).

Hastenbeck, THE BATTLE OF (July 26, 1757), near Hameln, in Hanover, was one of the engagements of the Seven Years' War. The Duke of Cumberland, with a motley army of about 50,000 men, was defeated by the French with 80,000 and compelled to retire on Stade, near the mouth of the Elbe. [KLOSTER-ZEVEN; CUMBERLAND.]

Hastings, THE BATTLE OF (October 14, 1066), is the name usually given to the great combat which took place at Senlac, near Hastings, between the invading Normans, under William the Conqueror, and the English, under Harold. On the news of William's landing in Sussex, Harold held a hurried council at Stamford Bridge, and, after ordering a general muster in London, pressed southwards himself at the head of his housecarls. At London, men flocked in from all southern England; but Mercia and Northumbria, the provinces of Edwin and Morkere, held aloof. Rejecting the advice which his brother Gurth is said to have given him, to stay behind and gather troops for a second battle if the first should issue in defeat, Harold set forth from the city, and pitched his camp on the hill of Senlac (October 13). This hill, according to Wace, he proceeded to fortify with a palisade and a ditch; but earlier authorities speak only of the shield-wall of the English, and the entrenchments appear to have been merely the relics of some earlier fortification. After a night of confession and prayer, the Norman army advanced over the higher ground of Telham to the valley which ran along the foot of Harold's hill. The Norman army was divided into three parts, of which the left wing, consisting of Bretons, Poitevins, etc., was under the direction of Alan of Brittany; the right wing, consisting of the mercenary troops, under Roger Montgomery and William Fitz-Osbern; while in the centre, grouped round the holy banner of the pope, came the Norman men-at-arms and archers, led by the duke himself, mounted on his Spanish horse. Each of these divisions was again subdivided into three groups of archers, infantry, and horsemen respectively, in which order they were to advance to the fight. The English were arrayed in solid formation along the crest of the hill. On the right and left were posted the light-armed levies from the southern shires, armed with club and javelin, or even with forks and stakes; in the centre stood the English housecarls, in their helmets and coats of mail, with shield and javelin and Danish axe. The battle opened, at nine o'clock in the morning, with a shower of arrows from the advanced archers of each Norman division; then the heavy-armed foot came on to the attack; but they could make no impression upon the closely wedged ranks of the English defenders. Finally came the charge of the cavalry, spurred to action by the exhortations and example of the minstrel Taillefer. Their efforts proved, however, equally unavailing. The Bretons, on the left wing, took to flight, and part of the English troops, against Harold's express orders, broke from their ranks in pursuit. A rumour was passed along that William had been slain, and he had to tear his helmet from his head to show them that he was yet living, while, spear in hand, he drove the fugitives back to the fight. The Bretons then took heart again, and overpowered their disorganized pursuers. Despite a partial success here and on the right wing, the English lines still remained unbroken, and the enemy had to retire once more. William, however, had noticed that, firmly as the English fought in close rank behind their fortification, they had fallen an easy prey to the Breton auxiliaries when separated in the ardour of pursuit. He accordingly ordered part of his army to counterfeit a flight; and once more the English swept down from the hill, only to meet with the fate their rashness deserved. The Norman centre made its way, unopposed, up the slope to its left, which was now unprotected by its proper defenders. But still the English held out against charge after charge of the duke's horsemen, till William had recourse to a fresh stratagem. His archers were bidden to shoot up into the air, so that their arrows might come down from above. This had the desired effect. The shields which were required for the protection of the head could no longer shelter the body too; and, to crown all, Harold himself was pierced in the eye by an arrow. Night was now coming on, and though the housecarls fought on till the last man was slain, the light-armed troops, having lost their king, fled away in the darkness, pursued by the Norman horse; and the battle was lost.

Hastings, FRANCIS, 2ND EARL OF HUNTINGDON (1514-61), was employed in 1550 in an expedition for the relief of Calais and Boulogne, with Sir James Crofts. In 1554 he did good service for Mary in the Duke of Suffolk's rebellion, and succeeded in taking that nobleman prisoner. He married Catherine, daughter of Lord Montacute, and granddaughter of Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, and so handed on to his son Henry a remote possibility of inheriting the English crown.

Hastings, FRANCIS RAWDON, 1ST MARQUIS OF HASTINGS (1754-1826), was the son of Sir John Rawdon, afterwards raised to the Irish peerage by the title of Earl of Moira. On leaving Oxford he entered the army as an ensign, and was before very long engaged in the American War. For his services in America he was made an English peer in 1783. In 1793 he succeeded to his father's title, and in 1803 was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland. About the same time he seems to have paid considerable attention to the condition of poor debtors, and the state of Ireland. In 1813 he was appointed to succeed Lord Minto as governor-general of India and commander-in-chief. His first measure of importance was to declare war (1814) against the Gurkhas of Nepal, who had been encroaching on the British territory towards the north of Hindustan. After some initiatory reverses, the British arms were victorious, the Gurkha limits were defined, and the war brought to an end (1816). For this success Lord Moira was made Marquis of Hastings. The attention of the governor-general was next turned to the Mahratta powers, who were supporting the raids of the robber Pindaris. Within a very short period the Peshwa's dominions were practically annexed, the Pindaris destroyed, the Rajput states protected, Sindhia forced to enter upon a new treaty, and the Holkar state compelled to yield up part of its territory and become a subsidiary state under the protection of the British government (1817-18). Lord Hastings had succeeded in establishing the British power more firmly than ever. He was the first governor-general who strongly advocated the education of the natives, in direct contravention of the popular notion that their ignorance contributed to the security of the British rule. Native schools and native journals were established under his rule, and with his approval, though the innovation was strongly opposed by most men of his own generation. In 1820 he turned his attention to the Nizam's dominions, where, though the extinction of the Peshwa had relieved the country from its enormous arrears of tribute, every office was put up to bribe, and ruin was imminent. Charles Metcalfe now was appointed British resident at the court of Hyderabad; and he, discovering that the Palmer Bank was a main source of corruption, and was compromising the British government, owing to Lord Hastings's connexion with one of the partners, took such drastic measures as led to the speedy winding-up of the concern. Shortly after this, Lord Hastings resolved to resign his office. He accordingly left India in 1823, and accepted the government of Malta, where he introduced many reforms. His death occurred in 1826.

Hastings, HENRY, 3RD EARL OF HUNTINGDON (1535-95), was, soon after the accession of Elizabeth, regarded as her possible heir, especially by Cecil and the Protestant party (on account of his descent from Edward IV's brother George, Duke of Clarence). But the plan of recognizing him proved impracticable. He subsequently strongly opposed the contemplated marriage between Mary, Queen of Scots, and the Duke of Norfolk as one which would be fraught with much mischief to the Protestant cause. In the year 1569 he became Mary's jailer at Tutbury, and proved himself the bitter enemy of the Scottish queen and the Catholic party. In 1581 he was sent to levy troops against Lennox, though he was prevented from taking any further steps against the regent by Secretary Randolph. Huntingdon married Lady Catherine Dudley, daughter of John, Duke of Northumberland, and was, therefore, the brother-in-law of the Earl of Leicester.

Hastings, WARREN (1732-1818), the son of a Worcestershire gentleman, went to Bengal in 1750 as a writer in the service of the East India Company. Here he attracted the attention of Clive, and after Plassey was appointed agent to the Nawab of Murshidabad for the East India Company. In 1769 he became a member of the council at Madras, and in 1771 was appointed governor of Bengal. In this capacity he devoted himself to retrenchment and reform. Half the nawab's allowance was cut off; Corah and Allahabad, the old cessions to the Mogul, were resumed on pretence of a quarrel and sold to the Vizir of Oudh for fifty lacs of rupees; the land tax was settled on a new basis which produced more revenue with less oppression; and lastly, in his need for money, British troops were let to the Vizir of Oudh for forty lacs of rupees, in order that that prince might be able to destroy his enemies, the neighbouring tribe of Rohillas, and annex the province of Rohilkhand. In 1773 Lord North's Regulating Act took effect, and Hastings became the first governor-general of India, with powers greatly limited by those of his council, three members of which, headed by Philip Francis, came out full of prejudice against Hastings, who therefore found himself powerless, and in a perpetual minority. Nuncomar, a Brahmin, brought a charge of peculation against him. The rancorous eagerness with which the council took the matter up drove Hastings to desperate measures. Invoking the separate powers confided in the Supreme Court by the Regulating Act, he obtained the arrest of Nuncomar on a charge of forgery (May 1775). Sir Elijah Impey, the lord chief justice, proceeded thereupon to try, condemn, and hang Nuncmar. This bold stroke resulted in the complete triumph of Hastings over his enemies—rendered still more secure by the death of one of the triumvirate in the council, which enabled him to obtain a perpetual majority by means of his casting vote. Once secure in his power he turned his attention to the aggrandizement of the British power in India. Discovering that owing to the quarrels between the other presidencies and the Mahrattas war was inevitable, and that the latter were intriguing with the French, he determined to take the initiative, and crush the half-formed confederacy. The Bombay government embraced the cause of Ragonaut Rao Ragoba, a deposed Peshwa, and plunged into a war with the Mahratta regency, in which they were extremely unsuccessful, owing to bad generalship. Hastings sent Colonel Goddard with the Bengal army to accomplish a dangerous march across India, and in 1779 Goddard overran Gujarat, captured Ahmedabad, and finding Sindhia disposed to delay and evasion, attacked and routed him on April 14, 1780. Hastings, moreover, dispatched another Bengal army to Malwa under Major Popham, who completed the defeat of Sindhia by capturing his almost impregnable fortress of Gwalior (August). Sindhia concluded a treaty with the British, and by his mediation peace was made between Great Britain and the Poona government. In July 1780 Hyder Ali overran the Carnatic and threatened Madras. Hastings immediately suspended Whitwell, the governor of Madras; dispatched all available troops to the Carnatic, gave the command to Sir Eyre Coote, and sent large sums of money. The victories of Coote in 1781 restored the British position. On the news of Hyder's advance in 1780, Hastings demanded troops and £50,000 from Cheyte Singh, Raja of Benares, a tributary of the British. On his delaying, it was raised to £500,000. This being unpaid, Hastings arrested Cheyte Singh, deposed him, and seized all his property (November 1781). But the governor-general, being still in want of money, persuaded Asaf-ud-Dowla, Vizir of Oudh, to assist in robbing his mother and grandmother, the Begums of Oudh. Hastings's internal administration was most successful. He dissolved the double government, and transferred the direction of affairs to the British. He created the public offices and service of Bengal. He organized the revenue for the first time on a definite basis. This, moreover, he effected from mere chaos without any assistance, being on the contrary constantly trammelled by orders from home, and frequently borne down by a majority in council. He remained at the head of affairs till 1785. By the time of his return peace was now restored to India; there was no opposition in the council; there was no European enemy in the Eastern seas. But in the meanwhile the feeling against him on account of some of his acts, and notably those connected with Oudh and the Rohilla War, had been growing very strong at home. At the instance of some of the Whigs, at the head of whom was Burke, he was impeached by the House of Commons. The trial began on February 13, 1788, with Burke, Fox, and Sheridan as the principal managers for the Commons; it dragged for seven years, and in the end Hastings was acquitted (April 23, 1795). The rest of his life was passed peacefully in England. There is no doubt that Hastings was guilty of some of the worst acts imputed to him; but the surpassing greatness of the work he accomplished, in placing the British Empire in India upon a secure basis, might well have been suffered to outweigh his offences.

Hastings, WILLIAM, LORD (d. 1483), was the son of Sir Leonard Hastings, and was a retainer of Richard, Duke of York. He was a favourite of Edward IV, from whom he received considerable grants of land, besides holding the offices of master of the mint, captain of Calais, and lord chamberlain. Though he had supported Richard against the Woodvilles on the death of Edward IV, he was suddenly seized by the Protector's orders while at the council-table, and hurried off to execution on a charge of conspiracy (June 1483). The reason of this sudden execution seems to have been the unwillingness of Hastings to second Richard's nefarious schemes for obtaining the throne. Hastings married Catherine Neville, sister of the Earl of Warwick.

Hatfield, THE COUNCIL OF (September 17, 680), was convened by Archbishop Theodore, under the auspices of the leading Anglian and Saxon kings in Britain. This council devoted itself to declaring the orthodoxy of the English Church as regards the Monothelite heresy and its acceptance of the decrees of the five first general councils and the canons of the Lateran Council of 649. John the Precentor, who had been sent over by Pope Agatho to inquire into the faith of the English Church, was present at this synod, and brought with him Benedict Biscop to instruct the English in the art of church-building; while John himself was commissioned to give instructions in church-singing.

Hatton, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1540–91), is said to have first attracted the notice of Queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing at a ball given by the Inns of Court. He was appointed one of the queen's gentlemen pensioners in 1564, and soon became one of her chief favourites. In 1577 he was appointed vice-chamberlain and a member of the privy council —the queen's partiality for him causing "much envy and some scandal"—whilst he also took a leading position in the House of Commons. In 1581 Hatton vehemently opposed the marriage of the queen with the Duke of Alençon, and afterwards took an active part in the proceedings against the Queen of Scots. He was a commissioner at the trials of Babington and the other conspirators, and was engaged in the examination of Curle and Nau, Mary Stuart's secretaries. He subsequently incurred the queen's anger for having urged on the dispatch of the execution warrant, but was quickly restored to favour, and in April 1587 succeeded Sir Thomas Bromley as lord chancellor, much to the surprise and anger of the bar, many of whose members resolved not to practise before him. Hatton, however, filled his trying post with credit; delivered his judgments with caution and never decided difficult cases unadvised. In 1591 he lost the queen's regard, and died, it is said, of a broken heart caused by Elizabeth's conduct in instituting a suit against him to recover arrears of tithes and first-fruits.

Biography by Sir H. Nicholas, 1847.

Havelock, SIR HENRY (1795–1857), entered the army in 1815, and in 1823 embarked for Bengal. Next year he went through the first Burmese War, earning considerable distinction for courage and energy. In 1838 he was promoted to a captaincy, and was shortly afterwards sent with his regiment to form part of the force intended to replace Shah Shuja on the throne of Kabul. After the occupation of Kabul, Havelock, with a portion of the army, retired to India, but was shortly recalled at the news of the Kabul massacre. He aided in the defence of Jalalabad against Akbar Khan (1842), and marched with the army to occupy Kabul for the second time, and revenge the British disasters. He took part in the Gwalior campaign (1843), and was present at the battles of Mudki, Ferozeshah, Aliwal, and Sobraon (q.v.). He took no part in the second Sikh War, being employed at Bombay. After a short interval spent in England he received the command of a division under Outram, for the Persian War of 1857. When the Indian Mutiny broke out Havelock advanced upon Cawnpore, and defeated Nana Sahib outside the town. He then made his way for Lucknow, but finding his forces too weak to relieve this place, was forced to return to Cawnpore. He was joined in September by Sir James Outram, and the two together succeeded in relieving Lucknow. Two months had hardly passed before Sir Henry Havelock died of dysentery (November 24, 1857).

Hawke, EDWARD, LORD (1705–81), entered the navy in 1719 and became a captain in 1734. He distinguished himself in an engagement with the French fleet off Toulon in 1744, and became rear-admiral in 1747. He defeated the French fleet off Belle Isle, and at the end of the year was returned to parliament for Portsmouth. In 1748 he became vice-admiral. He served in Nova Scotia (1749), and became commander of Portsmouth (1750). In 1755, though war had not yet been declared, he was directed to attack French ships of war. In 1757, on the loss of Minorca, he took command of the Mediterranean fleet, was at the head of the blockading squadron in the Bay of Biscay (1758), and in the following year defeated the French under Marshal Conflans, in Quiberon Bay. In 1765 he became vice-admiral of Great Britain and in 1766 first lord of the admiralty, and ten years later was raised to the peerage.

Hawkins, SIR JOHN (1532–95), one of the most enterprising seamen of Queen Elizabeth's reign, passed most of his youth in making voyages in the interests of commerce. He has incurred the odium of having been the first to establish a trade in slaves (1562), whom he bought in Guinea and sold in Hispaniola (1562–4); on several occasions coming into collision with the Spaniards. In 1573 he was made treasurer of the navy, and, after having been nearly murdered by Peter Burchett in mistake for Sir Christopher Hatton, was appointed admiral of the Victory at the time of the Spanish Armada; commanding that part of the fleet which was stationed between the Land's End and the Scilly Islands. For his able and energetic conduct at this crisis he was knighted and received the thanks of the queen. In 1590 he made another expedition to the Spanish Main in conjunction with Sir Martin Frobisher, and five years later sailed for the West Indies with Sir Francis Drake, but died before anything had been accomplished.

Haxey, THOMAS, a canon of Southwell, presented a bill of complaint in the parliament of 1397, on the condition of the king's household. When it was brought under the notice of Richard II, the king was extremely indignant, and demanded the name of its author from the parliament. Thomas Haxey was pointed out as the offender, and adjudged to die as a traitor. He was, however, saved by the prompt action of Archbishop Arundel, who claimed him as a clergyman. Shortly afterwards he was pardoned. He became treasurer of York Minster in 1418. This case illustrates the fact that, in the fourteenth century, freedom of debate in parliament was far from established. It has been suggested that Haxey sat as a clerical proctor, but there is no evidence that he was actually a member of the parliament of 1397. He was, in point of fact, a clerk of chancery; and this probably explains the king's animosity against him.

Hay, FRANCIS, 9TH EARL OF ERROL (d. 1631), was constable of Scotland, and one of the signatories of the "Spanish Blanks" (q.v.). He was converted to the Romish Church by a Jesuit relative named Father Edmund Hay, but in 1597 found it to his interest to return to the Protestant party, and to obtain the revocation of his forfeiture.

Hay, JOHN, titular EARL OF INVERNESS (1691-1740), was a favourite of James Edward, the Old Pretender. In 1724 he became secretary of state and in 1725 Earl of Inverness. Together with his brother, Lord Kinnoul, and his brother-in-law, James Murray, he ruled the prince's councils. He was, according to Lockhart of Carnwath, "a cunning, false, avaricious creature, of very ordinary parts, cultivated by no sort of literature, and altogether void of experience in business; with insolence prevailing often over his little stock of prudence." Soon after he and his brother had been admitted to direct James's conduct, the Pretender's wife left her husband when he refused to dismiss his favourites. On her return, both the brothers went into exile at Avignon.

Hay, LUCY, COUNTESS OF CARLISLE (1599-1660), was the daughter of Henry Percy, 9th Earl of Northumberland. In 1617 she was married to the Earl of Carlisle, who died in 1636. She was a favourite attendant of Queen Henrietta Maria, and is supposed to have been Strafford's mistress. After his death she became the confidante, and it was said the mistress, of Pym, to whom she betrayed all the secrets of the court, and it was by her that he was made acquainted with the king's desire to arrest the Five Members (q.v.) in January 1642. In 1648 she seems to have assisted the Royalists with money towards raising a fleet to attack England, and on the Restoration she was received at court, and employed herself in intriguing for the return of Queen Henrietta to England, which was opposed by Clarendon and others. Very soon after the queen's return she died suddenly.

Head, SIR FRANCIS BOND (1793-1875), was appointed governor of Upper Canada in 1835. He was a man of great ability, and eminently successful in dealing with the national party, which was at that time clamouring for reform. Though possessed of much caution, and careful to follow out his instructions from home, he was powerless to avert the insurrection which broke out in Upper Canada at the end of 1837. By his prompt measures, however, he prevented its gaining any considerable ground. In 1838 he retired from his office, owing to a disagreement with Lord Glenelg, the colonial minister.

Head-borough (HEAD-PLEDGE), THE, signified the chief man of the frankpledge (q.v.). This officer was also known by the name of borough-head, tithing-man, etc., according to the local custom. This head-borough was the chief of the pledges; the other nine who were with him and made up the group were called hand-boroughs. The duties of the head-borough are defined in one of the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor. If any member of the frankpledge had done an injustice to anyone else, and had fled away to escape punishment, the head-borough at the end of twenty-one days had to appear before the justice with two other members of his frankpledge and six neighbours, and exculpate the body of which he was the head from all complicity in the original wrong and the flight of the evil-doer.

Health, MINISTRY OF, was established by statute in 1919, to concentrate the health services of England under a single responsible minister. A Scottish Board of Health, under the secretary of Scotland, was set up separately. The powers of the ministry comprise those of the local government board and of the English and Welsh insurance commissioners, together with some of the powers of the home office, privy council, and board of education. Its activities are concerned with public health, housing and town-planning, local administration and taxation, administration of the Poor Law and Pensions Acts, and National Health Insurance. The functions of the Board of Health in Scotland are precisely similar.

Hearth Money was an unpopular tax of two shillings on every hearth "in all houses paying to Church and poor." It was first imposed by parliament, 1662, and abolished in 1689. It brought in about £170,000 a year. Under the name of "Chimney Money" it dates, as a tax paid by custom, from the Norman Conquest.

Hearts of Steel, THE, was an organization formed in 1772 among the Protestant tenants of Tyrone and Antrim. The landlords had been largely increasing the rents of their tenants, and had taken up with cattle-farming on their own account, with the result that Protestants were replaced by Catholics. The tenants not only sent a petition to parliament and to the lord lieutenant, but they also showed their hostility to the intruders by destroying their cattle and burning their houses. An act was passed against them, and troops sent to the north. On the appearance of the latter the movement collapsed, but was followed by increased emigration.

Health, NICHOLAS (1501-78), Archbishop of York and lord chancellor, was originally chaplain to Cardinal Wolsey, and obtained the favour of Henry VIII, who appointed him successively to the sees of Rochester (1539) and Worcester (1543). In 1551, owing to his opposition to the Reformation, he was deposed from his see, but was reinstated on the accession of Mary, and shortly afterwards made Archbishop of York. At the end of 1556 he succeeded Sir Nicholas Hare as lord chancellor, and speedily proved his utter incompetence as a judge. On the accession of Elizabeth, Heath was deprived of the great seal, and on perceiving that the queen intended to re-establish the Protestant religion, he declined to assist at her coronation. He shortly afterwards refused to take the oath of supremacy and was deprived of his archbishopric, spending the rest of his days in "study and devotion."

Heathfield, THE BATTLE OF (633), fought between Penda of Mercia and Edwin of Northumbria, resulted in the defeat and death of the latter. The place is probably to be identified with Hatfield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Hebrides, THE, were known to Ptolemy under the name of the Ebudæ. The Scandinavians called them Sudrey-jar or Southern Islands, in contradistinction to the Northern Islands of Scotland—the Orkneys and the Shetlands. Towards the very end of the eighth century the islands became subject to the incursions of the Vikings. Previous to this period they were probably inhabited by Celtic tribes, differing but little from those upon the mainland of Scotland; though Rhys adduced evidence to show that these tribes, as well as the Picts, may have been largely tintured with the blood of an earlier and not improbably a non-Aryan race. In the ninth century the Hebrides were colonized by bands of Norwegian settlers, fleeing from their native country before the growing power of Harold Harfagr. When, however, these exiles began to send expeditions against their old home, Harold fitted out a great fleet and reduced the islands to obedience; from which time the Hebrides, as well as the Orkney and Shetland Isles, were for a considerable period subject to Norwegian rule, though they were probably to be regarded rather as the haunt of stray Vikings than as subject to any distinct ruler. About the year 989 Sigurd, jarl of Orkney, seems to have made good his claim on these islands against that of the Danish king of the isles, who appears to have been connected with the Danes of Limerick and Dublin. But even Sigurd must have held his rule subject to the King of Norway. By the middle of the eleventh century the Danes of Dublin and Limerick had seized upon Man, and began to contest the Hebrides with the Norwegian Earls of Orkney. When Duncan was murdered or slain in battle (1040), the Hebrides formed part of the dominions of Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney. Soon after his death (1057?), however, these islands fell into the power of an Irish King of Leinster. When Godred, whom the Irish historians call King of the Dublin Danes, conquered the Isle of Man (1075?) he does not seem to have been long in extending his authority over the Hebrides also. He appears to have died about 1095, and three years later the lands he had acquired were seized by Magnus Barefoot, King of Norway (1098), to whom in 1102 the Scottish King Edgar relinquished the Western Isles entirely. Magnus's son Sigurd, whom he had left as his ruler in the isles, quitted his new principality for his native land, and the Norse colony then broke up into separate states. Ultimately, however, Godred Crovan's son Olaf succeeded about 1103 in establishing himself in the Hebrides. But it now appears that the native Celtic or pre-Celtic race, which had, perhaps, been driven to the more inaccessible parts of the islands, were preparing to assert themselves against the Norse strangers. They were led by Somerled, regulus of Argyll. Somerled pretended to be fighting on behalf of his son and Olaf's nephew against his brother-in-law; but in 1156 the isles were divided into two halves, of which the southern half seems to have been practically in the hands of Somerled, who held it subject to the King of Norway. From this time there were two sovereigns bearing the title of "King of the Isles." In the first half of the thirteenth century Alexander II demanded the restoration of the Hebrides from Hakon, King of Norway, on the ground that Magnus Barefoot had stolen them from the Scottish crown. On being refused he was preparing to avail himself of a disputed succession, when he died suddenly in 1249. When Alexander III grew to manhood he began to contemplate the subjection of these islands. Hakon, hearing the complaints of his subject kings, and coming to their relief, was utterly defeated at the battle of Largs (1263). His son Magnus ceded the disputed territories to the Scottish king, in return for a payment of 4,000 marks down, and a pension of 100 marks a year (1266)—a bargain which was clinched by the marriage of Alexander's daughter Margaret to Eric of Norway in 1281. The Archbishop of Trondhjem still preserved his metropolitical rights over the Sudreys and Man, rights which he seems to have retained till at least the year 1400. The rule of the islands remained in the hands of the descendants of Somerled, and towards the end of the fourteenth century John Macdonald of Islay adopted the style of Lord of the Isles. His descendants remained a thorn in the side of the Scottish kings until their subjugation was completed by James V. [ISLES, LORDS OF THE; SUDREYS.]

Hedgeley Moor, THE BATTLE OF (April 25, 1464), was fought during the Wars of the Roses, between the Lancastrian remnants and the Yorkists under Lord Montagu. It marked the last desperate rally of the Lancastrian party after its defeat at Towton, but it was unsuccessful. Sir Ralph Percy, the Lancastrian leader, was defeated and slain, and the destruction of his party was completed a few weeks later at Hexham (q.v.). Hedgeley Moor is near Wooler in Northumberland.

Heligoland, an island in the North Sea, was taken by Great Britain from Denmark in 1807 and held till 1890, being formally ceded in 1814. During the Napoleonic Wars the island was of great importance to British commerce, as a station whence British goods could be smuggled into continental ports closed by the Berlin and Milan decrees. In 1890 it was ceded to Germany in exchange for territories in East Africa, and attached to Schleswig-Holstein. By article 115 of the Treaty of Versailles (1919) the island was demilitarized and its forts dismantled, German sovereignty, however, remaining.

Heligoland Bight, THE BATTLE OF THE (August 28, 1914), was fought between a British naval force (19 cruisers, 37 destroyers, and 6 submarines) under Vice-Admiral Beatty and other commanders, and a German naval force (22 cruisers, 20 destroyers, 8 submarines, and 11 torpedo-boats) under Admiral von Ingenohl. The engagement opened at 4.45 a.m., but the main action did not begin till after 11 a.m., when Beatty entered the Bight with the first battle-cruiser squadron. Both sides were hampered throughout by mist. The importance of the battle, besides the sinking of four German vessels which it involved, is that it confirmed the Kaiser's decision to pursue a purely defensive naval policy.

Henderson, ALEXANDER (1583-1646), was one of the leaders of the Presbyterian party in Scotland in the seventeenth century. He drew up the demands of the Covenanters in 1638, in which year he was moderator of the Glasgow assembly. He was one of the Scots commissioners at the Pacification of Berwick (q.v.), the Treaty of Ripon (1640) (q.v.), and the Treaty of Uxbridge of 1645 (q.v.). He died, it is said, of remorse at having opposed the king, "regretting the excess to which affairs were carried."

Hengest was, according to tradition, one of the two leaders of the first band of Teutonic invaders to settle in Britain. Our earliest authority, Gildas, does not mention the names of any of the Saxon invaders, and Bæda only says, "the two first commanders are said to have been Hengest and Horsa." But, on the other hand, Nennius and the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" distinctly mention these two brothers as the chiefs of the Teutonic invaders who came to the aid of Vortigern, and they are represented as being the sons of one Wihtgils, who was a great-grandson of Woden. Dismissing all the later legends which accumulated around Hengest's name, the following is a very brief sketch of what we are told of him. Together with his brother, Horsa (q.v.), he came to Britain, probably (though the chronology is very uncertain) about the year 450. It is possible they may have been exiled, as Nennius tells us, from Germany, or may have been actually invited over by Vortigern. At all events, they landed at Ebbsfleet, and agreed to assist the British king against the Picts. In these wars they were invariably successful, and as a reward obtained the Isle of Thanet. But shortly afterwards we find them turning their arms against Vortigern. They were defeated at Aylesford (q.v.), in which battle Horsa was slain. But the tide soon turned. After numerous victories, Hengest and his son, Æsc, conquered the whole of Kent; fresh swarms of Teutons arrived; and the Britons were entirely driven out of the south-east corner of the island. Such is the story of the conquest of Kent as it has been handed down to us; but it is impossible to say how much or how little authority is to be attached to details which cannot well have been preserved in writing at the time of their occurrence. The conquerors of Kent were of Jutish origin.

Hengest Down, or HINGSTON DOWN (HENGESTEDUN), is situated on the west or Cornish side of the Tamar, not far from Plymouth. Here, in 838, Ecgbert totally defeated the combined forces of the Danes and the West Welsh.

Hengham, RALPH DE (d. 1311), after filling several minor judicial offices, was made chief justice of the King's Bench in 1274. In 1289 he was removed, together with most of the other judges, on a charge of false judgment, and heavily fined. He subsequently regained the royal favour, and became chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1301, but was degraded by Edward II to the post of puisne judge of the court. He compiled a register of writs and was the author of two manuals of practice, known respectively as "Hengham Magna" and "Hengham Parva." They were edited by Selden in 1616.

Henrietta, DUCHESS OF ORLEANS (1644-70), daughter of Charles I, was born at Exeter, whither her mother had retired during the Civil War. In 1646 she was taken in disguise to France, where she lived with her mother till, at the Restoration, she was enabled to return to England. In 1661 she was married to the Duke of Orleans, only brother of Louis XIV, by whom she had three children. She was employed in 1670 by the French court in negotiating the Treaty of Dover with England, but very soon after her return to France she died suddenly. Rumour ascribed her death to the effects of poison administered by her jealous husband.

Henrietta Maria, QUEEN (1609-69), wife of Charles I, was the youngest daughter of Henry IV of France and Marie de' Medici. After the failure of the Spanish match, both James I and Buckingham were very anxious that Charles should ally himself with Henrietta, and for this purpose negotiations were opened in 1624. The marriage took place in 1625, and by the marriage treaty Charles agreed to suspend the penal laws against the Catholics, and allow the queen the free exercise of her religion. But it soon became evident that Henrietta was a tool in the hands of the Catholics, who thronged around her, and not only compelled her to refuse to be crowned with her husband in Westminster Abbey, but on one occasion at least forced her to take part in a pilgrimage to Tyburn, where the Roman Catholic "martyrs" had been executed. At last Charles, exasperated by this conduct, drove her Roman Catholic attendants from England. As long as Buckingham lived the queen took very little part in public affairs, but after his death (1628) she exercised a great influence over Charles, who could hardly have had a worse adviser than a frivolous, passionate woman, fond of power, but careless of the use she made of it. Though Strafford's refusal to grant places in Ireland to her nominees made him little acceptable to her, she used her influence to prevent his condemnation, but subsequently, being frightened by the outcries of the people, and fearing for her own and her husband's safety, she entreated Charles to assent to the attainder. It was partly owing to her advice that the king made the foolish attempt to arrest the Five Members in 1642, and soon after this, when civil war was inevitable, the queen escaped from England, taking with her the crown jewels for the purpose of purchasing arms for her husband. She returned to England in 1643, and narrowly escaped being taken prisoner by the Parliament. Eventually she joined her husband, and subsequently proceeded to the West of England, whence in 1644 she escaped to France. In 1643 she was impeached by Pym for the help she had given her husband, but after the impeachment had been unanimously voted by the Commons, and sent up to the Lords, no more was heard of it. Queen Henrietta remained in France till the Restoration, being frequently in great poverty. She made strenuous efforts to convert her children to Roman Catholicism, and succeeded in the case of her youngest daughter Henrietta; but the young Henry, Duke of Gloucester, resolutely withstood all her endeavours. On the Restoration she returned to England, and Somerset House was granted as her residence. Fearing the plague of 1665, she returned to France, where she remained till her death. While in France she was supposed to have married Henry Jermyn, afterwards Earl of St. Albans, but there is not sufficient evidence for this assertion, and at all events the marriage was never acknowledged.

Henry I, KING (b. 1068, s. August 3, 1100, d. December 1, 1135), was the youngest son of William the Conqueror. His education must have been carefully attended to, and he seems to have been, to some extent at least, familiar with Latin. He was dubbed knight by his father and Lanfranc at Whitsuntide, 1086. Next year, on his death-bed, the Conqueror left his youngest son five thousand pounds of silver, prophesying at the same time, according to the chronicles of the next century, that he would succeed his brothers in their dominions. With his father's bequest Henry bought the Cotentin and Avranchin from his brother Robert, and is found later assisting Robert against William and the revolted city of Rouen (1090). In 1091, when peace was restored between Robert and William by the Treaty of Caen, the two brothers, not content with having taken away Henry's right of succession, made war against him for the purpose of stripping him of his lands. Driven from St. Michael's Mount, Henry accepted the lordship of Domfront in 1092. Almost immediately after this, he was reconciled to William and won back part of his old possessions from Robert. On the day of William's death Henry also was hunting in the New Forest; and on hearing the news, he at once hastened to Winchester to seize the treasure and to put forward his claims to the crown. After some discussion, in which several members of the council maintained the rights of the absent Robert, Henry was elected king, chiefly, we are told, by the influence of the Earl of Warwick. Two days later he was crowned at Westminster, and swore to abolish the wrongs from which the country had suffered under his brother's rule, to maintain peace, repress disorders, and deal justice with mercy. Henry immediately issued a charter, promising to maintain the privileges of the Church, the vassals, and the nation. As an earnest of his intention to observe these pledges, he imprisoned Flambard, the chief instrument of his brother's tyranny, and invited Anselm, the object of his brother's hate, to return to England. Before the year was out Anselm had come back and married the new king to Edith, the daughter of Malcolm Canmore and niece of Edgar Atheling. Meanwhile Robert had returned from the Holy Land, and began to claim the crown according to the terms of the Treaty of Caen. The great Norman nobles were not unwilling to assist him in his pretensions. Robert of Belesme, Ivo of Grantmesnil, and many other Norman barons would have preferred the lax indolence of the elder to the stern justice of the younger brother; while Henry laid his chief trust in the influence of Anselm and the fidelity of the English. When the two armies met near Winchester, the great barons on both sides, seeing that, whoever should conquer, their position in the land would be rendered insecure, prevailed on the two brothers to make peace. Henry was released from his oath of fealty to Robert and was acknowledged King of England; but on his part promised to pay Robert a pension of £3,000 and to restore the Cotentin (1101). Three years later the quarrel broke out again and was once more appeased without bloodshed; but in 1106 Henry crossed over to Normandy, defeated his brother at the battle of Tenchebrai and entered upon the possession of his duchy. Robert was imprisoned till his death in 1134.

Meanwhile, Henry had been occupied in restoring order and good government in England. The great Norman lords who had sided with Robert—the Malets, the Lacys, the Grantmesnils, and Belesmes—lost their castles and were imprisoned or forced to relinquish their English estates; but as a rule were left in possession of their Norman ones, though even across the water their castles were garrisoned by the king. In all these instances, after each rebellion, whether of 1101, 1104, 1118, or 1123, Henry's great object was to restrain the independence and extortion of the barons. Not content with forfeiting the English estates of the great families of the Conquest, Henry put into full working order a strong administrative body—consisting for the most part of new men advanced by him because of their capacities for doing his work—to form a counterpoise to the older barons. These men, who owed their whole position to the Crown, were employed by the king to make circuits round the country, not only for the purpose of assessing and collecting taxes, but also for that of redressing abuses. In this way he set the example, which his grandson was to improve upon and enlarge, of enforcing the royal authority everywhere, and bringing the royal justice within the reach of all people who suffered from the extortion, the cruelty, or false justice of the local and baronial courts. Though the main interest of Henry I's reign lies in the orderly increase of the Norman system of centralization, yet it was by no means devoid of political or dramatic incident. In 1102 Robert de Belesme, the cruel and tyrannical Earl of Shrewsbury, and the son of William the Conqueror's great friend, Montgomery, was besieged in his castle of Bridgnorth. The English were only too glad to aid in Robert of Belesme's downfall, and called on the king to rejoice that he became a free man from the day when he banished Robert of Belesme (1102). The captive Duke Robert had a young son, William; Louis VI of France and Fulk, Count of Anjou, were induced to espouse the boy's cause. The former promised to invest him with Normandy; the latter to give him his daughter, Sibylla, in marriage. Meanwhile, Fulk, supported by his suzerain, Louis, laid claim to Maine, in opposition to the pretensions of Henry: and peace was only re-established between the claimants (1113) at the expense of William, who now found a refuge with Baldwin of Flanders. Once more, after five years' quiet, a coalition was formed on behalf of the young prince, and once more Louis and Fulk espoused his cause. But this effort was fruitless too. At the battle of Brenneville (1119) the victory lay with Henry, and before long Calixtus II reconciled the two kings. In 1120 the English king lost his only son, William, in the White Ship. Three years later he was threatened with another coalition, for Fulk of Anjou had once more espoused the cause of William. Fitz-Robert and several of the greatest barons in Normandy had promised assistance. But Henry was too quick for his enemies, and landing in Normandy he soon reduced the castles of the insurgent barons (1123-4). A few years later Louis gave his sister-in-law, Adeliza, in marriage to the young prince, granting him at the same time the Vexin and other districts on the borders of Normandy, and also investing him with the county of Flanders (1127). The newly-made count, however, was slain next year while endeavouring to make good his claims. With the rebellion of 1124 Henry's home troubles seem to have ceased, and the rest of his reign was occupied with the extension of his authority and the attempts to secure the fidelity of his barons to his daughter, Matilda, and her infant son, Henry. This lady had in 1114 married the Emperor Henry V, but having lost her husband before many years were past, was then contracted to Geoffrey of Anjou, the father of Henry II. In 1126, 1131, and 1133 the whole council of the kingdom were sworn to maintain her rights or those of herself and her little son (Henry II, born 1133).

It remains to say a few words on the ecclesiastical history of this reign. It was largely with the assistance of Anselm (q.v.) that Henry I had been enabled to secure the crown, and by mutual consent the question of investitures was for the moment waived. But when the immediate danger was over, Anselm was summoned to do homage and consecrate the bishops whom the king had invested. After the Synod of Westminster, Anselm left England once more (1103), and only returned in 1106, after having come to a compromise with Henry on the disputed points. Before the close of the reign two new bishoprics were created—those of Ely (1109) and Carlisle (1133), and, in 1128, the new order of the Cistercians (q.v.), the founding of which an Englishman, Stephen Harding, played an important rôle, planted their first colony at Waverley in Surrey. Henry's reign was also signalized by the practical completion of the conquest of South Wales by a series of Norman adventurers, who established for themselves feudal lordships within its limits, driving the Welsh to the hills, or subjecting them to their sway. In some places, as in southern Pembrokeshire, colonies of Fleming or English settlers were planted, and the Welsh absolutely driven out. Henry also managed to secure the nomination of the South Welsh bishops. Their consecration by the Archbishop of Canterbury completed the ecclesiastical subordination of South Wales to the English metropolitan.

Henry II, KING (b. March 1133, s. October 25, 1154; d. July 6, 1189), was born at Le Mans, and was the son of Geoffrey, Count of Anjou, and Matilda, daughter of Henry I and widow of the Emperor Henry V. He was still an infant when brought over to England in 1141 and placed in charge of his uncle, Robert of Gloucester. He afterwards went to Scotland, and was knighted by King David, in 1149. In 1151 Louis VII conferred Normandy on him, and in the same year he succeeded to Anjou, while, in 1152, his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine gave him a large and rich territory in the south of France. Master of such resources, his expedition to England in 1153 could not but be successful. The Treaty of Wallingford (q.v.) gave him the succession after Stephen's death. Within a year his rival died, and Henry's succession was secured without disturbance. He was crowned December 19, 1154. The long and important reign of Henry has been divided by Stubbs into four epochs—from his accession to the Becket quarrel (1154-64); the period of his strife with the archbishop (1164-70); from Becket's death to the death of the younger Henry in 1183; and thence to Henry's own death in 1189. The first period of the reign was mainly devoted to his work of restoration. Henry found the great administrative system of his grandfather thoroughly annihilated during the anarchy of Stephen's reign. "Adulterine" castles were thickly spread over the whole land. Peace and order there were none. The revenue had declined from £60,000 to £20,000 a year. With the help of the surviving members of the family of Roger of Salisbury, and of Archbishop Theobald, Becket the chancellor, and the Earl of Leicester, Henry succeeded, through tact, energy, and perseverance, in a thorough restoration of the "avitæ consuetudines"—the system of government in the State which Henry I had left behind him. The feudalists were disarmed, good government restored, the coinage reformed, the War of Toulouse successfully carried out. The whole ten years are years of prosperity and orderly progress.

In 1162 Becket (q.v.) succeeded Archbishop

Theobald at Canterbury, and Henry soon found that his old minister was thoroughly resolved to oppose his design to subject Church as well as State to the supremacy of the law. An attempt to compel an acknowledgment, merely, of the royal jurisdiction on the part of criminous clerks precipitated a conflict already imminent. In 1164 the Constitutions of Clarendon (q.v.) were presented to the archbishop for acceptance. Becket's reluctant acquiescence was soon withdrawn. Henry called his archbishop to account for his chancellorship, and after a stormy council at Northampton the archbishop withdrew beyond the seas, and the king took possession of his temporalities. For some years an active warfare was carried on between king and archbishop, which nothing but the tact of Henry's ministers prevented from being confused with the great struggle of Frederick Barbarossa and Alexander III, of which it was the English counterpart. When in 1170 a hollow reconciliation was effected, Becket returned only to meet his death at the hands of indiscreet partisans of the king. It is most remarkable evidence of Henry's versatility and energy that the period of the Becket struggle was the period of his greatest constructive reforms, of the establishment of the new judicial system by the Assize of Clarendon (1166-q.v.), and of the successful conquest of Brittany.

The death of Becket brought Henry's ecclesiastical troubles to a crisis. The coronation of his eldest son, Henry, had conciliated neither his family nor the baronage. Henry hurried away to Ireland to escape from his difficulties, and to receive the homage of the Norman nobles, who had within the last few years appropriated a large part of the island. On his return, the pope's need of English aid made his reconciliation with the Church at Avranches an easy matter (1172). But the great feudal revolt of 1173-4, which simultaneously broke out in England and on the continent, and was actively favoured by the kings of France and Scotland, the Count of Flanders, and Henry's own sons, may have been an indirect consequence of the Becket quarrel. After a hard struggle Henry gained the day. The last of the feudal risings was suppressed, and the monarch, strong in national support and in his system of government, was henceforth able to devote his best energies to administrative and judicial reconstruction. The Assize of Northampton (1176), the Assize of Arms (1181), the Assize of the Forest (1184), were the great legislative acts of this period. No less important were Henry's fertile schemes for the perfection of the judicial system, his strong and firm government, his good peace and prosperity.

But Henry's own sons were now his worst enemies. He had done his best for them. He had crowned Henry, secured Brittany to Geoffrey, Aquitaine for Richard, and proposed to give Ireland to John. But the malign influence of their mother and Louis VII drove their turbulent and thankless spirits into a series of risings that embittered Henry's last years. In 1183 the younger Henry died. The death of the young king did not check the rebellious attempts of Henry's remaining sons. Their persistent hostility seriously checked the course of home reforms, and even the preparations for the Crusade. Philip Augustus was as rancorous an enemy to Henry as Louis VII had been, and his alliance with the king's sons seriously diminished the power and prestige of Henry in Europe. In the midst of failure and desertion the old king died.

Henry II's reign was a "period of amalgamation." The Norman central and monarchical system, and the old English local and popular system, hitherto existing side by side, were connected by Henry and combined into a single whole, out of which, a generation later, the English constitution began to develop. His bureaucratic system dealt a death-blow to feudalism, and even set definite limits to the power of the Church. A thorough despot and cosmopolitan, he established that alliance of king and people which produced the national English monarchy. The conqueror of Ireland and Scotland, Henry revived that empire over all Britain to which the great Anglo-Saxon kings had aspired. The ruler of a third of the modern France, he began that policy of constant warfare with his nominal overlord which coloured the whole mediæval history of England. His great continental position rendered Henry the first of European sovereigns. His friendly relations with the Empire, Spain, and Flanders began the close connexion with England's three traditional mediæval allies. A man who could do all this was of no ordinary character. Strong, persistent, far-seeing, and hard-working, he was at once a great statesman, legislator, administrator, warrior, and diplomatist. But he was unscrupulous, passionate and revengeful—hard and cruel upon occasion—and his domestic difficulties perceptibly changed his character for the worse towards the end of his reign. Yet with all his defects he did good work for England. The excellence of the results must excuse the selfishness of his aims.

The best original authorities are Gervase of Canterbury, Benedict of Peterborough, and Roger of Hoveden (Rolls Series), William of Newborough (English Historical Society), and Ralph Niger. The copious works of Giraldus Cambrensis, edited in the Rolls Series by Brewer and Dimock, are useful though not always trustworthy; especially so are the "Expugnatio Hiberniæ" and "Itinerarium Cambriæ." Dr. Stubbs's works are authoritative for the reign of Henry II, both his "Constitutional History" and his exhaustive "Preface" to the editions of Benedict of Peterborough and Roger of Hoveden in the Rolls Series. Lyttelton's "Life of Henry II." though old-fashioned, is still useful. Later biographies are those of Mrs. J. R. Green, 1903, and L. F. Salzman, 1917. Henry III, KING (b. October 1, 1207, s. October 19, 1216, d. November 16, 1272), was the son of John, and Isabella of Angoulême. His long reign falls into three epochs—the period of the regency, the twenty years (1232-52) of misrule, either under some foreign and unpopular minister or the king in person, and the last twenty years of the baronial struggle. The tyranny of King John had alienated every class of his subjects, and the barons who had won Magna Carta had called in Louis of France. But the wisdom of the Regent Pembroke, the strong support which the Roman Church gave to its infant vassal, and the acceptance by Church and Crown alike of the Great Charter, ultimately resulted in the expulsion of the foreigners, and in the suppression of a feudal survival that had threatened to prove serious. Pembroke died in 1219. Archbishop Langton (q.v.) got rid of the tyranny of the papal legates in 1221. In the same year William of Aumâle, the feudal champion, and in 1224 Falkes de Breauté (q.v.), the representative of John's foreign mercenaries, were subdued. In the year 1227 Hubert de Burgh (q.v.) got rid of the Poitevin bishop of Winchester. Even the baronial opposition were national in their aims. There were thus not wanting signs of the development of English constitutionalism. In 1232 Henry dismissed de Burgh, and became his own minister. But his weak and shiftless character, his incapacity for constant application, his delight in mere external splendour, his talk of a settled policy, his attachment to his family, all led him to lean on some stronger support than himself. Peter des Roches (q.v.), recalled in 1232, was indeed dismissed in 1234; but in 1236 Henry's marriage with Eleanor of Provence brought a swarm of her worthless kinsmen and dependents into England. Foreign fashions spread widely; foreigners administered Church and State. The English language, which had kept itself comparatively free of French words up to this period, was now inundated with them. No doubt an increased connexion with the continent had its good points; but its effects on government were altogether bad. A strong aristocratic opposition to Henry was now established. In 1242 the barons refused to grant an aid for the war in Poitou. In 1244 barons and clergy protested against the royal misgovernment. But in 1246 the Count of La Marche and his sons, Henry's half-brothers, came into England. The pope exacted tax after tax from the clergy. Among churchmen the resistance of Grosseteste was almost single-handed. The nobles were equally disorganized. Without leaders, the people were powerless to withstand the wretched government of the foreign favourites.

At last, in 1252, a leader arose. Simon de Montfort (q.v.), a Frenchman, who had acquired the earldom of Leicester, and whose marriage with the king's sister had almost provoked a revolt, was in that year dismissed from the government of Gascony. Eager for revenge, the hated foreigner became an efficient leader of the national party. The folly of Henry in accepting the Sicilian crown for his son Edmund, his lavish expenditure on a futile adventure that led to nothing but the aggrandizement of the papacy, completed the measure of baronial indignation. In 1258 the opposition culminated in the Mad Parliament, which compelled the acceptance of the constitution known as the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.), that practically substituted a baronial oligarchy for the royal power. Hitherto the opposition had been unanimous. But while the bulk of the baronage were now disposed to rest content with their triumph, Montfort had larger schemes of popular government. He quarrelled with Gloucester, the leader of the aristocratic party. In 1261 Henry availed himself of this feud to regain power; but in 1263 war began again. Both parties had competed with each other for popular favour by summoning representatives of the shire communities to a national council. The triumph of Montfort at the battle of Lewes (q.v.) led to his famous parliament of 1265, in which burgesses as well as knights of the shire were summoned, and a new paper constitution, which put the government into the hands of the community, was drawn up. But the democratic Cæsarism of Montfort led to a quarrel with the son of his old enemy Gloucester. Edward, the king's son, escaped and collected an army. Montfort was slain at Evesham (q.v.). The capture of Kenilworth ended the war. For the rest of the reign peace was secured. But real power had now escaped from Henry's hands into those of his son, who knew how to appropriate the results of Montfort's policy, and reconcile the monarchy with nationality. Henry died on November 16, 1272. His extreme incompetence as a ruler blinds us to his private respectability. His reign, though its details are beyond expression dreary, is of the last importance in English history. It was the period of the growth of the constitution, of the concentration of the local machinery into a national representative assembly, of the development of English nationality in opposition to royal and papal tyranny. It was a period of great men, of great, if ill-regulated designs, and of great origination and creative power. It saw the religious revival of the thirteenth century, the establishment of the mendicant orders in England, and the development of culture through the universities. But to all this development Henry was little more than an insignificant figure-head.

Henry IV, King (b. 1367, s. September 30, 1399, d. March 20, 1413), was born at Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, being the eldest son of John of Gaunt and of his first wife, the heiress of the house of Lancaster. About 1380 he married Mary Bohun, daughter and co-heiress of the last Earl of Hereford. From an early age he was styled Earl of Derby, and in 1385 he was summoned to parliament under that title. He at first took part with the uncles of Richard II in their endeavours to retain the government under their own control; but later on supported the king in trying to draw into his hands an absolute power, and was created by him Duke of Hereford in 1397. He participated in the attack launched in that year against Warwick, Arundel, and Gloucester; and in 1398 brought a charge of treason against the Duke of Norfolk, who, with himself, was the sole survivor of the five appellants of 1388. The dispute between the two dukes was appointed to be decided by combat. On the combatants presenting themselves at Coventry on September 16, 1398, however, they were both banished by Richard, Norfolk for life and Bolingbroke for ten years. The following year John of Gaunt died, and Richard, contrary to his promise, seized his lands. On receiving intelligence of this act, Henry, who knew himself to be as popular in the country as the king was unpopular, determined to return to the country on the plea of claiming his lawful inheritance. The king had set out upon an expedition to Ireland, when Henry landed at Ravenspur, July 3, 1399. Bolingbroke was everywhere received with enthusiasm, and soon decided to put forward a claim upon the crown. Richard returned early in August, but upon landing, his army immediately began to desert him. He was forced to surrender to Henry at Flint (August 19). A parliament was summoned which, on September 30, pronounced the deposition of Richard (who had already been induced publicly to renounce the crown), and accepted his cousin as king. It need not be pointed out what an important act this was from a constitutional point of view. Richard died in prison in the beginning of the following year in circumstances that gave rise to suspicions of violence. Henry's energies were, henceforth, entirely devoted to strengthening his position on the throne. He supported the orthodox Church party against the attacks of the Lollards, to whom his father, John of Gaunt, had been markedly favourable, and one of the most important enactments of his reign was the act De Hæretico Comburendo (1401) (q.v.). It must not be supposed that these persecutions were popular with the clergy only. The contrary is proved by the traditional character which attached to the name of the most conspicuous Lollard of the succeeding reign, Sir John Oldcastle (q.v.)—a traditional character which, if it was not identical with, certainly bore considerable resemblance to that of the fictitious Falstaff. For the rest, Henry's reign was chiefly occupied in crushing domestic rebellion, and in meeting the attacks of the Scots and Welsh. In the first year of his reign he was at war with the Duke of Albany, the regent of Scotland, and with Owen Glendower, who had raised a national revolt among the Welsh. The Scots under Douglas were decisively defeated, and their leader captured at Homildon Hill (q.v.) by Harry Hotspur, son of the Earl of Northumberland (September 14, 1402). The expedition into Wales, in which Henry, the Prince of Wales, took part, was less successful. In 1403 broke out the formidable rebellion of the Percys, who were now leagued with Douglas and Glendower. On the march of the first two to join their forces with the latter, they were intercepted by the king's army, and forced into an engagement at Shrewsbury (July 21, 1403), where they were completely defeated and Harry Percy slain. Northumberland was, on this occasion, pardoned. Two other rebellions of less consequence broke out in the north, in the last of which (1408), Northumberland was again deeply implicated. It was crushed at the battle of Bramham Moor (q.v.), in which Northumberland fell. In the interval between these two events, Henry was fortunate enough to capture the heir-apparent of Scotland (James I), who was being sent to France (1405).

After 1408 Henry, no longer in fear of rebellion, began to turn his attention to the affairs of France, where the quarrels between the parties of the Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Orleans had brought the country to the verge of civil war (the assassination of the Duke of Orleans, which made this war inevitable, took place on November 23, 1407). Henry adopted the policy of siding first with one party and then with the other, so as to weaken both as much as possible. During the last three years of his life the king suffered greatly from ill-health, and the Prince of Wales, who had already highly distinguished himself in the field, generally presided at the council. The growing popularity of this prince is said to have excited the jealousy of his father, and caused some estrangement between the two. Henry died March 20, 1413. By his first wife, Mary Bohun, he had four sons—Henry; Thomas, Duke of Clarence; John, Duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester; and two daughters. After his accession Henry married Joanna, daughter of Charles II of Navarre, but had by her no issue. The interest of Henry IV's reign depends upon the success of his policy in founding the house which, in the person of his successor, made itself so famous, and in that of the third descendant again fell. It is still more remarkable as the period of the restoration of orthodoxy against Lollardy, and as the period of "medieval constitutionalism."

Henry V, KING (b. August 9, 1387, s. March 21, 1413, d. August 31, 1422), the eldest son of Henry IV, was born at Monmouth. He was at a very early age practised in arms, and was sent, when fifteen, to take command in an expedition against Owen Glendower, and a year later took part in the important battle of Shrewsbury. The character of this monarch must always be one of great interest to the historical student, for he was probably the most popular king who ever ruled in this country. Later tradition, apparently to throw into relief his subsequent merits, has represented him as passing his youth in dissipation, and in indifference to his reputation; and his biographer, Elmham, suggests that his conduct as a prince was marked by some youthful follies. That he could not have led the wild and dissolute life depicted by Shakespeare is, however, sufficiently clear from his incessant preoccupation with military and administrative duties. A quarrel between the prince and his father occurred in the latter's declining years. Henry seems, in conjunction with Bishop Beaufort, to have urged upon the old king the necessity for abdicating in his favour. The suggestion was received with indignation, and seems to have had as its consequence the dismissal of the prince and his friends from their positions on the council. Henry's place was taken by his next brother, the Duke of Clarence. His father's death on March 20 set the young man free to pursue his ambitions. He was crowned on April 9, 1413. By his first acts he gave evidence of the security which he felt upon the throne. He released the young Earl of March from his captivity, and reinstated the son of Harry Percy in the family honours and possessions. In his internal administration he seems to have been disposed to follow the general lines of his father's policy. But he had less sympathy with the Lollards, who were now persecuted with relentless rigour. Among the victims is to be counted Sir John Oldcastle (q.v.) (commonly called Lord Cobham), who perished at Smithfield in 1417. Henry was, however, supposed to have been not altogether unfavourable to a scheme for confiscating a portion of the revenues of the Church which was warmly advocated by the majority of the lay peers at this time. The abolition of the alien priories gives some colour to this view. It was perhaps to turn the attention of the king in another direction that Archbishop Chichele persuaded Henry that in right of his descent from Edward III he had a valid claim to the crown of France, which the present distracted state of that kingdom gave him a favourable opportunity of asserting. The proposal was received with favour by all classes, and in pursuit of this object Henry set sail for Harfleur, August 10, 1415.

The details of Henry's invasion form an important and exceedingly interesting chapter in military history, but can only be given here in brief summary. The first undertaking was the attack on Harfleur. The place was strongly defended, and nearly surrounded by water, so that the siege, of which the contemporary authorities give us a tolerably detailed account, dragged on for six weeks. During this time the English army, which at first consisted of about 20,000 foot and 9,000 horse, diminished to not more than a third of that number. It appeared impossible to continue the war without obtaining fresh reinforcements from England. In order, however, not to seem to retreat before the face of the enemy, Henry determined to embark from Calais, and before leaving Harfleur he sent a challenge to the dauphin, offering to meet him in eight days, which was not accepted. This is a curious instance of the strategy, or, to speak more truly, the lack of strategy, which characterized the warfare of those days. The safety of Henry's army might seem to have depended upon his keeping his movements as secret as possible; on the contrary he waited eight days for the reply of the dauphin, and then set out (October 8) upon his perilous march. The English, proceeding by Fécamp and Eu, arrived at Abbeville on the 13th, but finding that the Somme was strongly guarded at this point, were induced to make a detour by Amiens and Nesle. At the latter place they crossed the Somme on the 19th, the French showing themselves and disappearing again. On the 24th they crossed the little stream of Ternoise, and there saw the whole French host waiting for them upon the opposite side near the village of Agincourt, and so completely barring the way to Calais that the English could not avoid an engagement. The battle took place on St. Crispin's Day (October 25, 1415). The French army is believed to have been five times as large as the English, and yet the engagement resulted in a victory for the English almost the most complete that has ever been recorded in history. The most important of the prisoners taken were d'Albret, the constable of France, and Charles, Duke of Orleans, the poet, son of the murdered Duke of Orleans. In August of the following year the French, who had threatened Harfleur, were decisively defeated at sea by the Duke of Bedford, the king's brother. Despite these victories Henry clearly perceived that he could only hope to bring his schemes to a successful conclusion by an alliance with one of the two great parties into which France was divided. The traditional policy of England, her commercial relations with the Low Countries, pointed out the Duke of Burgundy as the object of negotiations. It is hardly probable that a permanent alliance would have been made with this party had it not been for the murder of John the Fearless, Duke of Burgundy, on September 10, 1419. John's son and successor, Philip the Good, immediately threw in his lot with the English. He brought with him all the party of the Burgundians, which included the people of Paris. The result of this accession of strength was the Treaty of Troyes (q.v.) between Henry, Philip, and Isabella, the Queen of France (Charles VI was at this time insane), in which the dauphin was excluded from the inheritance, and Henry, on condition of his marrying Catherine, the daughter of Charles VI, was to receive the regency of France during the life of the king, and the succession after his death. The treaty was signed on May 21, 1420, and the marriage of Henry and Catherine took place on June 2. The kings of France and England entered Paris together in November, and the Treaty of Troyes was solemnly confirmed by the Parliament of Paris on December 10. Henry then returned to England, and entered London amidst immense rejoicings. The dauphin of course repudiated the Treaty of Troyes, and he still had the support of the powerful party of the Armagnacs. In March 1421 he gained the victory of Beaugé over the English under the Duke of Clarence. This obliged Henry at once to return to France. He drove back the army of the dauphin and entered Paris in triumph. He left it again to advance against the dauphin's army, which lay before Cosne. On his way he was attacked by a fever which terminated fatally at Vincennes on August 31, 1422, in the thirty-fourth year of Henry's age, and the tenth of his reign.

[C. F. K.]

Henry VI, KING (b. December 6, 1421, s. September 1, 1422, d. May 1471). The reign of this prince was the third act in the historic drama of the house of Lancaster, and that which was destined to witness the undoing of all that had been accomplished in the two previous reigns. Henry VI was born at Windsor, and was less than nine months old at the time of his accession to the throne. Charles VI, his grandfather, died a few months later. The regency of the two kingdoms, to which the young king was considered the heir, had been settled by Henry V. The Duke of Bedford was appointed to the more arduous duty of governing the English possessions in France, and of prosecuting the war in that country, while the English regency was assigned to the Duke of Gloucester with the title of Lord Protector. Parliament intervened, however, to frustrate the execution of this scheme. Bedford was made protector of England so long as he remained in the country; while Gloucester was commissioned to act in his absence. Among Henry V's dying injunctions to his successor was to do all in his power to maintain the alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, and this advice Bedford did his best to carry out. At first he was eminently successful in all his undertakings. The dauphin (Charles VII), who hoped to rally his party now that his greatest rival was dead, led his army into Burgundy. He was decisively defeated at Crevant (1423), and the next year still more decisively at Verneuil (August 16, 1424) (q.v.). The Duke of Bedford commanded in person at this great battle, which has been well described as a second Agincourt. Meanwhile, however, the Duke of Gloucester had contrived, by espousing Jacqueline of Hainault, to alienate Burgundy from the English interests, and though Bedford did his best, by enormous concessions, to retain his friendship, the breach between them gradually widened. The pope, too, at this time wrote an appeal to Bedford to desist from his attempts to force upon the French people a sovereign in defiance of the rights of succession, and the public opinion of Europe was steadily turning against the English. It was at this juncture that Joan of Arc came forward alleging her divine commission to rescue the country from its invader. At the moment when Joan obtained her first audience with Charles VII the English were in the midst of the protracted siege of Orleans. Bedford had been induced, in opposition to his own judgment, to undertake this operation with the view of carrying the war into the country beyond the Loire, which adhered altogether to the party of Charles. All France had begun to look upon the siege of Orleans as decisive of the issue of the whole war. Joan made her way into the city on April 29, 1429, and nine days later compelled the English to raise the siege. The next act of Joan was to conduct the king to be crowned at Rheims, which she effected on July 17, after having defeated the English at Patay in the preceding month. These events ended the achievements which Joan had proclaimed it her mission to perform. She accomplished, however, still more for the cause of France's deliverance by her death. Taken prisoner by the English at Compiègne on May 23, 1430, she was carried to Rouen, unjustly condemned for sorcery, and burnt in the May of the following year. But the effect of her achievements upon France did not pass away with her death. The national spirit had been roused, and the result was that the struggle became now a national effort to expel the alien invaders. From that time the cause of England was virtually lost. It is not necessary to follow in detail the stages of its decline. By the Treaty of Arras (September 21, 1435), Burgundy, still further alienated from Bedford, by the latter's marriage without his consent to Jacquetta of Luxemburg, finally threw in his lot with Charles, and the event is said to have been the cause of the death of Bedford, which shortly followed. The war dragged on with diminishing hopes on the English side, and increasing discontent at home, for ten years more. In 1444 a truce was made between the two countries; and in the following year a marriage was arranged between Henry and Margaret, daughter of the Duke of Anjou and the niece of the King of France.

Henceforward, the interest of events abroad depends mainly upon the effect which they had upon public feeling at home—the degree in which they embittered the different parties of English statesmen and tended to bring about the Wars of the Roses, which soon ensued. Two years after the king's marriage (1447), the two rival statesmen, the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort, died. The Duke of Suffolk now came to be the trusted minister of the Crown. He had been chiefly instrumental in bringing about the king's marriage, and he was on that account the favourite of Queen Margaret, by whom the king was entirely governed. But as the royal marriage and the queen herself became every day more unpopular in the country, the general distrust of the duke kept pace with his favour at court. Richard, Duke of York, now occupied, and with much more desert, the place in popular estimation that Gloucester had held a few years before his death, while the continued losses of the English were attributed to the treachery of Suffolk and the queen. At length Suffolk was, at the instance of York and his party, impeached of high treason, was banished by the king, and seized and beheaded, probably by a pirate, in the course of his passage to the coast of France (1450). He was succeeded in the queen's favour by the Duke of Somerset, to whom the defence of the possessions in France was entrusted. York in the meantime had been removed from the country by appointment as lord-lieutenant of Ireland (1447). In 1450 a foretaste of the civil war was experienced in the rebellion of the men of Kent, under Jack Cade, who called himself John Mortimer, and professed to be a cousin of the Duke of York. [CADE'S REBELLION.] After this rebellion had been suppressed, York returned to England, with a following of several thousand men, and insisted upon his admission to the council. This was granted, and the appeal to arms was, for a while, deferred.

Meanwhile, the affairs of the country across the Channel had gone from bad to worse. There was no longer any question of retaining the more recent acquisitions. The most ancient possessions of the English in France were about to be lost—Normandy in 1450, Guienne in 1453. During the defence of the latter place, the brave Earl of Shrewsbury, his sons, and about thirty knights, fell in one engagement, Castillon, 1453. In August 1453 the king began to exhibit signs of that mental disorder which he had inherited from his grandfather, Charles VI of France. It now became clear to all that, sooner or later, the queen and Somerset on the one hand, and the Duke of York and his partisans upon the other, would appeal to the sword to settle their disputes; and the noblemen throughout the country began to arm their retainers. The prospect of war was increased by the birth of a son to Henry and Margaret in October 1453. This event destroyed York's prospects of succeeding peacefully to the English throne, and increased the suspicion with which the queen regarded him. York was appointed protector in April 1454; but in January of the succeeding year the king recovered his faculties, and the appointment was, of course, annulled. The queen and Somerset now began to think of taking vengeance upon York, who was obliged to retire to the north. There he was joined by the most powerful among his adherents, and definitely took up arms, and marched upon London. On May 22, 1455, the army of York encountered the forces of the king at St. Albans (q.v.), and there was fought the first battle of the Wars of the Roses. Somerset was slain, and the victory remained with the Yorkists; so that, on the king again becoming deranged, York was once more made lord protector (1455-6). The war now slumbered for four years. It broke out again in the autumn of 1459, when the queen felt herself strong enough to strike. Lord Audley, with the king's forces, was defeated by the Earl of Salisbury at Blore Heath (September 23), but on the approach of the king the Yorkists were obliged to disperse [LUDFORD, ROUT OF], and their leaders were attainted by the parliament of Coventry in the following November. Soon, however, they recovered their position, landed in England, and entered London in triumph, in July 1460. Immediately after was fought the battle of Northampton, in which the king was taken prisoner (July 10, 1460). On October 16 the Duke of York, for the first time, laid claim to the crown. Finally a bargain was concluded whereby Henry was to continue to wear the crown during his lifetime, but was to be succeeded by Richard, to the exclusion of the young Prince Edward. Meanwhile, the queen, roused to frenzied action by this attack upon the rights of her son, had fled to the north, where she succeeded in raising an army. York hastened to meet her, and on December 30 was fought the battle of Wakefield (q.v.), in which the army of York was completely defeated. The duke himself was slain, and his second son, the Earl of Rutland, was murdered after the battle. Edward, Earl of March, now succeeded to the claims of his father. Margaret defeated his chief supporter, the Earl of Warwick, at the second battle of St. Albans in January 1461, and had London at her mercy. Henry, however, was unwilling to expose the city to the tender mercies of his wild northern troops, and the opportunity was lost. Edward, who had meantime defeated a Lancastrian detachment at Mortimer's Cross on February 2, was enabled to join Warwick, and together they entered London. The queen was pursued northwards and decisively defeated at Towton (q.v.) on March 29, 1461. For the next three years she kept the Lancastrian cause alive in the north, with French and Scottish assistance; but her hopes were finally destroyed at Hedgeley Moor (q.v.) and Hexham (1464). Margaret fled to the continent, but Henry remained for two years a fugitive in northern England until he was captured in Lancashire (1466). He was destined once more to occupy the throne for a few months from 1470 to 1471, as a result of an alliance between Warwick and the Yorkist malcontents and the exiled Margaret; but his reason was now permanently affected, and he was the mere puppet of his deliverers. Moreover Edward soon recovered his power. Warwick was defeated and slain at Barnet (April 14), and the Lancastrians were, for the last time, overwhelmed at Tewkesbury (May 4) (q.v.). Edward entered London on May 21, and next day the body of Henry was exposed at St. Paul's. It was very commonly believed that he had been murdered by the Duke of Gloucester, the brother of Edward IV. Henry was of a gentle and pious disposition.

[C. F. K.]

Henry VII, KING (b. January 28, 1457, s. August 22, 1485, d. April 21, 1509), was the son of Edmund Tudor, Earl of Richmond, son of Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman who had married the widow of Henry V. His mother, Margaret, was a great-granddaughter of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford, whose offspring had been legitimated in 1397, but expressly excluded from succession to the throne. Henry VI recognized his half-brothers of the Tudor house, and when Edmund Tudor died, soon after his son's birth, Henry VI took the young Henry of Richmond under his protection. After the battle of Tewkesbury, Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, carried off his nephew to Brittany for safety. Edward IV left no means untried to get Henry into his power. He tried to bribe the Duke of Brittany to give him up, but the duke preferred to receive an annual subsidy for keeping watch over his important guest. Richard III sent a special envoy to Brittany to spy Henry's doings. The English exiles more and more gathered round Henry, and saw in him their only possible head. His mother and Bishop Morton did their utmost to furnish him with money. On Christmas Day 1483 a body of exiles took oath in the cathedral of Rheims to place Henry on the English throne, and he on his side swore to reconcile the contending parties by wedding Elizabeth of York, Edward IV's eldest daughter. It needed much patience on Henry's part to keep his party together, and to overcome the obstacles which the French court put in the way of his preparations. At length, on August 1, 1485, he landed at Milford Haven and was welcomed by the Welsh as a compatriot. He advanced to Shropshire, where he was joined by the Talbots. Richard III advanced to meet him, and the two armies came in sight near the little town of Bosworth (q.v.), not far from Ashby-de-la-Zouch. The battle was decided by Lord Stanley, who joined Henry's side. Richard III was slain and Henry of Richmond was the conqueror (August 22). Still there were many difficulties in his way; but he showed a resolute and far-sighted spirit. He was determined to reign as England's lawful king, and not to assume a subordinate position by accepting any title through marriage with Elizabeth of York. The claims of the Lancastrian houses were not popular, and Henry could scarcely pretend to be a genuine Lancastrian. He took, however, a victor's right, and on the day of the battle of Bosworth assumed the royal title. He advanced to London and had himself crowned before he summoned parliament in November. The act which recognized his accession made no mention of his claim, but simply declared that "the inheritance of the crown be, rest, remain, and abide in the most royal person of our now sovereign lord King Henry VII and in his heirs." It may be said that parliament simply registered an accomplished fact. In January 1486 Henry VII married Elizabeth of York, and soon afterwards made a journey northwards to pacify his dominions. There was a futile rising of the Yorkists under Lord Lovel (q.v.) which was easily put down and sternly punished. But England had been too long disturbed by party warfare for peace to come at once. In 1487 a young man named Lambert Simnel (q.v.) was trained to personate the Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, whom Henry VII kept confined in the Tower. The impostor was welcomed in Ireland, and received aid from Flanders, where the Duchess Margaret of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV, resided. He landed in England in June 1487, but was defeated and taken prisoner at Stoke, and was afterwards employed as a servant in the royal kitchen. This rising taught Henry VII that he must mollify the bitterness of the Yorkist feeling, and he accordingly had Elizabeth crowned as his queen in November. He also took measures to reduce still further the power of the great barons, though the baronage had been almost annihilated in the bloody battles of the Wars of the Roses. In 1487 parliament constituted a new commission of judges, chosen from the members of the privy council, with power to put down divers misdemeanours. Chief of these was the practice of maintenance, by which a lord could bind to himself a band of retainers, who wore his livery, espoused his quarrels, and were too strong for the ordinary law courts to touch.

Henry VII's policy was peaceful, and he did not aim at gaining glory for his new dynasty by foreign warfare. The daughter of his former protector, the Duke of Brittany, asked his help against France; and the English people were ready for war. Henry VII used his people's zeal as a means for raising large supplies, but only made a show of fighting, and in 1492 arranged with Charles VIII of France the Peace of Étapes, by which he consented to be bought off by a large money payment of £149,000. A new pretender, a Fleming, Peter Osbeck, generally known as Perkin Warbeck (q.v.), claimed to be a son of Edward IV, who had escaped from the hands of Richard III. By the Treaty of Étapes, Warbeck was expelled from France. He was, however, warmly supported by Margaret of Burgundy, and had many adherents in England. Henry VII steadily pursued them, and punished them with remorseless severity. After an unsuccessful attempt at landing on the coast of Kent in 1495 one hundred and fifty-nine of his followers were hanged. In 1496 Henry VII made a commercial treaty, known as "The Great Intercourse" [INTERCURSUS], with Flanders, by which liberty of trading was secured, and each party undertook to expel the other's rebels from their territory. The obvious advantages of commercial intercourse overcame dynastic politics, and Flanders was no more a seedbed of plots against the English monarchy. Warbeck took refuge in Scotland, where Henry VII's policy of conciliation was not yet able to overcome national animosity. Still it made so much progress that Warbeck was driven to seek his fortunes in the field, and in September 1497 landed in Cornwall. As the royal troops advanced, Warbeck's forces melted away, and he was taken prisoner in the abbey of Beaulieu. Warbeck made an attempt to escape from prison, and led the Earl of Warwick to share in his attempt. In 1499 they were both executed, and the king was at last free from pretenders to his throne. Henry VII devoted himself to the great object of establishing the royal power at home, and of raising the English monarchy to a strong position in European affairs. He lived economically, and seldom summoned parliament. He used benevolences (q.v.) to raise money, and rigidly exercised all the old rights of the Crown. He reduced the barons into complete obedience, and raised up a new class of officials. He succeeded in bringing Ireland into greater order and closer connexion with England. The deputy, Sir Edward Poynings (q.v.), passed a law which made the Irish parliament largely dependent on the English king (1494). Henry VII steadily pursued the endeavour of bringing Scotland into closer union with England, and in this he was helped by his alliance with France, which weakened its connexion with Scotland. In 1502 peace was established with Scotland, and Henry VII's daughter Margaret was given in marriage to the Scottish king James IV.

In foreign affairs Henry VII recognized a congenial spirit in Ferdinand of Aragon, and wished to restore on a firmer basis the traditional alliance between England and the Spanish house. A marriage was arranged between the Infanta Katharine and Arthur, Henry VII's eldest son. It took place in November 1501, but five months afterwards Arthur died at the age of fifteen. Henry VII and Ferdinand were both unwilling to lose the advantages of this connexion. It was agreed that Arthur's brother Henry should marry Katharine. The necessary dispensations were obtained, and Katharine stayed in England, but the marriage was not celebrated till after Henry VII's death. The death of Queen Elizabeth in 1503 left Henry VII free to carry farther his policy of continental alliances. He proposed to marry Margaret, daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, whose son Philip was Duke of Burgundy. By this marriage he hoped, amongst other advantages, to secure possession of Edmund de la Pole, son of the Duke of Suffolk and Edward IV's sister Elizabeth. A storm drove Philip of Burgundy on the English coast, and Henry VII, in return for his hospitality, demanded the surrender of Edmund de la Pole, who was imprisoned in the Tower. The marriage with Margaret did not take place, and Henry VII spent his last years in devising other marriages for himself and his daughter. None of them was accomplished; but their object was to secure for his house a sure friendship both with Austrian and Spanish lines. Henry VII's financial policy became more and more rapacious, and he was skilful in finding ready instruments, chief of whom were Edmund Dudley (q.v.) and Richard Empson (q.v.). When Henry VII died, on April 21, 1509, he left England pacified and the royal coffers well filled. He had executed a difficult task with thoroughness and persistency. He gave England order, peace, and prosperity. He established firmly his own house on the English throne. He secured its position by a system of alliances abroad. By the same means he protected English interests, and gained for England an important place in European politics without fighting a single battle. His prudent use of the means at his disposal won for him in after-times the name of the "Solomon of England."

[M. C.]

Henry VIII, KING (b. June 28, 1491, s. April 22, 1509, d. January 28, 1547), was the second son of Henry VII and Elizabeth of York. He came to the throne a handsome and accomplished young man, whose accession was hailed with joy as a relief from the severe and sombre rule of Henry VII. Henry VIII increased his popularity by prosecuting the hated instruments of his father's extortion, Empson (q.v.) and Dudley (q.v.), who were put to death on a charge of plotting to seize the royal person. He intimated his intention of carrying on his father's foreign policy by completing the marriage, which had long been deferred, with Katharine of Aragon, his brother Arthur's widow. He longed to plunge into an adventurous career of foreign policy, for which the troubled state of European affairs afforded every opportunity. Italy was the battle-field of the rival claims of the Empire, France, and Spain. The League of Cambrai (1509)—for the dismemberment of Venice—had awakened the pope's jealousy against France. The Holy League was formed in 1511 against Louis XII, and Henry VIII gladly joined it. An English army was sent under the Duke of Suffolk to co-operate with Spanish troops in the south of France. But Ferdinand used it only for his own purposes; he delayed any great operations, and the English suffered from the climate. Nothing was done in this campaign of 1512; but next year Henry VIII arranged to co-operate with the Emperor Maximilian in Flanders. The bloodless "Battle of the Spurs" (August 16, 1513) secured the fall of Terouenne, and Tournai also was taken. France retaliated on England by stirring up the Scots to break the peace which they had recently made with England. James IV crossed the border with a large army, but was defeated and slain by the Earl of Surrey at the battle of Flodden Field (q.v.). The year 1513 was successful for Henry VIII's ambitious schemes. But his allies were ready for a truce. Henry VIII could not continue the war by himself. He made peace with Louis XII in return for large sums of money, and ratified the peace by giving his sister Mary in marriage to the old king. The death of James IV of Scotland left another of Henry's sisters, Margaret, the queen-dowager, regent of Scotland. But her second marriage, with the Earl of Angus, made her unpopular, and afforded an opening for French intrigues. The death of Louis XII and the accession of Francis I in 1515 again led to European war, which was ended in 1518 by a confederacy between England, France, and Spain.

Henry's chief adviser was Thomas Wolsey (q.v.), who rose by his abilities, and showed his capacity especially by managing the details of the campaign of 1513. Next year he was made Archbishop of York, and chancellor. He soon was created cardinal, and made papal legate in England. His civil and ecclesiastical authority combined gave him a commanding position. He was devoted to the king's service, and bent upon exalting the royal authority. He likewise upheld stoutly the authority of the Church, though he wished to reform some of its abuses. Above all he laboured to make England influential and respected in European affairs. At home he exercised arbitrary power. From 1515 to 1523 no parliament was summoned, but money was collected by forced loans and benevolences.

The death of Maximilian in 1519 raised the question of succession to the empire. Henry VIII offered himself as a candidate; but the contest really lay between Francis I and Charles, grandson alike of Ferdinand and Maximilian. The election of Charles V was the beginning of a long rivalry between France and the house of Habsburg. Both wished to secure the support of England, and Wolsey enhanced the importance of the English alliance by temporizing between the two powers. Charles V condescended to visit Sandwich for a conference with Henry VIII. Francis I arranged an interview on the plain of Ardres, with such magnificence that it was known as the "Field of the Cloth of Gold" (q.v.). But in Wolsey's eyes the interests of England could be better served by siding with Charles V, and in the war which followed, England saw its ally everywhere successful. France retaliated on England, as usual, by raising disturbances in Scotland, where the Duke of Albany attacked the English borders. He was, however, outgeneralled by the Earl of Surrey, and in 1523 a peace for eighteen years was made with Scotland.

In 1523 Henry VIII had hopes of reviving the English claims on the French throne. But Charles V had no wish to see his ally become too powerful. His object was to use the help of England to enable him to make a satisfactory peace with France in his own interests. Wolsey soon saw this, and the alliance of England with Charles V began rapidly to cool. The complete success of Charles V at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, where Francis I was taken prisoner, showed still more clearly that England had nothing to gain from her ally. Henry VIII and Wolsey came round to the French side, and in 1528 England declared war against Charles V.

During this period Henry VIII was regarded as a gay, pleasure-loving king, ambitious, and full of great schemes, which he was content to leave in the hands of Wolsey to be worked out. Wolsey's hand was heavy on the people, and his taxation was arbitrary that he might raise adequate supplies. Henry VIII stood aloof from these questions. He retained his own popularity, and allowed all the responsibility and all the odium to fall upon Wolsey's shoulders. The country was prosperous and contented under a strong government, and looked with fervent loyalty upon the king who secured their peace. But Henry VIII had no male heirs. All his children by Katharine died in infancy, save a daughter, Mary. Uncertainty about the succession to the throne would again plunge England into a bloody conflict. Henry VIII repressed all speculation about the future with sternness. In 1521 the Duke of Buckingham was condemned and executed as a traitor on slight charges of attempting to forecast the duration of the king's life. But Henry VIII was uneasy at the want of a male heir. His wife, Katharine, was older than himself, and was sickly. So long as he remained in alliance with Charles V, Katharine had a political significance. On the breach with Charles V she became an obstacle in the way of the new policy. The marriage with a brother's widow had sufficient irregularity to give grounds for an annulment, and a desire for a divorce gradually took possession of the king's mind. It became a determined object when the king fell in love with Anne Boleyn (q.v.), a lady of Katharine's court. Wolsey had favoured the divorce scheme in the interests of the alliance with France. When he found that it was urged to make room for Anne Boleyn, he was dismayed, but none the less obeyed the king. The question was, however, an awkward one, and it was difficult to find good reasons for urging it on the pope. Clement VII was cowed by the sack of Rome in 1527, and was afraid of drawing on himself the wrath of Charles V, who was Katharine's nephew. He consented to constitute Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio commissioners to examine into the king's plea, and the legates sat in London in 1529. But the case was revoked to Rome, and Henry was left disappointed. Every effort was made to override or outwit the unfortunate Katharine; but her resolution left the pope no chance of evading the main issue, which was the validity of the dispensation issued by a previous pope. It is no wonder that Clement VII hesitated.

The immediate result of Henry's disappointment was the disgrace of Wolsey, who had so faithfully served his master that he had no other friend. Wolsey was brought under the penalties of the Statute of Præmunire (q.v.) for having exercised the office of legate. He died in November 1530, foreseeing the great questions that would arise. "The king," he said, "is of royal spirit, and hath a princely heart; rather than he will miss or want part of his appetite, he will hazard the loss of half a kingdom." Henry was resolute for his divorce, and was still anxious to obtain the papal sanction. In dragging before the world all the secrets of his domestic life, and showing openly his attachment to Anne Boleyn, he entered upon a career which led to momentous results. The Lutheran revolt in Germany had done much to shake the foundation of the papal authority, and Henry VIII had shown his orthodoxy by writing against Luther, and receiving from the pope the title of "Defender of the Faith" (q.v.). But the demand for reform was loud inside the Church, and Henry VIII encouraged the parliament of 1529 to pass measures for remedying clerical abuses. He tried to bring further pressure to bear upon the pope by gathering opinions of the universities of Europe upon the question of the papal power to grant a dispensation for marriage with a brother's widow. In 1531 he went farther, and threatened all the clergy of England with the penalties of Præmu-nire because they had recognized Wolsey's legatine authority. They bought off the royal displeasure, but were driven in their bill to give the king the title of Supreme Head of the Church "so far as the law of Christ will allow." Still the pope did not give way, and next year parliament was encouraged to continue the war against the clergy, and the payment of annates or first-fruits to the pope was attacked. At last the king's patience was exhausted, and in January 1533 he was secretly married to Anne Boleyn. The pope threatened excommunication, whereon an act was passed forbidding appeals to Rome. The divorce question was then tried before the court of Archbishop Cranmer; and Katharine, who refused to plead, was pronounced contumacious, and sentence was given against her. The pope declared the divorce illegal. The breach with Rome was complete. Henry VIII had done what he could to avoid it; but step by step he was drawn on until it was inevitable. The parliament of 1534 finished the work of separating the Church of England from the papal headship, and instituting it as a national church under the headship of the king. [SUPREMACY, ACTS OF.]

Henry VIII's chief adviser in these measures was Thomas Cromwell (q.v.), who had risen to notice in Wolsey's service. Cromwell wished to re-establish the royal power as supreme over Church and State alike. The discontent created by these sweeping measures was sternly repressed. The Succession Act, which settled the crown upon the children of Anne Boleyn, was made a test of loyalty. The royal supremacy was enacted by parliament, and it was declared high treason to question that title. Cromwell's spies and informers crowded the land. The monks of the Charterhouse perished on the scaffold for refusing to admit the royal supremacy. Sir Thomas More (q.v.) and Bishop Fisher (q.v.) were executed because they could not conscientiously take oath that they heartily approved of these changes. By these examples the discontented were cowed into acquiescence. The royal supremacy, exercised by Cromwell as vicar-general, was used for clearing away seedplots of disaffection. In 1536 the smaller monasteries were visited and suppressed, and in 1539 the larger monasteries were involved in the same fate. Their lands passed into the hands of a class of new nobility, who thus had a direct interest in maintaining the altered state of things. The abbots disappeared from the House of Lords, and the parliamentary influence of the Church was at an end.

There was no limit to the royal power, or to the subserviency of parliament. Henry VIII seems to have regarded himself as beyond all recognized principles of human conduct. In 1536 Anne Boleyn was accused of unchastity, and was beheaded. The day after her execution the king married Jane Seymour (q.v.). Again the succession to the throne was altered by act of parliament. Henry VIII was even allowed to nominate his successor by will. But the king's position was dangerous. In Ireland there was a serious rising of the Fitzgeralds. In Lincolnshire an army of discontented folk presented their grievances. In Yorkshire a more serious rising, the Pilgrimage of Grace (q.v.), was put down by the Duke of Norfolk. To guard against a rising of the old Yorkist faction in the west, the grandson of Edward IV, Edward Courtenay, Marquis of Exeter, was executed as a traitor. By the end of 1537 the disaffection created by the violent changes had been stamped out.

Henry VIII desired nothing more than the absorption into the Crown of the powers previously exercised by the pope. But it was difficult to repress the zeal of those who were inspired by the teaching of Luther, and discussed the doctrines of the Church with freedom. Religious change and doctrinal reform spread more widely than Henry VIII liked. He was willing to use it so far as it enabled him to make good his position, but no farther. In 1539 parliament passed the Bill of Six Articles (q.v.), which asserted the chief points of the old system against the attacks of the reformers. Cromwell was disposed to go farther, and seek political advantages by a close alliance with the Protestant princes of Germany. In 1540 he negotiated Henry VIII's fourth marriage, with Anne (q.v.), daughter of John, Duke of Cleves. His new wife displeased the king; the German princes were too irresolute to be of any political service. Henry VIII repudiated his wife, and abandoned Cromwell, who was condemned by bill of attainder and executed. The king married Catherine Howard (q.v.), niece of the Duke of Norfolk, and a reaction against Cromwell's policy set in. Catherine Howard was, in the year 1542, convicted of misconduct and executed. Next year Henry married, as his sixth wife, Catherine Parr (q.v.), widow of Lord Latimer; with her he contrived to live in peace.

The remainder of Henry VIII's reign was spent in war with Scotland and France, which, to his great annoyance, had renewed their old alliance. The young king, James V, married a French wife, and in 1542 ravaged the borders; but died in consequence of the ignominious rout of his army at Solway Moss (q.v.). Still the French party prevailed in Scotland, and the English generals on the borders kept up a merciless system of plundering raids. Indignant against France, Henry again allied himself with Charles V, and in 1544 captured Boulogne. But Charles V made peace for himself, and abandoned his ally. Still Henry VIII carried on the war single-handed till, in 1546, peace was made at Boulogne, and France agreed to pay a large pension to the English king. Meanwhile, Henry VIII's health was giving way, and his popularity had greatly waned. There was a secret strife between religious parties, which only the strong hand of the king could repress. The Duke of Norfolk led the reactionary party; the Earl of Hertford, uncle of the young Edward, heir to the throne, favoured the reformers. Norfolk and his son, the Earl of Surrey, behaved so as to awaken the king's suspicions. Henry VIII was above all things careful that there should be no disturbance during the minority of his son. In December 1546 Norfolk and Surrey were suddenly imprisoned. Surrey was beheaded, and Norfolk was about to share the same fate when Henry VIII died on January 28, 1547.

Henry VIII was by nature a highly-gifted man, of a strongly-marked character, which won the hearts of all. He attached his ministers to him as few rulers have ever succeeded in doing. He used their loyal devotion to the full, and then remorselessly abandoned them. He was above all things a king. No king had a higher sense of the privileges of royalty; no king exercised them more fully, or succeeded in obtaining for them a fuller recognition from his people. Henry is equally remarkable for what he did, and for what he abstained from doing. He clothed his own caprice in the forms of justice; he elevated his own personal desires to principles of national policy; he strained the constitution to its farthest point, but he did not break it; he was a tyrant, but he clothed his tyranny under the forms of parliamentary sanction; he so far identified himself with the general interest of his people, that they were ready to trust him with larger powers than any previous king enjoyed. In his private life his coarseness was strangely mixed with questions of the national welfare; and the morality required from the ordinary man was set aside in the case of the sovereign. Everything was pardoned in a ruler who had a hand strong enough to maintain order, and who could hold a firm balance between contending factions. Under Henry VIII England passed through a great crisis without material change of the constitution either of Church or State. A great revolution was accomplished with comparative peace.

Henry, son of Henry II (1155-83), was married at an early age to Margaret, daughter of Louis VII of France. His father had destined him to succeed him in England, Normandy, and Anjou, while the rest of his dominions were to be divided between his other sons. In 1170, in pursuance of this scheme, the young Henry was crowned king, and in 1172 was crowned with his wife by the Archbishop of Rouen. Next year Henry II, anxious to make some provision for John, requested his elder sons to give up to their brother some few castles out of their promised shares of his dominions. The young King Henry refused, and joined the French king in the great confederation he had formed against Henry II; but the allies were defeated everywhere, and Henry was only too glad to seek reconciliation with his father (1174). But his intrigues continued both against his father and his brother Richard, his whole aim being to establish an independent dominion for himself. In 1183 these intrigues ended in an open revolt in which Henry and Geoffrey were ranged against Prince Richard and their father. A miserable civil war ensued, in the course of which Henry died at Martel. Of his character Giraldus Cambrensis speaks in terms of high commendation, which the facts of his life fail to justify.

Henry, EARL and DUKE of LANCASTER (1299 ?-1361), was the son of Henry, Earl of Lancaster, and grandson of Edmund, titular King of Sicily. He served with distinction in the Scottish and French wars of Edward III's reign, and in 1345 was made lieutenant and captain of Aquitaine. He was frequently employed by the king on diplomatic errands. In 1351 he was created Duke of Lancaster and his earldom of Lancaster was given palatinate status. In 1361 he died of the black death. His daughter and heiress, Blanche, married John of Gaunt, who thus obtained all the honours and claims of the house of Lancaster.

Henry of Almayne (1235-71) was the son of Richard of Cornwall, King of the Romans. During the constitutional struggles of the period he wavered between the royal and the baronial party. In 1263 he joined the barons against his uncle Henry III, and was taken prisoner by the king's partisans at Boulogne, but in the civil war which ensued he fought on the royalist side, and took part in the battle of Lewes. He was afterwards given as one of the hostages to the barons for the performance of the Mise of Lewes (q.v.), and was by them sent over to France to negotiate a new arbitration by St. Louis. After the defeat of the barons at Evesham, Henry received valuable grants of land, and in 1268 accompanied his cousin Prince Edward on his Crusade. On his return he was murdered at Viterbo in Italy by Simon and Guy de Montfort.

Henry, PRINCE of SCOTLAND (d. 1152), was the son of David I. Stephen, soon after his coronation, conferred on him the earldoms of Northampton and Huntingdon, and at the Treaty of Durham, 1139, added Northumberland as well. Henry led a division of the Scottish army at the Battle of the Standard, 1138. He died, June 1152, to the sorrow of all, for we are told by the chroniclers that he was a brave and able soldier, and walked like his father in the paths of justice and of truth. He married Ada, daughter of William de Warenne, Earl of Surrey.

Henry, PRINCE OF WALES (1594-1612), the eldest son of James I, was a prince of great promise. It was for his benefit that his father wrote the manual of conduct entitled, "Basilikon Doron," or "The Royal Gift" (q.v.). He seems to have been very popular with the Scots as well as with the English, and owing to his violent dislike of popery the young prince was the hope of the Protestant party in England; and his character and attainments offered high promise. He died in November 1612, from a fever probably brought on by over-violent exertions. The suspicion that he was poisoned seems to have been altogether unfounded.

Heburn, JAMES, 4TH EARL OF BOTHWELL (1536-78), was lord warden of the Scottish Marches, as well as lord high admiral of Scotland, in which capacities he is said to have acted more as a marauder and a pirate than as an officer of state. In 1558 he was one of the Lords of the Articles; and in the following year distinguished himself as a partisan of the queen regent, and an opponent of Arran and the reforming lords. He was one of the nobles sent to Mary in France after the death of her husband; and in 1561 was made a member of the privy council. He was, however, in constant difficulties, owing to his turbulence and violence. In 1562 he was impeached for having plotted to carry off the queen, and outlawed; but in a few months he returned, and married Lady Jane Gordon, a sister of Lord Huntly, and about the same time began to find favour in the eyes of Queen Mary. From this time his life became closely associated with that of the queen. After Rizzio's murder Mary fled to Dunbar Castle, of which Bothwell had the custody; and subsequently he returned with her to Edinburgh. In October 1566 he received a visit from her when lying wounded in his castle of Hermitage; and after he had compassed the murder of Darnley, 1567, he was in constant attendance on Mary at Seton. An attempt on the part of Lennox to bring the murderer of his son to justice ended in Bothwell's acquittal, owing to the non-appearance of the accuser, and brought him fresh proofs of the queen's regard in the shape of large grants of land. In 1567 he carried off Mary as she was going from Stirling to Edinburgh, probably with her own connivance, and, having obtained a divorce from his wife, married the queen, May 15, 1567. Shortly afterwards a combination of the leading barons of Scotland forced Bothwell, who previous to his marriage had been made Duke of Orkney and Shetland, to fly to Borthwick Castle, and thence to Dunbar. On the queen's surrender to Kirkecaldy, after the failure at Carberry Hill, Bothwell had to escape as best he could to the Orkneys. Pursued thither, and driven to sea, he was arrested by a Danish warship off the coast of Norway, on suspicion of piracy, and conveyed to Denmark. There he was imprisoned by Christian IX, first at Malmö (1567-73), then at Dragsholm (1573-8); but the king refused the demands of the Scottish government for his extradition or execution. The so-called "Testament" he is said to have drawn up during this period is probably a forgery. Bothwell was, as Randolph said of him, "despiteful out of measure, false and untrue as a devil"; and it is not the least extraordinary feature in Mary's career that she should have conceived any affection for this brutal, ferocious, and unscrupulous border chief.

Heptarchy, THE, is a term often applied to the English kingdoms which existed previous to the time of Egbert. It has been used generally by most of the historians of the last century, and is still a common term in historical text-books. It is, however, inappropriate, as the word Heptarchy (ἑπταρχία) strictly means a government of seven persons. Besides this, it conveys the erroneous idea that there were in England, from the fifth to the ninth centuries, always seven independent kingdoms. This was very far from the case: there were often more than seven kingdoms and more frequently fewer; but if every state which at any time had a king of its own were to be reckoned, the number of kingdoms would very far exceed the number. Those writers who use the term Heptarchy understand by it the kingdoms of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, Essex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria. [For the whole subject see ANGLO-SAXON KINGDOMS.]

Herat is a city of immemorial antiquity, situated in Afghanistan on the high road from India to Persia, and Central Asia. Since the foundation of the Afghan monarchy in the middle of the eighteenth century, Herat has been more or less subject to the claims of Kabul; and when in 1838 the Persians attempted to seize it, the British helped the inhabitants to resist. The Afghans, under Eldred Pottinger, endured a famous siege which lasted till the British government sent a message to the Shah, informing him that his occupation of Herat would be followed by war, whereupon the Persians raised the siege on September 9, 1838. In 1857 the British government compelled the Shah to recognize the independence of Herat; in 1863 it was definitely incorporated with Afghanistan by Dost Mohammed.

Herbert, ARTHUR, EARL OF TORRINGTON, lord high admiral (1647-1716), became rear-admiral in 1678. In 1682 he raised the siege of Tangier. In 1684 he was placed on the admiralty commission, and subsequently returned to parliament for Dover. He became vice-admiral and master of the robes (1685), but on refusing to consent to the repeal of the Test Act was dismissed from his offices. He thereupon entered into communication with Dykvelt, the envoy of William of Orange, and was the bearer of the invitation to that prince. He commanded the fleet with which William sailed to England, with the title of lieutenant admiral general. After the revolution he was placed first on the admiralty commission. In 1689 he engaged in a skirmish with the French fleet in Bantry Bay, but without much result. He was created Baron Herbert and Viscount Torrington, and received the thanks of parliament. In 1690 he commanded the English and Dutch ships against the French, but retreated before them up the Channel, and when he received an order to engage off Beachy Head, sent the Dutch ships alone into action, and when they were completely crushed, fled into the Thames (June 30). He was tried by court-martial and acquitted (December 8-10), but not again employed.

Herbert, EDWARD, LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY (1583-1648), was educated at Oxford, and, after travelling abroad, where he made the acquaintance of Casaubon and other great scholars, serving in the Netherlands under the Prince of Orange (1614-16), and visiting Italy, was appointed English ambassador at Paris (1618). Seven years later he retired into private life, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. In the Civil War he ultimately sided with the Parliament, though at first somewhat inclined to the Royalist cause. Lord Herbert's chief historical writings are a "History of Henry VIII," an account of the "Expedition to the Isle of Rhé" (in which he defended Buckingham's conduct), and a celebrated "Autobiography."

Herbert, GEORGE, 5TH EARL OF CARNARVON (1866-1923), son of the 4th earl (below), discovered the tomb of King Tut-ankh-Amen at Luxor in 1923, after seventeen years of excavation and discovery, in conjunction with Mr. Howard Carter.

Herbert, HENRY HOWARD MOLYNEUX, 4TH EARL OF CARNARVON (1831-90), was colonial under-secretary in Lord Derby's second administration, 1858-9, and colonial secretary in Lord Derby's third administration, 1866. He resigned, on account of a difference of opinion respecting parliamentary reform, in 1867. In Disraeli's cabinet in 1874 he was again colonial secretary. In 1878 he resigned upon the Eastern question. In 1885 he became lord-lieutenant of Ireland in Lord Salisbury's first administration, resigning in 1886. Here his policy was conciliatory, and he even secretly approached Parnell on the subject of Home Rule. But in this, as he subsequently made clear, he did not profess to speak for his colleagues.

Biography by Lady Carnarvon, 1925.

Herbert, SIDNEY, 1ST LORD HERBERT OF LEA (1810-61), entered parliament as member for Wiltshire in 1832, and attached himself to the party of Sir Robert Peel and the Conservatives. In 1841 Peel appointed him secretary of the admiralty, from which office he was promoted to be secretary for war in 1845. In common with almost every other member of Peel's government, he changed his views with regard to the question of protection, and became an ardent advocate of free trade. On Peel's death, Herbert, in company with Sir James Graham, Gladstone, and a few others, formed a party by themselves called "Peelites." When the Earl of Aberdeen became premier nearly the whole of the Peelites took office, and Herbert once more became secretary for war, but was not altogether successful as head of this department at the outbreak of the Crimean War. When Palmerston succeeded Aberdeen, Herbert was made colonial secretary. In 1859 he again became secretary for war under Palmerston, and introduced important reforms (including the development of the volunteer movement). In the midst of these labours his health began to fail. He was called to the Upper House by the title of Lord Herbert of Lea in 1860.

Herbert, SIR THOMAS (1606-82), was a member of the family of Pembroke, and had already distinguished himself as a traveller when, on the outbreak of the Civil War, he joined the Parliamentary party. He was employed as commissary of Fairfax's army, and when Charles I was betrayed by the Scots he was made one of the king's attendants. The "Threnodia Carolina," which he published in 1678, gives a minute account of Charles I's life during his imprisonment. He was made a baronet in 1660, but took no further part in public affairs, devoting himself almost exclusively to antiquarian researches. Sir Thomas Herbert published an account of his travels in 1634, and this work has been subsequently reprinted.

Herbert, THOMAS, 8TH EARL OF PEMBROKE and 5TH EARL OF MONTGOMERY (1656-1733), was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and succeeded to his brother's title in 1683. He raised the trained-bands of Wilts in order to suppress Monmouth's rebellion. In 1687 he was deprived of his lord-lieutenancy. He took part in the coronation ceremony of William and Mary, although he had voted for a regency, and was shortly afterwards sent as ambassador extraordinary to the States-General. Pembroke was sworn of the privy council, and put at the head of the admiralty commission. On the departure of William for Ireland he was placed on the Council of Nine, and was made lord privy seal in 1692. When the king went to the Netherlands to take command of the army he was appointed one of the lords justices. He voted against Fenwick's attainder. Pembroke was first plenipotentiary at the Treaty of Ryswick. He was created president of the council in place of Leeds in 1700; and by an able speech expressed the dislike of the Tory peers to the Resumption Bill. On the accession of Anne he was dismissed from the admiralty in order to make room for Prince George. He was one of the commissioners to treat of the Union with Scotland, and became lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1707. Pembroke was subsequently created president of the council, from which the Whigs attempted to thrust him in order to make room for Somers. On the death of Prince George he again became lord high admiral, but resigned in 1709 on receiving a pension. Before the arrival of George I in England Pembroke was one of the lords justices who carried on the administration. During the remainder of his long life he took but little part in politics. Although Pembroke played a prominent part during two reigns, we know hardly anything of his personal character. He was a moderate Tory in opinions, and seems to have carried out his official duties with zeal and integrity.

Burnet, "History of His Own Time," ed. O. Ayr, 2 vols., 1897-1900.

Herbert, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF PEMBROKE (second creation) (1501?-70), one of the most powerful men of his day, was employed in crushing the western rebellion in 1549, and as a reward was made master of the horse and president of the Council of Wales. In 1551 he was created Earl of Pembroke, and in conjunction with Warwick and Northampton virtually ruled England. At first deeply implicated in Northumberland's plot to set Lady Jane Grey on the throne, the earl soon found that his interests lay really on the other side; and on perceiving that the country was in favour of Mary, he proclaimed her at St. Paul's (July 19). In 1554 he threw the whole weight of his influence into the scale in favour of the queen, whom, however, he personally regarded with dislike; and it was owing in a great measure to his course of action that Sir Thomas Wyatt's rebellion was so easily suppressed in the following year. He was one of the commissioners sent to France to arrange for a general peace, and in 1556 led a reinforcement of troops to Calais to ward off the threatened French attack. On the accession of Elizabeth he accorded her his warmest support. In 1569 he was, however, arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the plot to marry the Duke of Norfolk to Mary, Queen of Scots, but he cleared himself at once, and was placed in command of part of the queen's army.

Hereford first appears in history as the place where Bishop Putta settled (676) for the exercise of his episcopal functions after he was obliged to leave Rochester. He probably acted, however, merely as a kind of suffragan for Saxulf, Bishop of Mercia, for the limits of the diocese of Hereford had not been fixed even by the end of the eighth century. Hereford was destroyed by Gruffyd of Wales in 1055, but was refortified by Harold in the same year. Its first charter dates from the reign of Richard I (1189). Hereford was famed as the shrine of St. Ethelbert, the martyred king of the East Saxons, and later of St. Thomas de Cantelupe (1275-83).

J. Duncombe, "History of Hereford," 1882.

Hereford, THE PEERAGES OF. The earldom of Hereford was held by William Fitz-Osbern, the Conqueror's justiciary, and by his son Roger. In 1140 the title was granted by the Empress Matilda to Milo of Gloucester, from whom it passed to his son, and then to the son of his daughter Margery, wife of Humphrey de Bohun. Seven earls were descended from the Bohun family, until its extinction in this branch, in 1372. [BOHUN, FAMILY OF.] In 1397 Henry of Bolingbroke, afterwards king, was created Duke of Hereford, a title which became merged in the Crown. In 1550 a viscounty of the same style was created for Walter Devereux, who was descended from Eleanor, daughter of the last earl of the Bohun family. Walter's son was made Earl of Essex (1572), but in the next generation Robert, the famous Earl of Essex, was attainted and beheaded (1601). His son Robert was restored in blood and honours in 1604, but died childless in 1646, when the viscounty of Hereford devolved upon his cousin, Sir Walter Devereux, in whose issue it still remains.

Hereford, EARLS OF. [BOHUN, FITZ-WILLIAM.]

Heresy, LEGISLATION CONCERNING. According to the canon law, heresy was a subject of ecclesiastical discipline. The suspected heretic was summoned before the bishop's court, was examined concerning his opinions, and was required to submit to the parental jurisdiction of his ecclesiastical father. If convicted, he submitted, did penance, confessed his errors, and amended his ways. The common law, in early times, took cognizance of heresy, but probably only in the case of those who were contumacious to their bishop, or relapsed after submission. Heresy was a subject of inquest at the sheriff's tourn, and the punishment of avowed unbelief was burning. But in early times there were very few cases of heresy, and it did not cause any serious trouble till the rise of Lollardy. In the Assize of Clarendon (q.v.) heresy is noted, but heretics are treated with a leniency contrasting strongly with the legislation of later times. The Lollard preachers refused to obey the citations of the bishops summoning them to answer for their opinions. In 1382 a statute was passed enacting that commissions should be directed to the sheriffs to arrest persons certified by the bishops to be heretics, and to keep them in prison until they satisfied the Church. Archbishop Courtenay drew up a series of fourteen propositions which were condemned as heretical. The king, by royal letter, empowered the bishops to imprison all who maintained the condemned propositions. The chief Lollard teachers in Oxford were tried, and made submission. But in the parliament of 1383 the Commons petitioned against the statute as not having received their consent. Though the statute was not repealed, no further proceedings were taken under it, though in 1391 Archbishop Arundel proceeded under the royal letters of 1382. The spread of Lollardy was, however, a source of political as well as ecclesiastical discontent, and in 1401 a severely repressive statute was passed, De Hæretico Comburendo (2 Henry IV, c. 15) (q.v.). By this act the bishop was empowered to arrest and imprison a heretic; he was bound to try him within three months; he had power to imprison or fine him, if he were convicted; if he refused to abjure, he was to be given over to the sheriff and publicly burned. During the session in which this act was passed, a Lollard preacher, William Sawtre (q.v.), was burned by the king's writ. Even the powers given by this statute were not found sufficient, and in 1406 the Commons petitioned the king to enact that all officers of the Crown should make inquest for heretics and present them for trial before parliament. Though the king gave his consent, nothing was done; possibly the archbishop objected to the confusion of spiritual and secular jurisdictions. But the principle contained in this petition was turned into a statute by Henry V in 1414. This statute expanded the law of 1401, and provided further that all justices should inquire after heretics, and deliver them to the ordinaries to be tried by the spiritual court. Heresy was now made an offence against the common law; and the secular arm was not merely used to support the spiritual power, but had the duty of initiating proceedings against offenders. This statute seems to have been sufficient to drive Lollardy underground, though not entirely to suppress it. The number of trials, however, under all these statutes was not numerous and the executions were few.

With the outbreak of the Reformation movement, heresy again became a crime and the use of the old statutes was revived. The executions for opinion during the sixteenth century were carried out by virtue of them, and the legislation of that period was concerned rather with determining what was heresy than how heretics were to be tried and punished. By a statute of 1533 offences against the see of Rome were declared not to be heresy. In 1539 the Act of the Six Articles (q.v.) declared what opinions were heretical. We need not follow the variations in this definition during the two succeeding reigns. On the accession of Elizabeth in 1559, former statutes were repealed. Heresy as a simple offence was visited by spiritual punishment in a spiritual court; contumacious or relapsed heretics, after conviction by a provincial synod, were handed over to the secular arm to be burned. At the same time heresy was defined to be such opinions as were contrary to (1) canonical scripture,

(2) the four general councils, (3) future declarations of parliament with the assent of convocation. Still Anabaptists were burnt under Elizabeth, and Arians under James I. The punishment of death for heresy was abolished under Charles II in 1677, and the heretic was subject only to ecclesiastical correction "pro salute animæ." An act of 1698 which made apostasy or denial of Christianity an offence liable to imprisonment still remains on the statute book, although long since obsolete. In the case of the clergy heresy is cognizable by the ecclesiastical courts, and in the last resort by the judicial committee of the privy council, but punishment is strictly limited to deprivation of benefice. [M. C.]

Heretoga (lit., the army leader) was the Anglo-Saxon title given originally to the commander of the army; but in later times it seems (like its Latin equivalent dux) to have become hereditary, and was sometimes used synonymously with the titles of "ealdorman" and "earl." Heretoga is the word used in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" to describe Hengest and Horsa; whereas Cerdic and Cynric are called "ealdormen."

Hereward (d. c. 1073), called the Wake, was, according to later legend, the son of Leofric, lord of Bourne, in Lincolnshire. Actually we can say nothing with confidence of his antecedents, except that he was a tenant of the abbey of Peterborough. On the news of the appointment of the Norman Turolde to the office of abbot in 1070, Hereward seems to have called in against him the Danes, who plundered the abbey. Subsequently the Peterborough tenants fortified themselves in the island of Ely under his leadership; and there continued their opposition to the Norman rule. Round him were soon gathered the bravest and most resolute of the English outlaws, Bishop Ethelwine of Durham, Siward, and even Earl Morkere. The fame of Hereward's courage was now spread abroad, and we read of an unsuccessful effort made by the men of Berkshire to join his camp. William therefore determined to crush, in person, a rebellion which was assuming such large proportions. Fixing his headquarters at Cambridge, he commenced a regular siege, and forced the greater part of the defenders to yield (1071), but Hereward with a few followers broke through the enemies' ranks and escaped. Legend asserted that he long continued his predatory incursions from the Brunescwald, but that he was in later times reconciled to William by the offices of his wife Elfthryth. According to Geoffrey Gaimar, William proposed to take him over to help in the reduction of Maine when that province revolted in 1073, and he was slain by private enemies on the eve of departure. Other authorities relate that he lived for many years and died peacefully. The details of his history are extremely obscure, owing to the mass of legendary material with which they were early overlaid.

Biography by T. N. Harward, 1896.

Heriot (a word derived from the Anglo-Saxon Here-geat, war-gear) was, in the later Middle Ages, the right of the lord on the death of his tenant to the best beast or the best chattel of which the tenant was possessed at the time of his death. It originated in the fact that the lord used to lend his vassal horse and armour for life, which on the tenant's death reverted to the lord. When by the tenth century land was being given instead of arms the heriot still continued to be paid, thus assuming something of the character of the feudal relief. The custom has continued down to the present day on copyhold land, though either the lord or the tenant can compel the extinction of the right. Heriot differs from relief, in the strict sense of the term, in that it is paid out of the estate of the last tenant, not by the heir.

Hermitage Castle, in Roxburghshire, is the place where Sir Alexander Ramsay was starved to death by the Knight of Liddesdale (1342). In January 1347 it was taken by the English. In later years it passed from the hands of the Douglasses to the Earl of Bothwell, who was visited there by Queen Mary after he had been wounded in a border fray, 1561.

Herrings, THE BATTLE OF THE (February 12, 1429), was fought near Rouvrai between the English and the French. The English had been besieging the town of Orleans since the summer of the year 1428, and Sir John Fastolf was commissioned to conduct a convoy of provisions for the use of the English army. The French made an effort to prevent its arrival at the besiegers' camp, and attacked Sir John, who had only 1,700 men under him, with very superior numbers. Sir John, however, entrenched his men behind the wagons, and succeeded in routing the enemy, finishing their confusion by ordering a charge when he perceived that his opponents were disorganized. This success seemed to have rendered the fall of Orleans almost unavoidable; and, indeed, the town must soon have surrendered had it not been for the appearance of Joan of Arc. The Battle of the Herrings was so named from the fact that a large part of the provisions conveyed by the English troops consisted of salted fish for the use of the besiegers during the Lenten fast.

Hertford was a place of considerable importance under the Anglo-Saxon kings. An ecclesiastical synod was held there by Theodore of Tarsus as early as the year 673. It was the site of one of the numerous burhs established by Edward the Elder at the beginning of the tenth century. After the Conquest a castle appears to have been erected at Hertford as one of the series of defences round London. It played a part of some importance in the baronial struggles of 1215-16, and was besieged and captured by Louis the Dauphin in December of the latter year. The castle and honour of Hertford were conferred on John of Gaunt in 1360.

Hervey, JOHN, BARON HERVEY OF ICKWORTH (1696-1743), eldest son of John, Earl of Bristol, by his second wife, succeeded to the courtesy title on the death of his half-brother in 1723. During most of his career he supported Walpole. In 1731 he fought a duel with Pulteney, on account of a libel against himself which Pulteney refused to disavow. Both combatants were slightly wounded. In 1740 he was appointed lord privy seal against the wish of the Duke of Newcastle, and subsequently he intrigued with Pulteney and Chesterfield against Sir Robert Walpole. In 1743 he distinguished himself by a speech against the Gin Act. Lord Hervey left behind him certain memoirs of his own time, which form a most valuable addition to the history of the period of which they treat. He had the misfortune to offend Pope, who has branded him under the pseudonym of Sporus in the "Prologue to the Satires."

Lord Hervey's "Memoirs of the Reign of George II" were first published by J. W. Croker in 1848.

Hexham, in Northumberland, was the site of a great abbey founded by Wilfrid about 673. Four or five years later it was constituted a bishopric, on the division of the diocese of York (678). After 821 no Bishop of Hexham was appointed, and the see was merged in that of Lindisfarne, which in 995 was transferred to Durham.

Hexham, THE BATTLE OF (May 15, 1464), was fought during the Wars of the Roses soon after the battle of Hedgeley Moor, by Montagu against Somerset and the remnant of the Lancastrians. The latter were totally defeated and Somerset captured and beheaded on the field. Henry IV found a refuge in Lancashire, while Margaret and her son fled to Flanders.

Hicks-Beach, SIR MICHAEL EDWARD, VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN (1837-1916), was parliamentary secretary to the poor law board from February till December 1868. In February 1874 he took office under Disraeli as chief secretary for Ireland. In 1878 he became colonial secretary, in 1885 chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the Lower House, in 1886 Irish secretary, in 1888 president of the board of trade, in 1895 chancellor of the exchequer. In 1905 he retired from active political life, and in 1906 was made Viscount St. Aldwyn.

Hidage was a tax assessed upon the hide in the Norman and early Angevin periods; and may be regarded as the successor of the Anglo-Saxon danegeld. (q.v.). The name "hidagium" seems also to have been given to a customary payment, which we find included in the thirteenth century in the farm of the shire, together with such payments as the sheriffs' aid.

Hide, THE, a measure of land. In Anglo-Saxon times it was generally regarded as the equivalent of the amount of land which would support one man and his family. Thus King Alfred substituted it for "one family's holding," in his translation of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History." The vagueness and at the same time the usefulness of such a word for an extent of land seem to be in keeping with what we know of the informal methods of surveying an estate in pre-Conquest days. But the vagueness of the word has caused a considerable controversy as to the sort of use it was put to as a uniform measurement of area. We may say that at the time of the Domesday inquest a hide generally approximated more closely to 120 acres than to any other figure, but this is not true for all counties, though it is supported by the evidence of later figures. The Domesday hide has been the centre of much discussion because the word itself is so generally used for the measurement of local resources and because a clear understanding of its significance in different contexts would give a clue to the meaning and purpose of the survey as a whole. The Domesday commissioners generally treat the hide as the area served by a plough team of eight oxen, or (since we cannot believe that so large a team was habitually employed) as the area for the ploughing of which eight oxen could be allotted, allowing for part of the land being under fallow each year. A fourth part of the hide is called a virgate and can be served by two oxen. Domesday Book further permits the calculation that a virgate is equal to 30 acres. Thus, 1 hide = 4 virgates = 120 acres. But in Wiltshire we find a virgate of 10 acres and similar aberrations elsewhere. So confusing are some of the results which Domesday calculations offer that we are forced to conclude that the hide which pays geld in the survey is not a definite areal unit at all, but a convenient extent which varies from place to place according to tradition, to the quality of soil, to the efficiency of the local system of farming, and finally, according to the generosity of the Conqueror when he assessed an estate for the payment of geld. If leniency were shown to a landlord the geld hide of Domesday would be more than the normal 120 acres, and the aggregate to be paid would consequently be less than a more rigid assessment would have allowed.

The hide may even have been a fiscal unit from the very beginning.

High Church. This term first appears about 1703 to designate that party in England which demanded the strict enforcement of the laws against Dissenters, and the passing of such additional measures as the Occasional Conformity Bill; it was, in fact, practically synonymous with Tory. In more modern times, however, it is only used to denote those members of the Church of England who hold certain doctrines, and the name has by analogy been given to the party associated with similar doctrines in the seventeenth century. Under Elizabeth the majority of the bishops, and of the more zealous clergy, were Calvinist in theology. Episcopacy was defended as a matter of expediency; conformity was only enforced for the sake of order, and because it was part of the established law. But towards the end of the reign a party arose among the younger clergy, who "met Calvinism by the assertion of its inconsistency with the ancient doctrine and constitution of the primitive Church, and the claim of a divine right for the Presbyterian polity by claiming a divine right for Episcopacy. They asserted against the individualism of the Puritan theology and worship the reality of sacramental grace, of the power of absolution, of the authoritative ritual of the Church" (Dr. Barry). Of this school the most important writer was Bishop Andrewes (1555-1626), the most active practical leader, Laud (1573-1645). It did not become prominent till the later years of James I. That king, though a firm supporter of Episcopacy, and of the established ecclesiastical system, was of distinctly Calvinist sympathies. But his love of order tended to make him favour the growing party; and in 1616 Laud, its leader at Oxford, was appointed to the deanery of Gloucester, to put an end to the irregularities in the cathedral worship which the Calvinist bishop of that see had allowed. He at once caused the communion table to be removed from the middle of the choir to the east end of the chancel, and placed "altarwise." But his example was not largely followed; and it was not till 1622 that Laud gained much political power. In that year he had taken part in a discussion with the Jesuit Fisher, on the relative claims of the English and Roman Churches, in order to prevent if possible the conversion to Rome of Buckingham's mother. His ability then secured for him considerable influence over Buckingham, and access to Prince Charles, to whom, upon his accession, he became chief adviser in ecclesiastical matters. The new teaching rapidly spread; in its protest against the dogmatic definitions of Calvinism on predestination, it resembled, and was doubtless influenced by, the Arminianism of Holland; so that, in spite of their protests, the term Arminian was generally applied to the members of the party. In 1624 a reply by one of them (Montagu) to a Roman Catholic pamphlet, wherein he had denied that the popular Calvinist doctrines were the creed of the Church of England, called forth a remonstrance from the Commons. Montagu, however, gained the king's sympathy, and wrote a second book, "Appello Cæsarem," to explain the same principles. The movement represented by Montagu was, however, almost entirely a learned movement; it had little hold upon the country gentry or town traders, and irritated them by exalting the royal prerogative. In 1625 the Commons attacked the second book, and Montagu was committed for a short time to the custody of the serjeant. But Charles was now king, and Laud was supreme in Church matters. Laud was requested to draw up a list of orthodox and Puritan clergy, that preferment might be reserved for the former; and in 1628 Montagu became Bishop of Chichester, and Laud himself Bishop of London. In the previous year Dr. Cosin had prepared for the use of the queen's attendants a book of devotions, which gave to the new teaching an expression startling to the ordinary Englishman of the time; and the declaration prefixed to the Articles in 1629, which was intended to put an end to controversy, still further annoyed the Puritan clergy. In the parliament of 1628-9 the storm broke, and one of the celebrated three resolutions of 1629 was to the effect that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or seek to extend Popery or Arminianism, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and the commonwealth." Undeterred by this expression of national feeling, Laud, now archbishop, revived in 1634 the disused right of metropolitanical visitation, and everywhere caused the communion table to be removed to the east end, fortified by a decision of the king in privy council, which was of more than doubtful legality. Laud's action aroused bitter opposition among the clergy, and was one of the main causes of the Civil War. [ARMINIANS.]

The Act of Uniformity of 1662 almost completely removed from the English Church the Puritan element; at the same time the country gentry rallied round the Church, and Anglo-Catholic teaching no longer met with the opposition it had encountered in the first half of the century. But as the Church had identified itself with the doctrine of passive obedience, it was with great reluctance that the main body of the clergy took the oath to William III; eight bishops and 400 clergy preferred to suffer deprivation, and created the non-juring schism. But though the Church was thus weakened, legitimist feeling, associated with the doctrine of non-resistance, revived under Anne, who was known to favour the Tories and the claims of her brother, the Old Pretender. A bitter warfare of words began, between High and Low Church, the latter term meaning the Whig clergy, most of them Latitudinarian, with a few Calvinists. Swift declares, "our State parties, the more to inflame their passions, have mixed religious and civil animosities together, borrowing both their appellations from the Church, with the addition of 'High' and 'Low,' how little soever the disputes relate to these terms." The tide quickly rose; in 1705 Hoadly (q.v.), preaching against the doctrine of passive obedience, was condemned by the lower house of convocation; and in 1710 the impeachment of Sacheverell, for his sermon on non-resistance, brought about the victory of the Tory—i.e., the High Church—party. Their period of power (1710-14) was marked by the passing of the Occasional Conformity and Schism Acts, by the building of fifty new churches in London, and by the temporary withdrawal of the Regium Donum from the Irish Presbyterians. But the political ill-success of Tories and Jacobites reacted on the Church, and when convocation was prorogued in 1717, and not again allowed to meet, the clergy were unable to create any popular movement in their favour. During the earlier part of the eighteenth century the majority of the bishops were Whig and Low—i.e., Latitudinarian—while the mass of the clergy were Tory and High. But the old doctrinal questions ceased to be discussed; popular preaching concerned itself with morality, and theological controversy touched rather the foundation of Christianity than its superstructure. Soon after the beginning of George III's reign, however, the Puritan remnant in the Church were roused to fresh life by the Wesleyan movement, and by the beginning of the next century the Evangelical party had gained a preponderating influence in the English Church.

It was in these circumstances that the Tractarian movement began at Oxford in 1833. It was thought by several that the only way to meet the ecclesiastical changes threatened by the Whigs (it was the year of the suppression of ten Irish bishoprics) was to fall back on the teaching of the seventeenth-century English divines. The "real founder" of this party, according to Dr. Blunt, was Hugh James Rose, who was soon joined by John Henry Newman, John Keble, Edward Bouverie Pusey, Hurrell Froude, William Palmer, and Isaac Williams. These began the series of "Tracts for the Times," which brought about a rapid increase of their numbers, and excited the fiercest opposition. In 1841 the "Remonstrance of Four Tutors" (including A. C. Tait, afterwards archbishop) led to the condemnation by the Hebdomadal Council of Newman's Tract No. 90. Four years later W. G. Ward was censured for a treatise by the convocation of the University of Oxford, though the proctors prevented Newman's name being included. In 1845 Newman joined the Roman Church. In spite of this and other secessions, the party continued to spread. In the Denison case (1856) a sentence of deprivation pronounced by Archbishop Sumner upon a clergyman for certain teaching as to the Eucharist was reversed by the judicial committee of the privy council, though on technical grounds; and in the Bennett case (1872), high sacramental teaching was distinctly declared permissible. The revival of Anglo-Catholic doctrine had been accompanied by a renewed interest in archæology, and by improved ecclesiastical architecture, under the influence of Pugin and Scott. The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, failed to suppress the return to pre-Reformation usages known as "Ritualism," though several clergymen were imprisoned under it. Archbishop Benson's judgment in the Bishop of Lincoln's case (delivered November 21, 1890; confirmed on appeal to the judicial committee, August 2, 1892) has increased the latitude permissible in ritual.

Far the best account of the seventeenth-century movement will be found in S. R. Gardiner, "History of England, 1603-42," edn. 1903. High Commission, THE COURT OF, was the name given to a judicial committee instituted in the reign of Elizabeth to investigate ecclesiastical cases. Edward VI and Mary frequently had recourse to the plan of exercising their jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters through special commissioners. General commissions were issued by Edward in 1549 and 1551 to a number of royal councillors, theologians, and lawyers, to inquire into heresy and nonconformity, and a somewhat similar commission appeared in 1557, though in this case it was restricted to inquiry, and further action was left to the bishops' courts. The statute (1 Eliz. c. 1) restoring the royal jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical empowered the queen to nominate commissioners to exercise this power; accordingly two months later (July 1559) a commission was directed to inquire, "as well by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, as also by witnesses, and other ways and means ye can devise," into offences against the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, heresy, adulteries, and other ecclesiastical crimes. The subsequent commissions were drawn on the model of this one. In the reign of James I frequent disputes arose with the common-law courts as to the limits of the power of the High Commission; in 1611 Coke laid down that it had no right to fine or imprison, except in cases of heresy and schism. During the whole of its existence the court busied itself in enforcing uniformity. It was abolished by the Long Parliament (July 1641). In spite of the act of 1641, and that of 1661 confirming it, James II created a new Court of Commission for ecclesiastical causes (1686). It was abolished by the Bill of Rights.

High Court of Justice, THE (Ireland), was established in 1652. It was intended that it should try all Catholics who had shed Protestant blood, otherwise than in open battle, since 1641. Altogether some 200 persons were convicted.

High Treason. [TREASON, THE LAW OF.]

Highlands, THE, OF SCOTLAND, in a strictly geographical sense seem to begin in the south near Loch Lomond, and thence to be separated from the Lowlands by the great valley of Strathmore. But from an historical point of view the word must be considered to embrace the Celtic-speaking part of Scotland. In the eighth century there appear to have been seven provinces, each ruled by its own ri, or king, who had a sub-king dependent on him. The names of these provinces (with the sub-provinces also), so far as can now be ascertained, were (1) Angus and Mearns, (2) Atholl and Gowrie, (3) Strathearn and Menteith, (4) Fife and Fothreve, (5) Mar and Buchan, (6) Moray and Ross, (7) Caithness and Sutherland. Under the kings of Alban and of Scotia (889-1092) we have still seven provinces bearing more or less relation to the earlier seven. At this period these provinces are no longer ruled by kings and sub-kings, but each has its own mormaer, or great steward. Meanwhile, in the extreme north, Harold Harfagr had, about the year 890, given the Orkneys to Jarl Sigurd to be held subject to the King of Norway. By the end of the tenth century the earls of Orkney had conquered all the country north of the Spey. But when Sigurd of Orkney was slain at the battle of Clontarf (1014) (q.v.), while the Orkney Isles passed to his elder sons, to be held of the king of Norway, we read that his younger son, Thorfinn, was sent to Malcolm's court, and there invested with the jarldoms of Caithness and Sutherland. But Moray and Ross now fell off from both Norse and Scots dependency, and were ruled by their own ri, Finleikr. By the time of Duncan's accession (1034) Thorfinn had united the Orkneys to his original jarldom of Caithness, and the Scottish king attempted to confer the latter province on his nephew Moddan, and even went so far as to support his right by arms. It was on this occasion that Macbeth, the Mormaer or Ri of Moray, deserted, and perhaps murdered the Scots king (1040). Scotland was now divided between Thorfinn and Macbeth. It was probably on the death of Thorfinn (c. 1057) that Duncan's son, Malcolm Canmore, was able to drive back Macbeth. About the same time the other earldoms of Thorfinn seem to have been recovered by their native mormaers, subject probably to vague claims on the part of Malcolm as ard ri or head-king. It is during the years 1107 and 1124, when Malcolm's son Alexander was reigning over the Celtic part of Scotland north of the Forth, that we come across the first mention of the seven earls—four of whom certainly, and probably all seven, represented the old mormaers who, having lost their original title of ri, were now changing their later one for the Latin comes. During the reign of David I (1124–53) Moray rose in rebellion under its mormaer, Angus, but the rising was suppressed and the province was far more firmly than ever united to the Scottish crown. Ross was thoroughly subdued by William the Lion in 1179, though an attempt was made a few years later to separate the districts north of the Tay from the rest of Scotland by setting up a new king, Donald Bane MacWilliam, who combined in his own person Norse blood with that of Malcolm Canmore. After the suppression of this insurrection (1187) William forced Harold, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, to acknowledge his dependence on the Scottish king as regards the half of the latter province by the payment of 2,000 merks (1202); while Sutherland, the other half, ultimately became an earldom in the family of De Freschin of Moray (1230). On the death of the last Norwegian Earl of Caithness, in 1231, his lands were divided between the last-mentioned family and that of the Earl of Angus. Lastly, about the year 1232, the sole remaining Celtic province of Argyll seems to have submitted to Alexander II. But, though the whole county was now nominally subject to one king, yet there was a broad line of demarcation between that part of Scotland which had become thoroughly feudalized, and had been so long subject to the head-king at Scone or Edinburgh, and the Celtic-speaking districts of the north and west. In 1411 Donald, Lord of the Isles, who claimed the earldom of Moray, was defeated by the Earl of Mar at the great battle of Harlaw (q.v.), which seems to have finally checked the dangers threatened by the growth of this Celtic and Highland power. From this time onwards the incursions of the Highlanders on the Lowlands were limited to occasional plundering raids. Till the eighteenth century the Highland districts remained a province inhabited by an alien and semi-barbarous people; and though nominally part of the kingdom of Scotland, it was in fact ruled by the various tribal chiefs under their own laws and customs. In the wars of the seventeenth century the Highlanders were easily enlisted on the side of the Stuarts against the Covenanters; and they made the last stand both under Montrose and Dundee. After the suppression of the rebellion of 1715, a determined attempt was made to break up the tribal organization. Acts were passed (1716 and 1725) ordering the Highlanders to be disarmed, and the disarmament was effected by General Wade (1725). The same officer also completed between 1726 and 1737 the great military roads through the Highlands, by means of which, together with a chain of fortified military posts, a vigorous police was established, and plundering stopped. A happy idea was conceived of utilizing the military instincts of the Highlanders for the service of the country, and regiments of Highland troops were embodied in the regular army. In 1746 the national dress was prohibited in the Highlands by act of parliament (19 Geo. II, c. 39, repealed 22 Geo. III, c. 63). Under the influence of these measures the Highlands gradually became as peaceable and orderly as the rest of Scotland, and by the beginning of the nineteenth century little was left to mark their distinctive character except the survival in many districts of the native language.

HILL, ROWLAND, 1ST LORD HILL (1772–1842), second son of Sir John Hill, a Shropshire baronet, was educated at Chester, and at sixteen entered the army. He was sent as secretary on a diplomatic mission to Genoa, whence he proceeded to Toulon, and acted during the siege as aide-de-camp to Lord Mulgrave, and afterwards to David Dundas. He was wounded, and, returning to England, was soon promoted to be lieutenant-colonel of the 90th, with which he went to Egypt (1801). In the battle of Alexandria he was severely wounded. In 1805 he became a major-general, and was dispatched to the Peninsula on the first outbreak of war. He served at Rolica and Vimeiro, and at Corunna commanded Sir John Moore's reserve. In 1811 he succeeded to the command of General Paget's corps, and continued to be one of Wellington's most trustworthy officers. He was present in high command at nearly all the battles of the war, and always acquitted himself well on the many occasions on which Wellington entrusted him with a separate command. After his success at Almaraz, where he destroyed the enemy's works after a most desperate resistance, he was raised to the peerage (May 1814). He afterwards served at Waterloo, was personally thanked by Wellington for his services there and elsewhere, and was second in command of the army of occupation in France in 1815. He was appointed commander-in-chief in 1828. He was a brave and able soldier, beloved and entirely trusted by his men, with whom his relations are best understood by the nickname which they gave him of "Daddy Hill."

Hill, Sir Rowland (1795-1879), was born at Kidderminster. In early life he was a schoolmaster. His attention had been directed to the question of Australian colonization, and, as secretary to Gilbert Wakefield's scheme for settling that country, he wrote a pamphlet on "Home Colonies." It was in 1837 that he issued his paper on "Post Office Reform." By a series of careful investigations and calculations he had arrived at the conclusion that, as the chief expenses of letter-carrying were not in the carriage itself but in the distribution of the letters, the distance might be disregarded, and a uniform charge made for the conveyance of all home letters to any distance. He also showed how the almost nominal charge of one penny for every half-ounce would, in view of the great increase in correspondence likely to ensue on such a reduction of cost, yield an ample profit on the transaction; and, at the same time, he suggested the use of postage-stamps. Despite the opposition offered to so entirely novel a scheme, a committee was appointed by the House of Commons to investigate the question (1837); and when Rowland Hill's proposals received its approbation, a bill was at once brought in for carrying out the new project (1839). On January 10, 1840, the penny rate was inaugurated. Rowland Hill was appointed to an office in the treasury, for the purpose of superintending the execution of his reforms, but had to retire in 1842, when the Liberals were out of office. In 1846 he was presented with £13,000, as a mark of public gratitude, and when the Liberals returned to office in the same year he was made secretary to the postmaster-general. In 1860 he was knighted, and when he resigned through ill-health (1864) he was allowed to retain his full salary of £2,000 a year.

Biography by E. C. Smyth, 1907.

Hoadly, Benjamin (1676-1761), successively Bishop of Bangor, Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester, was educated at Catharine Hall, Cambridge. When he removed to London he appeared as the antagonist of Calamy on the question of conformity, and of Bishop Atterbury on that of non-resistance. He was a staunch Low Churchman. In 1705 he was attacked in the House of Lords by the Bishop of London for having advocated the duty of resistance and countenanced rebellion, in a sermon preached before the lord mayor. Burnet, in reply to this speaker, told him that he was the last person who ought to complain of the sermon in question. A few years later Hoadly was one of the most prominent opponents of Dr. Sacheverell (q.v.). In 1715 he was appointed Bishop of Bangor, and next year published his famous tract against the Non-jurors. This was quickly followed (1717) by the issue of his sermon on the Kingdom of Christ, printed by royal command. Both these works were devoted to questioning the divine authority of the king and the clergy, and were the occasion of the famous Bangorian Controversy. The matter was at once taken up by convocation, and led to such wrangling and discord that this body was suddenly prorogued by the government. From this time (1717) till the year 1852 convocation was allowed to meet only as a matter of form. Dr. Hoadly was translated to the sees of Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester in the years 1721, 1723, and 1734 respectively, and died at Chelsea.

Hobbes, Thomas (1588-1679), was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree as bachelor of arts in 1608. The same year he was appointed tutor to the eldest son of the future Earl of Devonshire, and accompanied his pupil in his continental tour. Before the year 1620 he seems to have become acquainted with Francis Bacon, and was employed by him on the Latin version of the "Essays." In 1631 he undertook the education of the new Earl of Devonshire, his former pupil's son. While abroad with this boy he made the acquaintance of Galileo, and spent several months at Paris, returning home in 1637. It was about this time that he began his philosophic career. In 1642 the "De Cive" was printed; in 1650 his "De Corpore Politico" (English in everything but its title), and in 1651 the "Leviathan," which made him famous. Charles II, who had once been Hobbes's pupil in mathematics, gave his old teacher a pension of £100 a year after the Restoration, and hung his portrait in his private room. After the Great Fire of London a bill levelled against the "Leviathan" was introduced into the House of Commons, and passed early in the next year (1667). The "Behemoth," or history of the Civil War, was published 1679, just before its author's death, but without his consent. The last years of his life were spent in Derbyshire; and his literary labours were continued till the very end, in the quiet of the country. Hobbes's influence on philosophical thought has been equalled by few English writers. Even greater has been his influence upon political and ethical speculation. He aimed at finding a scientific explanation for the phenomena of man in society, and this gave an impulse to a movement of thought which has been followed by English thinkers ever since. His main political conception was that of the right of all men to seek their own happiness, and their tendency to seek it, even at the expense of their fellows. In a state of nature the selfishness of every man would have free play, and would be limited only by the selfishness of others. The state of nature, therefore, would be a state of warfare and of suffering. Government had been instituted to limit this; and government in its perfect form should have absolute control over civil, moral, and ecclesiastical affairs alike.

The demonstration of the supremacy and irresponsibility of the sovereign power in a state, which is one of the most remarkable features in his philosophy, caused Hobbes to be often classed with the defenders of despotism, and roused against him the champions of constitutionalism and of ecclesiastical freedom in his own day; but at a later time the conception formed the foundation of the theory of utilitarian legislation, which was worked into a regular system by the school of Bentham (q.v.).

The works of Hobbes have been edited by Sir W. Molesworth, 16 vols., London, 1839-45; biographies by G. E. G. Catlin, 1922, and Sir Leslie Stephen, 1904. [S. L.]

Hobhouse, JOHN CAM, LORD BROUGH-TON (1786-1869), the eldest son of Sir Benjamin Hobhouse, was an intimate friend of Lord Byron, accompanying him on his travels in 1809, and during his first visit to Turkey and Greece. He adopted advanced Liberal views in politics, and was a zealous advocate of parliamentary reform. In 1816 he wrote a work called "Letters written by an English Gentleman resident at Paris," which gave great offence to the English government. In December 1819, in consequence of one of these letters, which was declared a breach of privilege by the Commons, he was arrested and imprisoned in Newgate, but was liberated a few weeks after, when parliament was dissolved by the death of George IV, in 1820. The same year he was elected with Sir F. Burdett member for Westminster. In 1832 he joined Earl Grey's government as secretary for war. In 1833 he was appointed chief secretary for Ireland; and in 1834 chief commissioner of woods and forests. He was president of the board of control from 1835 to 1841; and again from 1846 to 1852. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1831; and was raised to the peerage as Baron Broughton in 1851.

Holkar is the family name of one of the chief dynasties of Mahratta princes, ruling, since 1736, the principality of Indore. In 1774 Tuckagi Holkar took a prominent part in the war against the British. He was defeated by Colonel Goddard in 1782, and subsequently joined the British alliance against Tippoo Sahib.

Holkar, JESWUNT RAO (d. 1811), was a turbulent freebooter who allied with the British troops in India to win the battle of Poona (1802) against the Peshwa and Sindhia. He then rejected the British alliance, besieged Delhi (1804), and was chased by Lake and his army dissipated. The Treaty of Raipur Ghaut (1806) was forced on him, but Sir John Shore permitted him to plunder in Rajputana, where domestic intrigues drove him mad and he died in 1811.

Holland, HENRY, DUKE OF EXETER (d. 1475), was the son of John, Duke of Exeter. He was one of the principal leaders of the Lancastrian party, though he married Anne, daughter of Richard, Duke of York. He fought in the battles of Blore Heath, Northampton, St. Albans, and Towton, and after Towton he escaped to Scotland, and was attainted by Edward IV. He fled to Flanders, where, according to Froissart, he was in such abject poverty that he was obliged to beg his bread in the streets. He afterwards returned to England and fought in the battle of Barnet, where he was left for dead on the field. He recovered, and was apparently set at liberty after several years' imprisonment, to participate in the expedition to France in 1475. He was drowned between Calais and Dover when returning from this expedition.

Holland, THOMAS (d. 1400), was the eldest son of the Earl of Kent, and nephew of Richard II. In 1397 he was made Duke of Surrey, but was degraded by Henry IV in 1399 as a partisan of the deposed king. In 1400, being implicated in a plot against Henry IV, he was beheaded.

Holland, RELATIONS WITH. The name Holland, properly belonging to the Imperial county of that name, which subsequently became the leading state of the Republic of Seven United Provinces, is commonly used loosely for the United Provinces as a whole; and, though the official title of the modern kingdom is the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the same inexact designation is still applied to it. With the mediæval county of Holland the relations of England were frequent and friendly. Count William I fought for Otto IV at Bouvines, and, subsequently changing sides, followed Louis, the son of Philip II, to England in 1215. Floris V established intimate relations with Edward I, got the wool-staple placed at Dort, and secured fishing rights on the English coast. But in 1296 he reverted to the French connexion. His son, John I, restored the alliance by his marriage with a daughter of Edward I. The new Hainault line was again closely bound to England by the marriage of Philippa, daughter of William III, to Edward III (1328). On his son's death in 1345, Edward and Philippa made an ineffectual attempt to seize the country. In the next century the attempt of Humphrey of Gloucester to win Holland and the counties attached to it for his wife Jacqueline was the means of breaking up the Anglo-Burgundian alliance which had given the English mastery of France. On his failure, Holland became included in the Burgundian dominions, which the accession of Charles V transferred to Spain. Burgundy and Spain were both English allies, and so the old friendship was kept up. Intimate commercial relations still further tightened the bonds of union between the two countries.

The Reformation, which broke up the alliance of England and Spain, led to the revolt of the Protestants of Holland from the absolutism and Catholicism of the Spanish monarchy. England, under Elizabeth, was also engaged in a life-and-death struggle with Spain. This ultimately compelled the queen, despite her reluctance both to help rebels against their sovereign and to take a decided Protestant line, to afford the revolted Hollanders very material assistance. At first English help took the form of secret subvention or popular subscriptions, or of the willing bands of volunteers who flocked to join a Protestant cause. Subsequently the queen assisted the Dutch in a more formal way. Elizabeth's first decided intervention began with the lavish grants to her lover, the Duke of Anjou, who aspired to lead the southern provinces of the Netherlands, but on his disastrous failure, and the murder of William the Silent in 1584, Elizabeth, though declining the proffered sovereignty of the Seven Provinces, sent her favourite Leicester as governor-general with a small army, receiving in return some "cautionary towns." In 1586 Sidney fell at Zutphen (q.v.). In 1587 Leicester's incompetence necessitated his recall. In 1588 the Dutch did good service by blocking up in their ports the army of Parma which the great Armada (q.v.) hoped to land in England. Up to the date of Elizabeth's death relations with the Hollanders continued cordial, and materially assisted their efforts for liberty.

With James I a new epoch began. That monarch's peace with Spain was followed by the restitution of the cautionary towns, and the growing theological differences between the two countries and the increasing rivalry between English and Dutch merchants produced a deeply-rooted and enduring hostility. When the Twelve Years' Truce with Spain (1609-21) came to an end, James's sympathies were altogether Spanish. Holland found in France the protector she had lost in England. The Amboyna massacre (1623) was but the prelude to a long struggle of the two naval powers in the East Indies. The eventful marriage of the Stadtholder, Frederick Henry, with Mary, daughter of Charles I (1641) rather increased than diminished the hostility of England and Holland. Flushed with the glorious recognition of their liberty by the Treaties of Westphalia (1648), the Dutch plunged into their famous naval war with England. The passing by the Long Parliament of the Navigation Act (q.v.—1651) dealt a deadly blow at the Dutch carrying trade, and the war which ensued, from 1651 to 1654, was on the whole unfavourable to Holland. The restoration of the Stuarts, closely followed by the re-enactment of the Navigation Act, rather intensified the opposition of the Amsterdam oligarchs to their commercial rival. The second war (1665-7) was on the whole favourable to the Dutch, though the Treaty of Breda (q.v.) lost them New Amsterdam. In 1667 the two powers united to check Louis XIV by the Triple Alliance; but in 1670 Charles II signed a treaty with France to partition Holland, as Charles I had nearly forty years earlier concluded a similar treaty with Spain. In 1672 Charles joined Louis in his great attack on Holland. But common political hostility to the tyrant of Europe now proved so strong a bond of union between England and Holland that even commercial rivalry was powerless to separate them. The restoration of the house of Orange personally united the two courts; and the marriage of William III with Mary of York (1667) completed the alliance. The Revolution which brought William to England made it indissoluble. Henceforward the "Maritime Powers," as Great Britain and Holland were now called, had a common policy and common interests. Marlborough simply continued the work of William of Orange. But the narrow basis of Dutch prosperity now began to show itself. It was perhaps only because Great Britain had won the commercial race that her alliance with Holland had become possible. Though the Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.) gave the Dutch all they could wish, they gradually sank into a decided condition of dependence on their great ally. It was British influence, now extended to internal affairs, that made William IV, the son-in-law of George II, Stadtholder in 1747. But George's grandson, William V, was a weak ruler; and despite his sympathy with George III, the rising Dutch democracy, which warmly supported the American colonists, insisted on Holland adopting the "Armed Neutrality" (q.v.—1780), and rushed into a naval war with Great Britain. But the glory of Holland had now departed, and the States willingly accepted an inglorious peace in 1783 [VERSAILLES]. In 1787 the British and Prussians combined to restore the Stadtholder, an act which led directly to the conquest of Holland by the French Republic, with the approbation of the Dutch democracy. Holland was forced to lend its naval strength to France, and remained in antagonism to Great Britain until 1815. It was largely through British influence that the Congress of Vienna erected Holland and Belgium into a kingdom under the house of Orange. In 1830, after the revolt of Belgium, Great Britain and France blockaded the Dutch ports, and insisted on the signature of the Convention of London in 1833, giving Belgium independence. The territory had been determined, and its neutrality guaranteed by the five great powers in 1831. [This settlement was not recognized by Holland until 1839.]

Holles, DENZIL, LORD (1599-1680), was the younger son of John Holles, 1st Earl of Clare. On entering parliament (1624) he joined the popular party, and was one of the most ardent opponents of Buckingham. On March 2, 1629, when the Speaker was about to adjourn the House in obedience to the king's order, Holles forced him back into his chair, for which act he was fined a thousand marks and imprisoned. At the opening of the Long Parliament he was much valued and esteemed by the whole popular party. In the year 1644 he was one of the commissioners sent to Oxford to negotiate with the king; similarly at Uxbridge in 1645. He showed himself very anxious to effect a reconciliation, and was consequently accused of treachery by Lord Savile. Holles was the leader of the Presbyterian party in their contest with the Independents and with the army. In August 1647 he was excluded from the House of Commons, returned to share the short triumph of the Presbyterians, and was forced again to take refuge in Normandy, and to console himself by attacking Cromwell in his "Memoirs." Holles reappeared in parliament in 1659, and was spokesman of the deputation of the Commons sent to Breda. Six months later he sat in the court which judged the regicides, and was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Holles in 1661. In 1663 he was sent as ambassador to Paris, recalled in 1666, and negotiated the Treaty of Breda in 1667, but utterly disapproved of the foreign policy of Charles. "Save what the government of the Parliament did," he wrote, "we have not taken one true step or struck one true stroke, since Queen Elizabeth's time." His last public act was to vote for the acquittal of Lord Stafford (1680). He died February 17, 1680.

Holy Alliance, THE, was formed by a treaty concluded at Paris on September 26, 1815, between Alexander I, Emperor of Russia, Francis I, Emperor of Austria, and Frederick William I, King of Prussia, without the intervention of their ministers. The Emperor of Russia was the instigator of the step, and he is supposed to have taken it under the influence of Madame Krudener, a visionary pietist. The main points of the agreement were as follows: (1) European Christendom was regarded as forming a single family; "the only principle either between governments or subjects is to regard themselves as members of the same Christian nation, the three allied princes considering themselves as delegated by Providence to govern three branches of the same family." (2) Three states, representing three forms of Christianity, the Greek Church, the Roman Church, and Protestantism, were asked to rise above their differences, and to form a union depending on their common agreement. (3) Christianity was proclaimed as the foundation of all government and all civilization, "the sublime truths which are taught us by the eternal religion of a God Saviour." "The present act has no other object than to show in the face of the universe the determination to adopt no other rule of conduct, either in the administration of government, or in the political relations with other governments, than the precepts of this holy religion, precepts of justice, charity, and peace," which were as well fitted to guide the public acts of princes as they were to guide the lives of private persons, and the only means to consolidate human institutions and remedy their imperfections. (4) The three sovereigns declared themselves bound together by the ties of a true and indissoluble fraternity. (5) They were to consider themselves in the light of fathers to their subjects. The treaty was offered for signature to all European powers, except the pope and the sultan. Great Britain alone declined to accede to it, but the Prince Regent declared his personal adherence to its principles. [O. B.]

[For over ten years the policy of the so-called "Holy Alliance" was a dominant factor in European relations. It took visible shape in the congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle (1817), Troppau and Laibach (1820-1), and Verona (1822). By declining to countenance French intervention in Spain Canning dealt the congress system a severe blow, and definitely withdrew Great Britain from the "Concert of Europe" into a policy of non-intervention hostile to the paternal interference of the three autocrats. In 1827 he destroyed the alliance by joining Russia to Great Britain and France in the Treaty of London (q.v.).]

Holyrood Abbey was founded by David I in 1128. It was plundered by the English in 1332 and 1385, and destroyed by Hertford in 1544. The foundation was suppressed in 1547. Holyrood Palace was made a royal residence by James V in 1528, and became the dwelling-place of the kings of Scotland. It was the scene of the murder of Rizzio in 1566. Charles I was crowned there in 1633. In 1650 it was partly destroyed by Cromwell's troops. In 1745 it was for a short time occupied by the Young Pretender and in 1830 by the exiled Charles X of France. After being allowed to fall almost into ruins it was repaired in 1850, and again in 1903.

Homage (homagium, sometimes hominium from homo, through the earlier Latin form hominaticum) was that profession of feudal subjection which the vassal (homo) made to his lord on receiving a fief from his hands. It could only be received by the lord himself. With solemn ceremonies the vassal uncovered his head, laid aside sword and spear, and knelt before his suzerain, and, placing his hands between those of the lord, formally declared, "I become your man for the lands which I hold of you, and will be faithful to you against all men, saving the fealty which I owe to my lord the king." The oath of fealty and the grant of the fief followed the formula of homage. Every free feudal tenant on acquiring his property was compelled to do homage to his lord. Besides liege or unconditional homage, as mentioned above, there was also simple homage. If a tenant held land of several different lords, he could only perform liege homage, and swear unconditional fealty to one—his liege lord. This was usually the lord who had made the oldest of the feoffments. Homage to the others had to be done, saving the faith due to the liege. There was also a homage that involved no feudal duties, such as the Palatine earls proffered to the English kings, or such as the great peers of France or the Duke of Normandy performed to the King of France (homagium per paragium).

Home Office, THE, was created in 1782 when the conduct of foreign affairs, hitherto shared between the two secretaries for the northern and southern departments, passed wholly to the secretary for the northern department [FOREIGN OFFICE]. The secretary for the southern department was known henceforth as the home secretary. His business included Irish and colonial matters until the addition of a new secretary of state in 1794 [COLONIAL OFFICE]. The home secretary is responsible chiefly for the maintenance of the king's peace, the administration of criminal justice, police and prisons, and the enforcement of rules laid down to safeguard national safety and national health. His departmental staff includes a permanent and parliamentary under-secretary, several assistant under-secretaries, and clerks.

Home Rule Movement. [IRELAND.]

Homildon Hill, THE BATTLE OF (September 1402), was fought near Wooler in Northumberland, between a marauding party of Scots under Douglas, and an English force under the Percys. The victory was won for the English by the archers, there being little or no fighting at close quarters.

Homilies, THE BOOK OF. In the year 1542 convocation decided to issue "certain homilies for the stay of such errors as were then by ignorant preachers spread among the people," and this determination resulted in the publication of a volume of sermons, fitted to be delivered by preachers whose ability and knowledge were not equal to the task of writing their own discourses (1547). A reprint of this volume appeared in 1560. The leading writers of this first Book of Homilies appear to have been Cranmer, Hooper, and Latimer, but one or two of the sermons, at least, were borrowed from earlier publications. The second Book of Homilies was published in 1563.

Honduras, BRITISH, on the east coast of Central America, is a British colony with a semi-responsible government. It was discovered by Columbus (1502) and was for many years in the nominal possession of Spain. In 1630 the Earl of Warwick formed a settlement on the adjacent island of Providence and spasmodic attempts were made on the Mosquito coast, whose natives were afforded British protection by treaty. From 1638 British logwood adventurers occupied the coast and resisted Spanish attempts to dislodge them until in 1670 the Spaniards recognized their right to the Laguna de Terminos and part of Yucatan. The Spanish attempt (1717) to drive out the British resulted in a desultory war. From 1749 superintendents were nominated by the governors of Jamaica to regulate the coast settlements, where a rude form of popular government by assembly had sprung up. In 1783, by the Treaty of Versailles, Spain recognized a district as open to British logwood cutters, while by the Convention of London (1786) the British were to evacuate the Mosquito coast and adjacent islands, but this was never enforced. Spanish attacks in 1796 and 1798 were repulsed and British possession was not again challenged, though Britain relinquished her claim to the Mosquito coast protection by the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850 (q.v.). The resolutions of the general assemblies of all the colonists were in 1765 given the force of law, and from 1786 the intendant became a Crown appointment, except for a period of seven years from 1790 when elective magistrates ruled. The colonists quarrelled with the intendants from about 1830 until an executive council was introduced in 1839 and a legislative council of 18 elected and 3 nominated members in 1853. In 1862 Honduras was made a colony subordinate to Jamaica, in 1870 became a Crown colony, and its dependence on Jamaica severed in 1884. The legislative council which replaced the assembly in 1870, of 5 officials and 4 unofficial members, was altered in 1913 to consist of 7 unofficial members out of a council of 12. The executive council consists of 3 officials and 3 others.

Hong Kong, a British Crown colony at the mouth of the Canton River, consisting of the island ceded in 1841 and confirmed by the Treaty of Nankin (1842), the peninsula of Kowloon on the mainland ceded in 1860 by the Peking treaty, and the Kowloon New Territory by the agreement of 1898. Ceded as a desolate island, the discovery of Australian gold (1851), the opening of the Suez Canal, and the opening of Japanese and Chinese markets have made Hong Kong one of the greatest free ports in the world. At the Washington Conference in 1921 the Chinese delegates asked for the surrender of all mainland leases of territory to foreign powers. Mr. Balfour refused to leave Hong Kong defenceless by ceding Kowloon, and in July 1925 Chinese dissatisfaction culminated in a nationalist boycott against all extra-territorial concessions. In 1926 British troops were dispatched to protect British interests and subjects there.

Honorius, Archbishop of Canterbury (627-53), was one of the companions of Augustine, and was famous for his skill in music. On the death of Justus he succeeded to the archbishopric. During his long tenure of office the conversion of Northumbria was completed by the Celtic missionaries; Wessex was evangelized by Birinus; and Felix was commissioned to bring back the apostate East Angles to the fold. Honorius does not appear, however, to have exercised jurisdiction outside Kent.

Honour. The terms "honour" and "barony" were alternatively used in the Middle Ages to describe the lands held by the greater tenants-in-chief of the Crown. No hard-and-fast distinction can be drawn between them, although Maitland held that of the two, the latter was the more comprehensive. The name "honour" seems to have been applied only to lay estates of the highest rank and importance, and is seldom or never found in connexion with the lands of bishops or abbots, however great their extent. An honour is perhaps best defined, in Maitland's words, as "a mass of lands" or "a complex of knights' fees" "which from of old have been held by a single title." It was a unit as regards both its internal economy and its external relationships. However much the lands comprising it were partitioned among co-heirs, it remained in theory a single whole, and the co-parceners were said to hold a moiety or a third part, as the case might be, of the honour of X. In the same way it retained its separate identity if it passed into the hands of another lord, or even if it escheated to the Crown, and a careful distinction was made between lands held of the king "ut de corona" and those held of him "ut de escaeta" or "ut de honore." The tenants of such escheats continued to enjoy the status of subvassals, and could not be subjected to the burdens and responsibilities of tenants-in-chief (Magna Carta, c. 43). For purposes of administration the honour was organized as a unit under its own hierarchy of officials, and even on the judicial side the idea of unity might find expression in an honorial court dispensing justice to the free tenants of the fief. The principle of honorial jurisdiction Maitland regarded as fully recognized in mediæval England, although, perhaps because of the peculiar position of the Crown and of royal justice in this country, it was never universally applied. The honour court of Dunster was a well-authenticated instance of such jurisdictional solidarity. In the external relationships of the honour a similar emphasis on unity is apparent. It constituted, for some purposes at least, an administrative area, and its lord fulfilled some of the functions of an administrative official. He collected and paid into the exchequer his feudal dues and incidents by the hand of his steward or bailiff instead of through the medium of the sheriff; and he was entitled to be summoned by an individual writ to perform the "servitium debitum" of his fee in the king's army, or to do suit at the king's court; and he led his tenants in person under his own banner in the feudal host. In the post-mediæval period, and especially after the dissolution of the monasteries had placed large areas of land at the disposal of the Crown, honours were sometimes created by act of parliament. By this means, in 33 Henry VIII, Ampthill, Grafton, and Hampton Court were established; four years later Henry was empowered to make Westminster and Kingston-upon-Hull honours if he so willed. [BARON.]

Hood, ALEXANDER, 1ST VISCOUNT BRIDPORT (1726-1814), entered the navy, became a lieutenant in 1746, and post-captain in 1756. In 1758 he served under Admiral Saunders in the Mediterranean, and under Sir Edward Hawke in the Channel. In 1766 he was appointed treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. In 1778 he took an active share in the engagement off Ushant. In September 1780 he was appointed rear-admiral of the white, and in 1782 commanded the centre squadron of the fleet sent out under Lord Howe to relieve Gibraltar. On February 1, 1793, he became vice-admiral of the red; and on the very next day France declared war. On June 1, 1794, the division of the Channel fleet commanded by Lord Howe attacked and utterly defeated the French fleet off Ushant. In this action Hood played a conspicuous part, and in the following August he was created Baron Bridport, in the Irish peerage. In the following June, having succeeded Lord Howe in the command of the Channel fleet, he sailed with fourteen ships from Spithead to cruise off the French coast, and chased a French fleet into Port L'Orient. During his tenure of command in the Channel occurred the mutiny of the fleet, which cannot, however, be in any way attributed to his conduct. On the contrary, the men disavowed all intention of giving personal offence to the admiral, and called him their father and friend. At length, through the combined efforts of Lord Bridport and Lord Howe, and the tact and prudence displayed by both, the men were brought back to their allegiance, and again sailed, in 1799, under Lord Bridport in pursuit of the French fleet, which this time eluded them and escaped to the Mediterranean. On resigning his command he became general of marines, and in 1801 was raised to the rank of viscount. He lived on for thirteen years, chiefly in retirement.

Hood, SAMUEL, VISCOUNT (1724-1816), entered the royal navy in 1741. In 1754 he was in command of a sloop stationed at the Bahama Islands. Several years later he served under Rodney in the bombardment of Havre, and passed the four years which preceded the Peace of Paris in duty off the coast of Ireland, and in the Mediterranean. In the course of the next twenty years he was created a baronet, 1778, and appointed rear-admiral, 1780, with the command of a squadron of eight ships which were being sent to reinforce Rodney in the West Indies. On Rodney sailing away to England with a large convoy, Hood was left in command of the fleet off the Leeward Islands. On learning that de Grasse had sailed to America, Hood hastened after him, and a partial engagement occurred between the French and British fleets. Again de Grasse sailed for the West Indies, and was followed by Hood, who baffled for some time the combined efforts of the French fleet and army to take possession of the island of St. Christopher. The island at length capitulated, and Hood sailed away unmolested to join Rodney at Barbados. On April 9, 1782, Sir Samuel Hood, in command of the advanced squadron, consisting of eight ships, came up with the French, and was at once vigorously attacked by fifteen French ships; but so ably did he fight his small detachment that on Rodney's arrival with the centre squadron de Grasse sailed away. The next two days were occupied in a chase; but on the 12th Rodney managed to bring the French fleet to an engagement off the north-west corner of Dominica. Hood's division was engaged with the French van, and the contest was maintained with much obstinacy and spirit, until the Ville de Paris, de Grasse's ship, struck to the Barfleur, the flagship of Hood. Hood was rewarded for this victory by the title of Baron Hood in the peerage of Ireland. On the conclusion of peace he returned home, and in May 1784 was returned as M.P. for Westminster. In 1786 he was appointed port admiral at Portsmouth, and two years later was constituted one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral. In 1793 he was appointed vice-admiral of the red, and was at once ordered to the Mediterranean as commander-in-chief, with the object of taking possession of Toulon. After a siege of two months this town was reduced. At the end of 1794 he was appointed governor of Greenwich Hospital, being soon afterwards raised to the English peerage with the title of Viscount Hood (1796). He survived his elevation nearly twenty years.

Hooker, RICHARD (1554-1600), the author of the famous "Ecclesiastical Polity," was educated at Oxford, where he remained until 1584. In the following year he became master of the Temple, and was involved in a controversy with Travers, a Puritan, in which he was vigorously supported by his friends Archbishop Whitgift and Bishop Sandys. Travers was suspended, and "to justify his suspension we are in possession of Hooker's immortal work," which has gained for him the epithet of "judicious." The "Ecclesiastical Polity" has other claims to remembrance besides its literary excellence. It is in reality a defence of the Church of England as then established; and in the course of his argument Hooker has to deal with those principles which, underlying the Puritan doctrines, were at that time forcing their way into such prominence. He first of all inquires into the nature of law, and finds that it is divided into two distinct sections—laws immutable and laws variable; and then applies the touchstone of criticism to decide to which category the various texts of scripture belong. The extreme Puritans, who would have borrowed even their criminal jurisprudence from the pages of the Old Testament, are met at the threshold by Hooker's challenge. Passing on from general to particular points, he comes to the burning question of Episcopacy; and here, though adhering to the belief that this form of Church government is to be found in the Scriptures, he bases his chief argument on the fact that no special form of ecclesiastical rule is laid down in its pages as being absolutely binding on all nations. The varying circumstances of different peoples will, he argues, lead them to form a mode of discipline fitted to their necessities. It is hardly necessary in this place to draw attention to his theories of secular government, and of the king's limited power, widely as they differed from the notions generally upheld by the Church party in the ensuing reigns.

Hooper, JOHN (d. 1555), at first a Cistercian monk, became, during the reign of Edward VI, one of the leaders of the Reformation, and acquired great fame as a preacher. In 1550 he was made Bishop of Gloucester, though for some time he refused to enter upon his office, owing to his objection to obey any spiritual authority but the Scriptures, or to wear the episcopal dress. In 1552 he received the bishopric of Worcester in commendam, and "by his activity, his fervid declamation, and his bold though intemperate zeal, deserved the applause and gratitude of the well-wishers to the new doctrines." On the accession of Mary, Hooper was at once marked out as a victim. He was ejected from his see, and imprisoned in the Fleet, September 1553. In the beginning of 1555 he was condemned for heresy, and sent to Gloucester, where he was burnt on February 9.

Biography by J. C. Ryle, 1868.

Hopton, SIR RALPH, afterwards LORD (1598-1652), first distinguished himself in the wars of the Low Countries. On the outbreak of the Civil War he was sent into the western parts of England to assist in forming an army for the king. His success in Cornwall was complete. In 1643 he defeated Sir William Waller at the battle of Lansdown, but was himself severely wounded. In the same year Charles I appointed him governor of Bristol and created him Baron Hopton. Next year, after taking Winchester, he was defeated at Alresford by Waller with Haselrig's "Lobsters," and was appointed a member of the Prince of Wales's council at Bristol. In 1646 he was routed by Sir Thomas Fairfax at the battle of Torrington, after which disaster he dissolved his army and withdrew to the Scilly Islands, and subsequently to the continent. He died at Bruges.

Horestii, THE, were an ancient British tribe occupying an area roughly corresponding to the modern counties of Clackmannan, Kinross, and Fife, with the eastern part of Strathern and the country to the west of the Tay.

Horsa is said to have been the brother of Hengest, whom he accompanied in his expedition to Britain, where, according to tradition, he was slain in the battle of Aylesford (455?). The town of Horstead, in Kent, is said to derive its name from him, and a barrow in the neighbourhood is pointed out as the tomb of Horsa. The very existence of Horsa has been questioned of late years, and his name has been made to be no more than a representation of the steed which has so long figured on the standard of Kent. But his name occurs more than once in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," and there is no reason why he should not have been a real historical character, even though his name bears the signification attributed to it. [HENGEST.]

Hospitallers, THE KNIGHTS, or BRETHREN OF ST. JOHN AT JERUSALEM, were one of the two great military orders of Crusaders. They derived their name "from their hospital built at Jerusalem for the use of pilgrims coming to the Holy Land, and dedicated to St. John Baptist." The order was instituted about the year 1092, but they do not seem to have had a house in London till about the year 1140. They were much favoured by the first two Kings of Jerusalem, Godfrey of Boulogne and Baldwin, and in England soon acquired large possessions. The superior in England came in process of time to be reckoned a lay baron, and had a seat among the lords temporal in parliament as "premier" of his order. They had numerous manors scattered over different counties in England. Each settlement of Hospitallers was under the rule of a commander, who answered to the preceptors of the Templars. They were followers of St. Augustine's rule, and wore a black habit with a white cross upon it. Their chief establishment in England was the Hospital of St. John, at Clerkenwell, founded by Jordan Briset, about 1100. Its revenue at the time of the Reformation seems to have been between £2,000 and £3,000. Other commanderies of this order were at Beverley (Yorkshire) and Warwick. In Dugdale's "Monasticon" more than fifty other cells are enumerated.

Hotham, JOHN DE (d. 1337), was chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland in 1309. As Gaveston's steward he seems to have incurred the hostility of the baronage, but in 1312 he was made chancellor of the exchequer in England, and in 1313 was sent on a mission to France. Two years later he was dispatched to Ireland for the purpose of inducing the barons there to make a stand against Edward Bruce. In 1318 he was appointed chancellor, and continued to hold the great seal till January 1320. Some four years before this last date (1316) he had been elected Bishop of Ely. On the accession of Edward III he was once more made chancellor, but resigned the great seal next year. He was struck with paralysis some two years before his death, which happened in 1337.

Hotham, SIR JOHN (d. 1645), took a prominent part in the attack on the Earl of Strafford, having some personal grudge against that statesman. In the debate upon the Grand Remonstrance (q.v.) he sided with Hyde. Next year (1642) Hotham was dispatched by the Parliament to take command of Hull and secure the large magazines of that important town for the popular party. When Charles demanded admittance to this fortress Hotham refused him, and Parliament approved the conduct of their officer. But he was not entirely in the confidence of his employers, who sent his son to play the spy upon his father's movements. Unfortunately, when Lord Digby fell into their hands, Sir John allowed his honour to be tampered with, and promised to deliver up the town on the first shot fired against it by the king's army. Accordingly Hotham permitted Digby to depart for the purpose of carrying the news to York, but on the king's arrival he flooded the country and forced him to abandon the siege (July). A little later both Sir John Hotham and his son were executed for treasonable correspondence with the Marquis of Newcastle (January 1645), and died leaving on men's minds the impression that had it not been for their weakness Parliament would have become the absolute masters of the whole of Yorkshire.

Hotspur. [PERCY, SIR HENRY.]

Houghers, THE, made their first appearance in Galway in the winter of 1711. They consisted of armed parties, disguised by white sheets, and spread over Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Galway, and Clare, slaughtering and "houghing" the cattle, from which last practice they derived their name. Notices were posted up, signed by "Captain Evan," bidding the shepherds remain indoors. None of the Houghers, who were evidently directed by men of birth and education, had been apprehended, when a government proclamation was issued, promising a free pardon to all who would confess. Upon this, sixteen young gentlemen belonging to the best Catholic families came forward in Galway, and by the end of 1713 the movement had ceased. It is difficult to decide whether it was merely intended to check cattle-farming and Protestantism, or whether it had a Jacobite origin: but, in any case, the priests do not appear to have been implicated in the disturbance. Afterwards, the Houghers were identified with the Whiteboys (q.v.). In 1783 the Houghers directed their efforts against soldiers, and a bill was passed against them in 1784.

Housecarls, THE, or THINGMEN (Huscarls), were a body-guard formed by Canute from the crews of the forty ships which he retained in his service after disbanding the bulk of the Great Army (1018). The force, which consisted of between three and four thousand men, was organized as a gild or fraternity, with the king as chief member. The warriors received their board in the royal "garth" or household, and were paid a monthly wage. They were heavily armed, and were provided with horses, although they did not constitute a cavalry force in the strict sense. Although predominantly Scandinavian, they were recruited from many different nations, and the English element tended to increase when once the country had become settled. The English king's housecarls were almost exterminated at the battles of Stamford Bridge and Senlac.

Household, THE ROYAL, is important because the offices of state grew out of it. This was due to the fact that in early times in England, as in other European countries, there was no distinction between the functions of the king as manager of his estate and his functions as ruler of his kingdom. All the households of western monarchs went back to the Carolingian household, and through that to the imperial and papal households. The households of magnates developed along similar lines. The household, therefore, was the basis of all activity: it was the financial, secretarial, and judicial office by turns; afforded by the wise men of the land, it was the king's advisory body; and, as the household under arms, supplemented by the armed households of the king's followers, it provided the army in wartime. The earliest surviving description of the organization of the household is the "Constitutio Domus Regis" of 1135. From it we learn that the chief officers were the chancellor, master of the scriptorium, chaplain, master dispenser, stewards, master butler, master chamberlain, treasurer, tally-cutter, constables, and master marshal. There were as well numbers of subordinate officials, clerks, chamberlains, stewards, serjeants, ushers, marshals, watchmen, huntsmen, archers, and all the more domestic officers of kitchen, spicery, buttery, pantry, larder, and mews. The chamber was the oldest department of the household, and the peculiarity of English administrative history is that from the chamber there developed the exchequer as chief office of finance, while in the rest of Europe, for example in the papacy and in France, the chamber of the court remained the only financial department of the state. Between 1100 and 1400, there emerged the exchequer, chancery, king's council and parliament, king's bench and common bench, wardrobe (q.v.), king's chamber as the privy purse, privy seal, signet, and secretary's office. After such differentiation little but the king's private household remained. The modern royal household contains mediæval survivals in the two chief departments of the lord chamberlain (q.v.) and the lord steward. The master of the horse, the third modern department, only became important in the late mediæval and Tudor days.

Howard, THE FAMILY OF. According to Sir Bernard Burke, the family of Howard was established in Norfolk in the tenth century. In the fifteenth century Sir Robert Howard married Margaret, daughter of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk (who was descended from Thomas of Brotherton, son of King Edward I), and of Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Richard Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel. Thus the estates of the Mowbrays and Fitzalans came into possession of the Howards. In 1470 Sir John Howard, son of this Sir Robert, was created Lord Howard, and in 1483 earl marshal and Duke of Norfolk. Among other peerages in this family are those of Howard de Walden (created 1597), Howard of Glossop (1869), Carlisle (1661), Effingham (1554), Suffolk (1603).

Howard, CHARLES, LORD HOWARD OF EFFINGHAM (1536–1624), was the son of William, Lord Howard of Effingham (q.v.), and grandson of the second Duke of Norfolk. In the year 1569 he held a command in the royal army during the northern rebellion, and in 1587 very strongly advised the execution of the Queen of Scots. In 1585, although a Catholic, he was appointed lord high admiral of England, and had command of the fleet during the alarm of the Spanish Armada, his resolution and bravery being conspicuous throughout the crisis. In 1596 he was associated with the Earl of Essex in the expedition against Cadiz, and was created Earl of Nottingham as a reward for his services. In 1601 he was instrumental in suppressing the insurrection of Essex, with whom he had quarrelled after the Spanish expedition. Under James I, Lord Howard continued to hold his office as admiral, and filled the post of lord high steward at the coronation. Though without very great experience or commanding ability, he was fairly successful. He had some naval skill, and was both bold and prudent. [ARMADA, THE SPANISH.]

Howard, SIR EDWARD (1477?–1513), was the second son of Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey and 2nd Duke of Norfolk (q.v.), the victor of Flodden. Occupying the position of lord high admiral of England, he distinguished himself on several occasions. In 1511, supported by his brother, Sir Thomas Howard, as a subordinate officer in his fleet, he killed the Scottish privateer, Andrew Barton (q.v.), and captured two of his ships. In 1512, on his return from Spain, where he had conducted the English forces, under the Marquis of Dorset, Sir Edward Howard captured many French merchantmen, and made several destructive descents on the French coast. Having refitted at Southampton, and being reinforced by a further squadron of 25 sail, he engaged with a French fleet of 39 sail near Brest, on August 10. Victory once again inclined to the side of the English, but a complete triumph was prevented by the dismay occasioned to both the contending parties upon the conflagration of the two largest ships on each side, the Regent and the Cordelier, whose entire crews, to the number of 1,700 men, perished in the flames. In 1513 Sir Edward Howard was killed in an attempt to destroy the French fleet near Brest (April 25). He was succeeded in his office of lord high admiral by his brother, Sir Thomas Howard, who became in later years the 3rd Duke of Norfolk.

Howard, EDWARD, LORD HOWARD OF ESCRICK (d. 1675), was the seventh son of Thomas Howard, 1st Earl of Suffolk, and was created Baron Howard of Escrick, in Yorkshire, 1628. He sided with the Parliament throughout the Civil War, and, after the abolition of the House of Lords, consented to become a member of the Commons, where he represented Carlisle; he also became a member of the council of state. In July 1650 he was accused by Major-General Harrison of taking bribes from wealthy delinquents. A year later he was convicted, expelled from the House, sentenced to be imprisoned in the Tower and to pay a fine of £10,000. He was soon released, and the fine was not exacted, but he took no further part in public affairs.

Howard, GEORGE WILLIAM, 7TH EARL OF CARLISLE (1802–64), was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In 1826 he accompanied his uncle, the Duke of Devonshire, on his visit to Russia at the coronation of the Emperor Nicholas I. He was returned to the House of Commons for the family seat of Morpeth (1826), and one of his earliest speeches was in defence of the character of the Russian emperor. During the agitation of the Reform Bill he enlisted on the side of Earl Grey, and on the dissolution of parliament which followed the success of General Gascoyne's motion, he was returned for Yorkshire, which seat he held till the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832. He was chief secretary for Ireland from 1835 to 1841, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster from 1850 to 1852. In 1855 he became lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and began a career of popularity almost without parallel among Irish viceroys. A change in the government removed him for a short time; but he returned again in 1859, and held this office till the summer of 1864, when illness compelled him to lay it down.

Howard, HENRIETTA, COUNTESS OF SUFFOLK (1681–1767), was the supposed mistress of George II. She was the daughter of Sir Henry Hobart, and married Charles Howard, third son of Henry, 5th Earl of Suffolk, who afterwards succeeded to the earldom of Suffolk. When her husband tried to remove her from the household of Caroline, then Princess of Wales, the latter protected her. She entertained a strong regard for Swift and Pope, and was courted by the opposition partly in the mistaken expectation of gaining the royal ear, partly from real regard for her amiable character. After her withdrawal from court in 1734, she married the Hon. George Berkeley.

Howard, HENRY, EARL OF SURREY (1517?-47), was the eldest son of Thomas Howard, 3rd Duke of Norfolk. A promising scholar and soldier, and a poet of considerable power, his career was brought to a premature close through Henry VIII's jealous interpretation of some indiscreet assumptions of royal arms and titles and references to his relationship to royalty, at a time when the king began to reject again the counsels of the conservative Anglicans, of whom Norfolk and Surrey were the chief. Though barely thirty years of age at his death, the young earl had distinguished himself in some of the Scottish and French campaigns, besides winning fame as a poet of real if limited powers. For a short period he was entrusted with the governorship of Henry's French conquest, Boulogne, but his defeat before the city in 1546 led to his being superseded in his command, and to his engaging in a quarrel with his successor at Boulogne, Lord Hertford, which was one main cause of his incurring the king's displeasure. Accused of treason at the instance of Hertford, he was condemned, and executed (January 21, 1547). He was the brother-in-law and frequent companion of Henry's natural son, the Duke of Richmond.

Biography by Edmond Bapst (Paris, 1891).

Howard, HENRY, EARL OF NORTHAMPTON (1540-1614), second son of Henry, Earl of Surrey, and the brother of Thomas, 4th Duke of Norfolk, was created an earl by James I in 1604. He has incurred the infamy of having betrayed the secrets of his patron, the Earl of Essex, to the privy council, and will be remembered in history as a man of shameless principles who for various selfish reasons changed his religion no fewer than five times. Under James I he rose rapidly to honour, being made warden of the Cinque Ports and lord privy seal; he was a commissioner at the trial of his enemy, Sir Walter Raleigh; and was subsequently concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. Though he had inherited "the talents, the taste, and the accomplishments of his father," he was in reality "a monster of wickedness and hypocrisy."

Howard, JOHN, 1ST DUKE OF NORFOLK (d. 1485), was the son of Sir Robert Howard by Margaret, daughter and heiress of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. He took part in Talbot's expedition to Gascony, and fought in the battle of Castillon (1453). He was much favoured by Edward IV, who made him treasurer of the household (1467), and frequently employed him on diplomatic missions. He accompanied the Duke of Gloucester in his expedition to Scotland in 1482, and on Richard III's accession to the throne was made Duke of Norfolk and earl marshal. In 1483 he became admiral of England, Ireland, and Aquitaine. He steadily adhered to Richard, and was killed whilst commanding the vanguard at Bosworth. An attempt was made to detach him from the Yorkist cause on the eve of the engagement, and he is said to have found pinned to his tent a paper with the following rhyme upon it:—

"Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon thy master is bought and sold."

Howard, JOHN (1726-90), a distinguished philanthropist, was born in London, and after being for some time apprenticed to a grocer, travelled over Europe. In 1756 he undertook a voyage to Lisbon, but on the way was captured by a French privateer, and was for a short time held in captivity. In 1773 his attention was directed to the state of the English prisons, and he visited most of the countries of the continent to examine their prisons. In 1777 he published "The State of the Prisons in England and Wales," which had the effect of drawing public attention to the abuses which prevailed, and ultimately led to great reforms. He died at Kherson (Russia) while prosecuting researches into the plague.

Howard, PHILIP, 13TH EARL OF ARUNDEL (d. 1595), son of Thomas, 4th Duke of Norfolk, who was attainted and beheaded in 1572, inherited the earldom of Arundel in right of his mother. He was restored in blood and made privy councillor in 1581. On his first appearance at court he won the favour of Elizabeth, but quickly lost it through his immoral life. In 1583 he was charged with complicity in the plot of Francis Throckmorton (q.v.) (having incurred suspicion by his relations with the Jesuit Campion), but was speedily released. In the next year he was formally received into the Roman Catholic Church, through the influence of his wife Anne Dacre. On attempting to escape from England, in 1585, he was captured and again sent to the Tower, where he remained until his death. In 1589 he was found guilty of high treason on a charge of having prayed for the success of the Spanish Armada. He was condemned to death, but by the advice of Cecil and Hatton was not executed. The severity with which he was treated seems to have been due to personal animosity on the part of Elizabeth.

Biography by Cecil Kerr, 1925.

Howard, Thomas, 2ND DUKE OF NORFOLK (1443-1524), was the son of John Howard, Duke of Norfolk, who was killed at Bosworth Field while fighting on the side of Richard III. Like his father, he fought under Richard's banner at Bosworth, and, being taken prisoner, was lodged for a period in the Tower, his newly-acquired title of Earl of Surrey being declared forfeited. He transferred his allegiance to Henry VII; and he was entrusted as the king's lieutenant with the important duty of tranquilizing the northern districts of England. In 1497 Surrey was directed to provide against the expected Scottish inroads. His rapid march to Norham, undertaken at the request of Fox, Bishop of Durham, compelled James IV to make a hasty retreat into his own kingdom. Under Henry VIII, Surrey became a trusted member of the royal ministry, and still further distinguished himself in the field by his decisive victory over James IV at Flodden (q.v.) in 1513; and by the complete check he succeeded in giving in 1523 to the Scottish invasion under Albany, the consequence of which last success was a peace of eighteen years between the two countries. In 1522 he was placed in command of the English expedition dispatched to France for the purpose of acting against that kingdom in conjunction with the Imperialist forces. Circumstances were, however, not favourable to any decisive engagement, and Surrey's hostile proceedings were limited to a general ravaging of the coast of Brittany. Surrey had his dukedom and the earl-marshalship restored to him in 1514, and was made lord treasurer and knight of the Garter.

Howard, Thomas, 3RD DUKE OF NORFOLK (1473-1554), was a distinguished soldier and statesman under Henry VIII and his two successors. His first public appearance in the field was at Flodden, where he fought under his father. Subsequently, on becoming Duke of Norfolk in 1524, he took a prominent part in the proceedings of the king's council as the political opponent of Wolsey, and the acknowledged leader of the English nobility. His tact and firmness enabled him to put down the Suffolk riots in 1525. On Wolsey's fall in 1529, Norfolk became Henry's chief minister. As the recognized head of the conservative party in Church matters, and the chief representative of the older nobility, he was deputed by Henry to negotiate with the rebel leaders in the Pilgrimage of Grace (q.v.). He was instrumental in passing the statute known as the Six Articles (q.v.). In October 1542 he was in command of the English army in Scotland, on the occasion of the hostilities between the two countries which ended in the Scottish disaster of Solway Moss. In December 1546, however, the influence of the king's brother-in-law, Lord Hertford, who had taken Cromwell's place as leader of the reforming party, was strong enough to bring about Norfolk's arrest on a charge of treason.

A suspicion of pretensions to the throne was a fatal one for Henry to conceive of any of his nobles, and Norfolk would have shared the fate of his gifted son, the young Earl of Surrey, who was executed on the same groundless charge of treason (January 21, 1547), had not the king's own death preceded the day appointed for his execution. All through the reign of Edward VI, however, he was kept a close prisoner, and was only restored to liberty on the accession of Mary to the throne. He presided at the trial of the Duke of Northumberland, and took an active part in the suppression of the rising under Sir Thomas Wyatt (q.v.).

Howard, Thomas, 4TH DUKE OF NORFOLK (1536-72), grandson of Thomas, 3rd duke, was one of the most powerful nobles in England under Elizabeth, and a Catholic in politics, though in creed he professed himself an Anglican. Whilst in command of the Army of the North, during the Scottish campaign of 1560, he incurred the suspicion of the queen, who feared his popularity. In 1568 Norfolk was appointed president of the commission of inquiry at York to examine the charges brought against Mary of Scotland. It was at this time that the idea first arose amongst the Catholic nobles of a marriage between the duke and the Queen of Scots. This marriage, urged on by Moray and Maitland, was extremely distasteful to Elizabeth, to whom Norfolk declared that nothing would induce him to marry one who had been a competitor for the crown. He subsequently, however, gave his adhesion to the scheme, and, in conjunction with others of the queen's council, including Leicester, Sussex, and Throckmorton, he joined the plan of marrying Mary on condition that she outwardly conformed to the rites of the Church of England. Elizabeth, however, remained averse to the match. A plot formed against Cecil was discovered, and Norfolk, who had been intriguing with Spain for an attack on the commercial interests of England, renounced Protestantism, and threw himself into the arms of the Catholic lords in the north. In October 1569, however, Norfolk was arrested and sent to the Tower, but regained his liberty the following year by giving a written promise not to pursue the scheme of the marriage. The duke, however, quickly found himself involved in a fresh Catholic plot, known as the Ridolfi Conspiracy (q.v.). In September 1571 some letters which fell into Cecil's hands caused Norfolk to be lodged in the Tower. He was brought to trial in the following January. The charge against him was that of compassing the queen's death—(1) by seeking to marry the Queen of Scots; (2) by soliciting foreign powers to invade the realm; (3) by sending money to the aid of the English who were rebels, and the Scots who were enemies to the queen. The duke denied all the charges, but was found guilty of high treason, and, after some delay caused by the unwillingness of Elizabeth to sign the warrant, was executed on June 2, 1572.

Howard, THOMAS, 1ST EARL OF SUFFOLK (1561–1626), second son of Thomas, 4th Duke of Norfolk, was one of the volunteers who assisted in attacking the Spanish Armada off Calais. In 1591 he was in command of the fleet which attacked the Spanish treasure ships off the Azores, when Sir Richard Grenville was killed, and in 1596 was second in command of the fleet during the expedition to Cadiz. In the following year he accompanied Essex in his disastrous attempt on the Azores. On his return home he was created Lord Howard de Walden, and in 1603 Earl of Suffolk. In 1604 he was appointed one of the commissioners for executing the office of earl marshal, and helped to discover the Gunpowder Plot (q.v.). In 1614 he was created lord high treasurer of England, but was deprived of his office five years later for extortion and embezzlement.

Howard, WILLIAM, LORD HOWARD OF EFFINGHAM (1510 ?–73), was the eldest son of Thomas, 2nd Duke of Norfolk, marshal of England. On the charge of concealing the incontinence of his niece, Catherine Howard (q.v.), Lord William was declared guilty of misprision of treason, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. He soon, however, recovered his liberty, and was, under Henry VIII and Edward VI, employed on various diplomatic missions. Soon after Mary's accession he was raised to the peerage, and made lord high admiral of England. In 1554 he greatly distinguished himself in crushing the Kentish rebellion, and successfully prevented Sir Thomas Wyatt from entering London. It was owing to his influence as head of the naval power of England that Gardiner found it expedient not to press the charge against Elizabeth of being implicated in Wyatt's rebellion; and throughout the whole reign of Mary he exercised a constant watch over the princess, by whom, after her accession, he was created lord chamberlain and lord privy seal, as a reward for his devotion. In 1559 he was sent as commissioner to Cambrai, in conjunction with Dr. Wotton and the Bishop of Ely, and subsequently did his best to bring about the marriage of the queen with the Archduke Charles of Austria.

Howard, WILLIAM, LORD, known as "BELTED WILL" (1563–1640), was the third son of Thomas, 4th Duke of Norfolk, the ancestor of the Earls of Carlisle. He was suspected of being implicated in Throckmorton's plot, 1583 (q.v.), but, though he was arrested, no proof of his complicity could be obtained. Having become lord of Naworth Castle in right of his wife, he was made warden of the Western Marches.

Howard, WILLIAM, VISCOUNT STAFFORD (1614–80), fifth son of Thomas, Earl of Arundel, was a Roman Catholic peer of high personal character, who in 1678 was accused by Oates and Bedloe of complicity in the Popish Plot (q.v.). He was committed to the Tower with four other Catholic peers, and in 1680 was the one chosen to be tried. He was impeached of high treason by the Commons, and tried by the House of Lords (November 30–December 6), and, although the only witnesses against him were Oates and other perjured wretches, he was found guilty by 55 votes to 31. His execution, which took place on December 29, 1680, marks the turn of the tide against Shaftesbury and the other upholders of the Popish Plot. Stafford protested his innocence on the scaffold, and the populace avowed their belief in his assertion.

Howard v. Gossett, CASE OF. Mr. Howard, who had been Stockdale's solicitor in his action against Messrs. Hansard in 1839 and 1840, brought an action against the officers of the House of Commons who had taken him into custody, and obtained a verdict for £100. He then obtained a second verdict against Sir W. Gossett, the serjeant-at-arms, on the ground that the Speaker's warrant was informal. The question was once more brought before the Court of Exchequer, and here the verdict of the lower court was reversed. The case forms a constitutional precedent of some importance.

Howe, JOHN (1630–1705), was a Puritan divine, born at Loughborough. After his appointment to the living of Great Torrington about 1652, and while on a visit to London, he attracted the notice of Cromwell, who made him his domestic chaplain. He was also appointed lecturer at St. Margaret's, Westminster. At the Restoration he returned to Torrington, but was ejected by the Act of Uniformity, and became a Nonconformist minister in London. He was an erudite and eloquent preacher, and was universally esteemed for his liberality and piety.

Howe, JOHN GRUBHAM (1657–1722), was returned as member for Cirencester to the Convention of 1689, having previously been known as the author of some savage lampoons. He was appointed vice-chamberlain to Queen Mary. He proved himself a zealous Whig, and proposed sending Dutch troops to suppress a Scottish regiment which had mutinied when ordered to the continent. He attacked Carmarthen and Halifax, demanding that they should be removed from the king's councils, but without effect. He was dismissed from his office in 1692, apparently for imagining that Queen Mary was in love with him. From this time he displayed the most rancorous hatred against the queen and her husband, and moved the impeachment of Burnet for writing an obnoxious pastoral letter. Shortly afterwards he became a Tory, and a zealous advocate for peace. In 1702 he became a privy councillor and received the office of joint paymaster of the forces. He moved without success that the Prince of Denmark should have the enormous income of £100,000 a year on the death of Queen Anne. On the accession of George I he was dismissed from his offices, and passed the remainder of his life in retirement.

Howe, RICHARD, EARL (1726-99), second son of Emanuel, 2nd Viscount Howe, entered the navy at the age of fourteen, and was employed under Lord Anson. After serving for some time in the West Indies he was appointed commander of a sloop in 1745. In 1748 he returned to England, and spent three years in studying navigation and tactics. He was then appointed to perform a semi-diplomatic mission in the Mediterranean, and executed it with great skill and judgment. In 1754, while attached to Boscawen's fleet, he captured a French ship. Three years later he was returned to parliament for Dartmouth, and in the following year made himself conspicuous in Hawke's attacks on the French coast, and in the same year succeeded to the family title and estates on the death of his brother, Viscount Howe. Once more he distinguished himself at the action in Quiberon Bay in 1759. During the American War he was employed on that station; but his force was so small and ill provided that he could effect little or nothing. He returned to England in 1778, and in 1782 was sent to relieve Gibraltar, a service which he accomplished in spite of the superior number of the enemy. On his return in 1783 he was appointed first commissioner of the admiralty, and, except during the short coalition administration, held that post until 1788, when he resigned and was created an earl. In 1793, when the war with France broke out, he was appointed to the command of the Channel fleet. On May 2, 1794, he sailed from St. Helen's, and on June 1 gained a decisive victory over the French [FIRST OF JUNE]. Honours were heaped upon him; and on the outbreak of the mutiny in the fleet in 1797, Lord Howe was armed with full powers to restore order in the navy. To effect this purpose he exercised so much moderation, firmness, and tact that he soon brought back the sailors to their allegiance.

W. L. Clowes, "Royal Navy," vol. iv, 1899.

Howe, WILLIAM, 5TH VISCOUNT (1729-1814), brother of Richard, Earl Howe (the admiral), was appointed commander-in-chief of the English army in America in 1775. Acting in this capacity he won the battle of Bunker Hill (June 17, 1775) and took New York (September 15, 1776). Next year he was victorious at Brandywine River (September 11) and occupied Philadelphia, but was recalled in 1778 at his own request.

Howel Dda (Howel the Good) was the most famous of the early Welsh kings (reigned 915-48). He was the son of Cadell and the grandson of Rhodri Mawr. Howel seems to have had a vague sort of overlordship of North Wales, whose chief king was his cousin, Idwal Foel; and on the latter's death in 942 he assumed the direct rule over Gwynedd and probably also over Powys. Later writers speak of him as king of all Wales; but Morgamrwg and Gwent never came within his jurisdiction. He never disputed the West Saxon overlordship, and in 918 accepted Edward the Elder as "father and lord." He seems to have attended the English witenagemots, attested charters, and there is some ground for the belief that he joined the expedition of Edmund against Cumbria in 946. Howel is most famous for his collection of Welsh laws and customs, which he made towards the end of his reign at a great gathering of Welsh prelates and princes at his hunting lodge, near Whitland, in Carmarthenshire, known as Ty Gwyn ar Daf. He is said to have been aided by Blegywryd, the first scholar of his time, and, with less probability, to have taken the laws in person to Rome to obtain papal sanction. But the "Book of the White House" is no longer extant, and the bulky codes which now go by the name of the "Laws of Howel Dda" can only in their present form be referred back to the eleventh or twelfth century, though doubtless based on earlier collections. They comprise three varying laws belonging to the districts of Gwynedd, Powys, and Dyfed respectively. They bear large traces of English influence, and, though largely occupied with minute details of fines and court duties, are very valuable sources of information. Howel died in 949 or 950, and the peace which seems to have attended his power died with him. "He was," says the native chronicler, "the wisest and justest of all Welsh princes, greatly loved by every Welshman and by the wise among the Saxons."

The "Laws of Howel Dda" were first printed by Wotton, and afterwards more completely edited by Aneurin Owen in the Record Commission's "Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales"; "Brut y Tywysogion"; "Gwentian Brut"; "Annales Cambriae"; "Liber Landavensis"; J. E. Lloyd, "History of Wales to the Edwardian Conquest," 2 vols., 1911.

Howick, LORD. (1764-1845). [GREY, CHARLES.]

Hudson, JEFFERY (1619-82), was Charles I's favourite dwarf, 18 inches high at the age of seven and 3 feet 6 or 9 inches at his maximum. He was faithfully attached to Queen Henrietta, whom he accompanied in her first flight from England; not long after this he was taken prisoner by Turkish pirates and sold as a slave, but very shortly he was released and served as a captain of horse in the royal army. When the royal cause became hopeless he again retired to France with the queen, but returned to England at the Restoration, and in 1679 was accused of complicity in the Popish Plot. On this account he was imprisoned, and died very soon afterwards in captivity.

Hudson's Bay Company, founded in 1670 as a trading company to exploit the territory named after Henry Hudson, who discovered it for the Dutch West India Company (1609-10). One of the chief incorporators was Prince Rupert, who gave his name to the territory. Conflict with French settlers also trading with the Indians for furs led to the Treaty of Whitehall (1686), which, however, did not settle the dispute. Actual fighting took place round the factories or forts, but in 1713 the company was greatly strengthened by the abandonment of the French claim at the Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.). A parliamentary inquiry led to a confirmation of its privileges (1749) and a definition of its territories. In 1763 French political rivalry was removed by the cession of all Canada to Great Britain, but a rival North-West Fur Company of Montreal was established, and fighting later ensued over the ownership of land in the Red River valley. This culminated in 1816, and in 1821 the two companies were amalgamated under the more ancient title. A grant was also made of the trading right to lands farther afield, and British Columbia and the Oregon district were included. In 1846 Oregon was ceded to the United States and Vancouver Island given to the company in exchange (1849). This concession lapsed in 1859. A desire to settle the Red River districts was followed by a parliamentary committee which recommended their cession by the company, which should, however, retain its trading rights. On the formation of the Dominion of Canada (1867) the company's jurisdiction became an anachronism, and negotiations for the surrender of its possessions resulted in their sale for £300,000 in 1869, although some land (the so-called Fertile Belt) was retained. These arrangements were completed in 1872. Of these fifteen million acres so retained the company has sold all but about four. It has continued its fur trading, but subordinated that activity to more general trading, and in the Great War acted as commissariat agent for the French government.

Hue and Cry is derived from the French words huer and crier, both of which signify to cry aloud. In early English law it was one of the recognized processes of common law for securing the arrest of a felon. The plaintiff who had been robbed had by this process the right of acquainting the constable of the township with the wrong he had suffered, and the description of the culprit. The constable might then call upon all the inhabitants to join in the pursuit of the suspected criminal with horn and voice; and so follow up the offender's tracks to the limits of the township, at which limit this constable would generally hand on the duty of pursuit to the constable of the neighbouring parish. The hue and cry was enjoined by the Statute of Westminster, 1275, and regulated by acts made in the years 1285, 1585, 1735, and 1749.

Huguenots. [PROTESTANT REFUGEES IN ENGLAND.]

Hull, or KINGSTON-UPON-HULL, derives its second name from Edward I, who, seeing its advantageous position, spent much labour in fortifying the place and granted it a charter in 1299. But it seems to have been of considerable importance even before this time. The great house of de la Pole were Hull merchants. About the year 1300, Edward, in an ordinance having reference to the establishment of mints, appointed it one of the places for the erection of furnaces. Its prosperity, though occasionally interrupted by plague and famine, seems to have been continuous during the succeeding centuries. In 1642 the town came into great prominence as one of the most important magazines of arms in the country. Owing to this it was entrusted by the Parliament to the keeping of Sir John Hotham (q.v.), whose refusal to admit the king within the gates was almost tantamount to a declaration of war. Before long, however, Sir John was found in correspondence with the Royalists, treating for the surrender of his charge. For this offence he suffered death; while the town of Hull held out under Ferdinando Fairfax against the siege of the Marquis of Newcastle.

Humble Petition and Advice, THE (1657), was the second paper constitution of the Protectorate. When Cromwell's second parliament met in 1657, Alderman Pack, member for the city of London, brought forward (February 23) an address under the title of "An Humble Address and Remonstrance," in which he proposed the recasting of the constitution along definitely monarchical lines. His propositions were, after a long debate, accepted by the House, in spite of the opposition of the military members. On April 4 a committee was appointed to discuss the whole question with Cromwell, who, however, on May 8 definitely refused to exchange the title of protector for that of king. But with this and a few other minor exceptions, the whole scheme (which in its enlarged and amended form was known as the Humble Petition and Advice) received the protector's assent (May 25, 1657). The chief provisions of this document were, that Cromwell should name his own successor in his lifetime; that a parliament of two Houses should be called every three years at the furthest; that papists and all who had some aim against the Parliament should be disabled from sitting as members and from voting in the election of members; that an Upper House should be constituted, consisting of from forty to seventy members, whereof twenty-one should form a quorum; that the members of this Upper House should be nominated by Cromwell with the approval of the Commons in the first place—the right of filling up vacancies being, however, inherent in the chamber itself; that a constant revenue of £1,300,000 a year should be granted for the maintenance of the army and navy, other supplies being granted by parliament as need should arise; that the protector's council should consist only of "such as are of known piety and of undoubted affection to the rights of these nations," even in matters of religious faith; that this council should not be removed but by consent of parliament; that it should appoint to the military and naval commands on Cromwell's death; that the chancellor, treasurer, chief justices, etc., should be approved by parliament; that parliament should issue a public confession of faith, to which, however, none should be compelled to assent, nor be molested for holding other views so long as they did not abuse this liberty; but that neither papacy nor prelacy should be suffered. When, however, parliament once more met, in January 1658, Cromwell found the Lower House, from which his chief supporters had been withdrawn to form the new Upper House, calling in question all that had been done in the previous year. The Lower House now refused to recognize the Upper. Cromwell, in despair, dissolved parliament early in 1658, and the Humble Petition and Advice fell to the ground.

Hume, JOSEPH (1777-1855), was born of humble parents at Montrose. After studying medicine at Edinburgh he was appointed surgeon to one of the Indian regiments (1797), and did not return home till 1808. From this time he devoted his attention to the practical side of English politics, and in 1812 entered parliament as member for Weymouth—a borough which he did not long represent. A few years later he was returned for Aberdeen, and after one or two changes finally became member for Montrose. The chief object to which he addressed himself as a politician was the reduction of taxation, and to secure this reduction he investigated and, when necessary, challenged every item of public expenditure. But it was not to this line of work only that Hume confined his attention. Almost every branch of domestic policy in turn called for his inquiries: he proposed reforms in the army, the navy, and the ecclesiastical courts. He secured the repeal of the laws forbidding machinery to be exported, and workmen from going abroad. He was also a determined enemy of imprisonment for debt, of flogging in the army, and the system of impressment for the navy. In such useful work he passed the last years of his life.

Hundred; THE. Tacitus, describing the Germans, says that their chiefs are assisted in matters of justice by a hundred companions, and that in war each pagus, or district, furnishes a hundred warriors and the host. These bands, he tells us, are called "hundreds," but "what was once a number is now a name only." Thus the tribe is divided into "hundreds," which are already beginning to lose their connexion with a definite number of warriors, or fully free men. There is no specific evidence of any such division in England till Edgar's "Ordinance how the Hundred shall be held." But in the Frank kingdom the court of the hundred had been the most important part of the judicial machinery as early as the fifth century; and an arrangement of the land in hundreds seems to have been common to most German peoples. It is therefore probable that Edgar's measure was not the creation of the division into hundreds, but the employment for judicial and police purposes of a primitive territorial unit. It does not, however, follow that the hundreds were all originally of the same size; the district given to a hundred warriors would naturally vary in size according to the natural characteristics of the country, and to the amount of land at the disposal of each tribe at the time of the allotment. In historic times the hundreds varied from two square miles to three hundred square miles in area. According to William of Malmesbury, the division into hundreds and tithings was due to Alfred; but certainly Alfred did no more than revive the hundred as a basis of rating. Connecting this tradition with the fact of the first appearance of the name under Edgar, we may regard the revival or development of the hundredal system as a part of the work of reorganization after the Danish attack. The laws of Edgar mention a "hundreds-ealdor" who is to be consulted on questions of witness, and a "hundred-man" whose duty it is to pursue thieves. These may or may not be the same. In the thirteenth century the hundred was represented in the shire-moot by an elected ealdorman; it is therefore likely that the hundreds-ealdor, or hundred-man, was from the first an elected officer. He can scarcely be regarded as more than the convener of the court. In the twelfth century the hundreds were fast becoming dependent upon great lords who managed and took the profits of the court. The hundred-moot, wherein the whole body of suitors or freeholders present were judges, and which was probably presided over by a deputy of the sheriff, was held monthly. It had jurisdiction in all cases; was the court of first instance in criminal matters; and Canute decreed that no case should be brought before the king until it had been heard in the hundred court. The laws of Ethelred direct that "the twelve senior thegns go out and swear in the relic that they will accuse no innocent man nor conceal any guilty one"; the presentment of criminals was therefore probably part of the immemorial work of the hundred court, and a representative body of twelve seems to have acted on behalf of the suitors as a sort of judicial committee. Upon the creation of the system of frankpledges (q.v.), a distinction arose between the great court of the hundred held twice yearly for the sheriff's tourn or view of frankpledge, and with specially full attendance, and the lesser court of the hundred under the bailiff for petty questions of debt. Its criminal jurisdiction was gradually taken from it on the one hand by the growth of the manorial courts-leet and of franchises, and on the other by the creation of the system of itinerant justices. From the twelfth century the hundred ceased to be of much political importance.

Stubbs, "Constitutional History." The laws are printed in Schmid, "Gesetze der Angel-Sachsen" (see also his Glossary, s.v. Hundred); those of Edgar and the "Leges Henrici Primi" are in Stubbs's "Select Charters" (ed. H. W. C. Davis, 1913).

Hundred Rolls, THE, are the result of inquisitions taken by a commission appointed by Edward I at the beginning of his reign, to inquire into various grievances relating to illegal tolls, encroachments on royal and common lands, unlawful tradings, oppressions by the nobility and clergy, etc. These returns are of the greatest importance to the local historian and the genealogist. They derive their names from the fact that the inquiry was conducted from hundred to hundred. A jury in each hundred gave witness to the extent of the demesne lands of the Crown; of manors alienated from the Crown; the names of tenants-in-capite with their services, and the losses incurred by the Crown owing to subinfeudation; the extent of lands held in frank-almoign; the wardships, marriages, escheats, etc., wrongfully withheld from the Crown, and many other items of importance. These Rolls were published by command of the king in 1812.

Hundred Years' War, THE (1338-1453), is the name generally applied to the long period of scarcely interrupted hostility between England and France, which began with Edward III's assertion by arms of his claims to the French throne, and did not finally end until the expulsion of the English from France during the reign of Henry VI. As roughly and vaguely indicating, at least, the culminating century of the long mediæval struggles between the two nations, the term is useful enough. But it must not be taken to indicate any definite war in the way that the terms Thirty Years' War or the Seven Years' War do. The long warfare was interrupted by more than one interval of peace, and more than once changed its character and objects. Despite the claims raised by Edward III in 1328 [EDWARD III], the accession of Philip of Valois was peaceful, and it was not until 1338 that hostilities began. A variety of causes of quarrel had long embittered the relations of England and France, when the strong support which Philip gave to the Scots made war inevitable, and Edward did his best to make the breach irreparable by his obtrusive reassertion of his old claim to the French throne. Strong in his national leadership of the English hatred of France, Edward, as Duke of Guienne, relied also on rallying the feudalists of the south to his side, while he concluded a close alliance with Louis of Bavaria, the imperial vassals of the Netherlands, and the anti-French party in the Flemish cities. From 1338 to 1340 an indecisive war was waged on the northern frontier of France, memorable only for Edward's naval victory of Sluys (June 24, 1340). The lukewarmness and desertion of Edward's allies necessitated a truce, which continued until the dispute between John of Montfort and Charles of Blois for the duchy of Brittany gave English and French, as partisans of Montfort and Charles respectively, an opportunity of renewing their quarrel. In 1345 the general war was resumed. Edward again established intimate relations with Ghent, and Derby in Guienne won the victory of Auberoche, though compelled the next year to stand a siege in Aiguillon. In 1346 Edward, in person, landed with a great army in Normandy, and after a destructive inroad, won the famous victory of Crécy (August 6, 1346), gave the English enduring prestige, and the possession of Calais, which surrendered after a famous siege in 1347. The Black Death (q.v.) now compelled a truce, and the war was not renewed until 1355, when a bloody foray of the Black Prince, at the head of the chivalry of Guienne, bore more fruit than Edward's abortive expedition from Calais. During a similar inroad in 1356 the Black Prince won the victory of Poitiers, where King John of France was taken prisoner. A period of extreme anarchy now set in, in France, of which King Edward availed himself to conclude the very favourable Peace of Brétigny (1360) (q.v.). The treaty was never really carried out, and the war in Brittany continued until the battle of Auray gave Montfort the duchy; and after the Black Prince had lost health and reputation in Spain, the appeal of the barons of Aquitaine led Charles V to renew the war openly in 1369. The skilful strategy of the Constable du Guesclin avoided pitched battles, and wore down the enemy by a partisan warfare of sieges, skirmishes, and ambuscades. The capture of Limoges was the last of the Black Prince's exploits. Lancaster traversed France from end to end in 1373, but he found no enemy and could win no durable results. By 1374 all Guienne was lost except two or three towns on the coast, and in the north Calais alone remained English. The feeble government of the minority of Richard II led the French, even under Charles VI, to retaliation on England; but the war continued very slackly, and with constant truces, until in 1397 Richard II, intent on despotism, established a close alliance with France, cemented by his marriage with Isabella of Valois. But the revolution of 1399 again embroiled England and France in hostilities, and nothing but the weakness of Henry IV and the outbreak of the Burgundian and Armagnac factions prevented a serious renewal of the war; as it was, the judicious trimming of Henry led in 1411 to his securing full possession of Guienne. Henry V, with greater resources, renewed vigorous hostilities. On October 25, 1415, the battle of Agincourt (q.v.) gave him a victory over Burgundian and Armagnac, combined for once to defend their country. In 1417 a second expedition profited by the renewal of civil strife in France; and the capture of Rouen completed the conquest of Normandy. In 1419 the murder of John the Fearless drove the whole Burgundian party on to the English side. A marvellous change of feeling brought the monarchical north of France to welcome the national enemy and head of the feudal separatists. Paris opened its gates to Henry, and the Treaty of Troyes (q.v.) (1420) secured him the succession to the French throne. But Henry's premature death in 1422 led the dauphin, now Charles VII, to renew the war against the regent Bedford. Despite the victories of Crevant and Verneuil (q.v.), the Anglo-Burgundian party failed to hold their own south of the Loire. The mad folly of Bedford's brother alienated Burgundy. A national reaction set in, in France, which found its highest expression in the heroic career of the Maid of Orleans. In 1429 Joan relieved Orleans and defeated the English at Patay; marched to Rheims to crown Charles king, and, though unsuccessful in her attacks on Paris, succeeded in rekindling the spirit of nationality through all north France. The coronation of Henry VI at Paris, and Joan's capture and execution in 1431, failed to stem the tide. In 1435 Burgundy abandoned the English at the Congress of Arras (q.v.), and the death of Bedford completed their discomfiture. In 1437 Paris was lost. A peace party that recognized the futility of continuing the war now grew up in England, but their temporary triumph, though it led to the truce of 1446 and the marriage of Henry VI and Margaret of Anjou, failed to secure a permanent peace. In 1448 the war was renewed, and by 1449 all Normandy fell into the hands of the French. Guienne next fell, and in 1453 Calais alone remained in the English possession in France. The outbreak of the Wars of the Roses finally prevented any prolongation of the long struggle—which had caused so much misery and had been so barren of results—and which, if resulting in bracing up the national life of France, brought little to England but barren glory, chequered with disgrace, and a factious and unruly spirit that found its outcome in the civil wars that now fell upon the land.

Hungarian Refugee Question,

THE (1851). In 1851 Louis Kossuth, the Hungarian revolutionary leader, came to England, and was received with great enthusiasm. The Austrian government (already offended by an attack at Barclay's brewery on the Austrian general, Haynau, September 1850, and by an unconciliatory note of Lord Palmerston's on the subject) looked on these proceedings with great distrust and suspicion, overrating, much as Kossuth himself did, the value of the demonstrations. Lord Palmerston had already used British influence to protect the Hungarian refugees in Turkey, and it became almost understood that if Palmerston received Kossuth at a private interview, as he proposed to do, the Austrian ambassador would leave the country. Lord John Russell grew alarmed, and the result of his remonstrances with Palmerston was that the latter promised to avoid an interview with Kossuth. He consented, however, to receive some deputations from various metropolitan parishes at the foreign office. The addresses brought by these bodies contained strong language with regard to the Austrian government. The whole transaction was eventually made one of the charges of independent action brought against Palmerston as the cause of his dismissal in 1852.

Hunsdon, HENRY CAREY, 1ST LORD (1524 ?-96). [CAREY.]

Hunt, HENRY (1773-1835), better known as "Orator Hunt," was born at Widdington, Wiltshire, and was a farmer in very well-to-do circumstances. In consequence, however, of some misunderstanding, he was expelled from the Marlborough yeomanry by Lord Bruce. He demanded satisfaction, and for this he was indicted in the King's Bench, found guilty, fined, and imprisoned. In prison he met Horne Tooke and other Radicals, who converted him to their party. In 1812 he stood for Bristol, where for some time he had been following the trade of a brewer. The poll was kept open for fourteen days, serious riots took place, and Hunt was beaten in this, as in many subsequent attempts to enter parliament. He now took to stump oratory, held Reform meetings at Westminster, and was especially conspicuous at Spa Fields and Manchester. A warrant was issued against him, and he was arrested at Manchester, tried and imprisoned (1820). During the excitement of the Reform Bill he displaced Lord Stanley as member for Preston, and entered the House of Commons (1830). Here he estranged most of his former associates, including Cobbett, and he was defeated at the 1832 election.

Huntingdon was the seat of one of Edward the Elder's burhs, established about the end of the second decade of the tenth century. It was part of the East Anglian earldom of Harold, but later passed to Waltheof, son of Siward of Northumberland, and thence through Simon de St. Liz to David of Scotland. In the Middle Ages the history of the town is unimportant. It was one of the great centres of the Parliamentarians in the Civil War, being the home of the Cromwell family, and was plundered by the Royalists in 1645.

W. H. B. Saunders, "Legends of Huntingdonshire," 1888.

Huntingdon, PEERAGES OF. The evidence as to the existence of a pre-Conquest earldom of Huntingdon is scanty. Huntingdon was included among the territories ruled by Turi, usually styled Earl of the Middle English, and was later part of Harold's East Anglian earldom. Siward of Northumberland appears subsequently to have held it, and after him Tostig Godwinson, upon whose exile in 1065 it passed to Siward's son Waltheof. Waltheof, Earl of Huntingdon and Northampton, was beheaded in 1076 for complicity in the conspiracy of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk. His daughter Maud married first Simon de St. Liz, and secondly David, afterwards King of Scotland, who successively bore the title of earl. The title then passed to David's younger son, Henry, and afterwards to his half-brother, Simon de St. Liz. Afterwards it reverted to the Scottish house, and was held by David's grandson, Malcolm, and by the latter's son William, both of whom were Kings of Scotland. William, however, was divested about 1174, and Simon de St. Liz, son of the Simon last named, became earl. Then followed David, brother of William, King of Scotland, with whose son the title became extinct (c. 1237). A new earldom was subsequently created in favour of William of Clinton (1337), and again of Guichard, Lord of Angle in Poitou (1377); but neither of these persons left heirs. In 1388 John Holland, afterwards Duke of Exeter, was made Earl of Huntingdon; this title was forfeited when his grandson Henry was attainted (1461). Ten years later Thomas Grey, afterwards Marquis of Dorset, was granted the earldom, which, however, he is stated to have resigned on receiving the marquise; the former being now granted to William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, who died without male issue (1491). In 1529 George, Baron Hastings, was created Earl of Huntingdon, and by his family the honour is still held.

Huskisson, WILLIAM (1770-1830), the son of William Huskisson of Oxley, near Wolverhampton, was educated for the profession of medicine. Shortly before the French Revolution he accompanied his uncle to Paris, and warmly entered into the feelings of the revolutionary party. He became a member of the "Club de Quatre-vingt-neuf," and of the London Corresponding Society, and turned his attention to international policy and commerce. He attracted the attention of Lord Gower, the British ambassador, who offered him the situation of private secretary (1790). In 1793 he was appointed to assist in the projected establishment of an office for arranging the affairs of the French refugees in England. In 1795 he became under-secretary of state for war, and was secretary for the treasury under Pitt (1804) and Perceval (1807). He was chief commissioner of woods and forests in 1814, and elected member for Liverpool in 1823. In that year he was made president of the board of trade, and with him a complete alteration came over our commercial policy, and the reign of protection began to give place and yield to free trade. In his first year he was not able to do much. He offered to remit the import duty on raw cotton if the manufacturers would consent to give up the export duty. This they declined. An attempt was made to free the Spitalfields silk manufacture from restrictions such as the settlement of their wages by a magistrate, but 11,000 journeymen petitioned against the project, and it was dropped. He was, however, successful in practically abolishing the old Navigation Act (q.v.), and thus freeing English and foreign shipping. In 1824 he reduced the duty on raw and spun silk, and lowered the import and export duty on wool. Under Canning Huskisson still retained his old post at the board of trade (1827). On the death of Canning, Huskisson succeeded Lord Goderich as secretary for the colonies (1827). A quarrel, however, shortly broke out about the appointment of a chairman to a finance committee, which was to be formed at the opening of the session, and Huskisson at once sent in his resignation. This produced the downfall of Lord Goderich's government. In 1828 he joined the Wellington ministry, but in a very few months a slight difference of opinion enabled the duke to insist upon his resignation on the East Retford question (q.v.). On September 15, 1830, Huskisson was accidentally killed on the occasion of the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway.

Hutchinson, JOHN (1615-64), was the son of Sir Thomas Hutchinson of Owthorpe, Notts. During the Civil War he was governor of Nottingham for the Parliament, a position of great importance as commanding the passage of the Trent. In 1646 he was elected member for Nottingham, and three years later sat in the High Court of Justice, and signed the king's death warrant. On the expulsion of the Long Parliament (1653) he retired into the country until it was reinstated by the army (October 1659). He was returned to the Convention (May 1660), but though his life was spared he was, as a regicide, incapacitated from public employment. In October 1663 he was imprisoned, and died September 11, 1664. A certificate presented to the House of Lords in his favour in January 1661 affirmed that "above seven years ago, and from time to time ever since, Colonel Hutchinson hath declared his desire of the king's majesty's return to his kingdoms, and his own resolutions to assist in bringing his majesty back." It went on to state that he had been in correspondence with conspirators for that purpose, collected arms for it, and on all occasions assisted the king's friends. These statements, made with Hutchinson's knowledge and approval, throw considerable doubt on the account of his conduct given in his biography by his wife, noticed in the next article.

"Life of Colonel Hutchinson," by Mrs. Hutchinson (first pub. 1806, revised 1805).

Hutchinson, Lucy (1620-59), was the daughter of Sir Allen Apsley, lieutenant of the Tower, where she was born. In 1638 she married Colonel John Hutchinson, was his faithful attendant in all the dangers of his subsequent life, and compiled the memoirs of his life. This work, which is of the greatest importance for the period over which it extends, has been republished several times.

Hutchinson, Thomas (1711-80), was born at Boston. In 1760 he was appointed chief justice of Massachusetts. Nine years later he was made governor of the colony. In this capacity he refused to consent to the wishes of the people when they desired that the tea ships should be sent back without discharging their cargo (1773), and his conduct thus led to the famous destruction of the tea by the citizens of Boston. By this time Hutchinson had lost all the confidence of those whom he governed. Dr. Franklin had exposed the letters he had written to England, advocating a restriction of colonial liberty and the dispatch of troops to Boston. Recognizing his unpopularity, Hutchinson retired to England in 1774.

Hwiccas, The, were probably a mixed body of Angles and Saxons occupying the present counties of Gloucester and Worcester. Of the date of their settlement we have no certain indication, but it is probable that it followed Ceawlin's victory at Deorham in 577. In later days the Hwiccas were merged in the great kingdom of Mercia, but seem to have preserved some traces of their old independence even so late as the close of the seventh century, when Archbishop Theodore gave them a bishop of their own at Worcester.

Hyde, Anne (1637-71), was the daughter of Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon. In 1654 she became maid of honour to the Princess of Orange, and in 1659 a secret contract of marriage took place between her and the Duke of York. On September 3, 1660, she was privately married to the duke. Great efforts were made by the queen-mother to get the marriage annulled, and a plot was got up amongst the courtiers of the queen's party, by Sir Charles Berkeley and others, to induce the duke to repudiate her. These intrigues failed, and she was publicly acknowledged as Duchess of York in December 1660. Her daughter Mary was born April 2, 1662; Anne, February 6, 1664. In August 1670 the duchess became a Catholic. She died on March 31 of the following year.

Biography by J. R. Henslowe, 1915.

Hyde, Edward, 1st Earl of Clarendon (1609-74), son of Henry Hyde of Dinton, Wiltshire, entered Magdalen Hall, 1622, and the Middle Temple, 1625. When the Short Parliament was summoned, Hyde, who had obtained considerable reputation as a lawyer, was elected member for Wootton Bassett. In the Long Parliament he represented Saltash, and took a prominent part in the attack on the maladministration of the last twelve years. Legal abuses, such as the extraordinary courts, the ship-money judgment, the misconduct of the judges, and other causes which had brought into contempt "that great and admirable mystery the law," met with his chief attention. He shared in the earlier portion of the proceedings against Strafford, and his name is not among the list of those who voted against his attainder. But the question of Church government led to his separation from the popular party, and brought him into connexion with the king. In the autumn of 1641 he became, though without any official position, the confidential adviser of Charles, and the real leader of his party in the Commons. He thoroughly disapproved of the king's attempt to seize the Five Members (q.v.), but nevertheless continued in his service, drew up in secret the royal replies to the manifestos of the Parliament, and finally joined the king at York. His great work was the formation of the party of constitutional Royalists, whose leader and spokesman he was, and he now succeeded in persuading the king to abstain from unconstitutional action, and take his stand on his legal rights. Thus he gave the king a policy, and gathered round him a party. In the spring of 1643 he was knighted, made a privy councillor, and appointed chancellor of the exchequer. It was by his counsel that the king summoned the parliament which met in December at Oxford. In all negotiations he was the king's chief agent and adviser, and the Parliament recognized his importance by excepting him from pardon. When, in 1645, the Prince of Wales was sent into the West of England, Hyde went with him as one of his council, and also accompanied him in his flight from the advance of Fairfax, first to the Scilly Isles, then to Jersey (April 1646). In September 1648 the second Civil War and the rumour of an expedition to England called him to Holland to join Prince Charles, but in the spring of the next year he was sent as ambassador to Madrid, and remained in Spain till 1651. At the end of 1652 he rejoined the young king, and from that time till the Restoration acted as his chief minister, being promoted in 1658 to the dignity of lord chancellor. During these years he managed the king's finances, conducted his negotiations with foreign courts, and carried on a constant correspondence with the disaffected in England, which survives in the collection entitled the "Clarendon State Papers." At the Restoration he drew up the Declaration of Breda (q.v.), and it was by his suggestion that the king, instead of attempting to arrange the terms on which he should be restored, referred them unreservedly to the future judgment of parliament. The king's return placed him at the head of the administration; he was elected chancellor of the University of Oxford (October 1660), and created Earl of Clarendon (April 1661). The marriage of his daughter (Anne Hyde) to the Duke of York, which had at first seemed to endanger his power, in the end confirmed it. In his domestic policy he tried to maintain the balance of the constitution against both king and parliament. He opposed the attempt to convert the king's Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.) into law (1663). It was afterwards charged against him that, when he might have secured a revenue which would have made the king independent of parliament, he preferred not to do so. "He had no mind," says Burnet, "to put the king out of the necessity of having recourse to his parliament." On the other hand, when the Cavalier majority of the House of Commons wished to repeal the Act of Indemnity (1662), he set his influence against it, and kept the king to his promises. "He often said it was the making those promises had brought the king home, and the keeping them must keep him at home." When parliament introduced the principle of appropriation of supplies (1665), and the system of auditing expenditures (1666), it was against his advice that the king yielded to them. In ecclesiastical matters he aimed at restoring the state of things which had existed before 1640. The Declaration of Breda had held out to the Nonconformists promises of comprehension and indulgence which were not observed. Clarendon, after some hesitating attempts at a compromise in favour of the Presbyterians, urged the re-establishment of the old ecclesiastical system in all its rigidity, and supported the enactment of the Corporation Act (1661), the Act of Uniformity (1662), the Conventicle Act, and the Five Mile Act (1665) [CLARENDON CODE]. Abroad, the alliance with France, which began under Cromwell's rule, was continued under Clarendon. He favoured the Portuguese match (1662), and negotiated the sale of Dunkirk (1662). He opposed the war with Holland (1665), but continued in office, and was made responsible by public opinion for its mismanagement. He had already been unsuccessfully impeached by the Earl of Bristol (1663). In August 1667 he was dismissed from the chancellorship, and two months later the House of Commons decided on his impeachment. The charges brought against him were corruption, the intention of introducing arbitrary government, and treachery in the late war. In obedience to the king's command, Clarendon fled to France. Parliament summoned him to return and stand his trial, and as he did not do so, sentenced him to exile for life. He therefore remained in France until his death, which took place on December 9, 1674. As a statesman Clarendon was honest and constant to his principles. His attachment to the Church never failed, and his influence with both his masters was always used to prevent changes in its government or discipline. "He did really believe the Church of England the most exactly formed and framed for the encouragement and advancement of learning and piety, and for the preservation of peace, of any Church in the world." For the constitution he had "a most zealous esteem and reverence; and believed it to be so equally poised that if the least branch of the prerogative was torn off or parted with, the subject suffered by it and that his right was impaired; and he was as much troubled when the Crown exceeded its just limits, and thought the prerogative hurt by it." During his first exile he wrote the first seven books of the "History of the Rebellion" and portions of the three subsequent books (1646-8). His object was to explain to posterity the success of the Rebellion, and "to vindicate the memory of those few who out of duty and conscience had opposed and resisted that torrent," i.e., to justify the constitutional Royalists. The rest of the "History of the Rebellion" was written during the second exile. Clarendon at first (1668-70) set to work on an autobiography in which he recounted his life down to the Restoration, and related over again much that he had written in the history. He then changed his mind, and decided to unite the two works, incorporating portions of the "Life" in the earlier work, and also using it to form the latter books of the history. Thus the "History of the Rebellion" consists of two parts, written at two periods; the first composed with the intention of writing a history, the second with the intention of writing a biography. Of these parts the first is the most valuable and the most accurate. The "Continuation of the Life" is an apology for Clarendon's administration, written in 1672 for the information of his children. The "History of the Rebellion in Ireland" was written to vindicate Lord Ormonde.

Hyde, EDWARD, VISCOUNT CORNBURY and 3RD EARL OF CLARENDON (1661-1724), was the son of Henry, Earl Clarendon, and brother of the Earl of Rochester. On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he led three regiments from Salisbury over to William's side; but, finding he could not completely accomplish this act of treachery, stole to the prince's quarters with a few followers. His signature, together with that of several other leading men, was appended to an association in favour of James forged by Robert Young, the Jacobite informer, but nothing could be proved against him (1692). He was subsequently governor of New York for six years, a post in which he displayed great incapacity. He is said upon one occasion to have dressed as a woman in order to represent the queen.

Hyde, HENRY, 2ND EARL OF CLARENDON (1638-1709), was the son of Charles II's great minister. In 1685 he was appointed lord privy seal. At the end of the year he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He found himself completely eclipsed in that country by the influence of Tyrconnel, and (as he was a sincere Protestant) his alarm was great when several Roman Catholics were sworn of the privy council. He nevertheless submitted to Tyrconnel's dictation, and when James threatened to dismiss him for his reluctant compliance in the reform of the army and administration, he wrote humble letters of apology. He was, however, dismissed in 1687, shortly after the dismissal of his brother, Rochester. He was invited to the consultation in aid of the Seven Bishops. When the Declaration of the Prince of Orange was published, he told the king that he had had no part in summoning him to England. He was much grieved at hearing that his son, Lord Cornbury, had deserted James, but at length joined the Prince of Orange at Salisbury. Finding that he was coldly received by William, he soon resumed his Tory principles, and endeavoured to persuade the Princess Anne to insist on her rights to the throne. He took part in the Jacobite plots of 1690. Before setting out for Ireland William sent warning to him through his brother, Rochester. He was subsequently arrested by order of the privy council. He again engaged in Jacobite plots, and letters from him to James were seized among Preston's papers. He was confined in the Tower for six months, but afterwards suffered to go free. On the death of Queen Mary he lost his influence with the Princess Anne. The remainder of his life was spent in obscurity.

Hyde, LAWRENCE, EARL OF ROCHESTER (1641-1711), second son of the great Earl of Clarendon, served as ambassador to John III of Poland in 1676, and as a commissioner at Nimeguen in 1677. He became first lord of the treasury in March 1679. He energetically defended the Duke of York during the struggle over the Exclusion Bill, and was rewarded by being created Viscount Hyde in 1681, and Earl of Rochester in 1682. He was in favour of a return to the foreign policy of the earlier years of the reign, a close alliance with France, while Halifax advocated the policy of the Triple Alliance. The influence of Halifax was the stronger, and Rochester was removed from the treasury in 1684. But shortly afterwards Charles II died; James II at once created his brother-in-law lord treasurer, and he became practically prime minister. But Rochester, though ready to go far in the direction of despotic government, was strongly attached to the English Church, and by no means inclined to support James in his measures for the restoration of Catholicism. A struggle for office ensued between Rochester and the more pliant Sunderland, and when the former definitely refused to change his religion he was dismissed (1687). In 1700 William III thought it necessary to court the support of the High Church party, and called its leader, Rochester, to the cabinet. In the same year he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Dissatisfied with the admission of a few Whigs into the first ministry of Anne, he came over from Ireland and strenuously opposed the carrying on of the war with France. He was ordered to return to Ireland, refused to do so, and sent in his resignation in 1703. In 1710 he became lord president in Harley's ministry, and died in 1711.

Hyde, SIR ROBERT (1595-1665), was a first cousin of the Earl of Clarendon. In 1640 he was returned to the Long Parliament as member for Salisbury, and joined the court party; and in 1644 he was a member of the Oxford Parliament. During the Protectorate he continued his practice at the bar, and on the Restoration was made a judge of the Common Pleas. In 1663 he was promoted to be chief justice of the King's Bench.

Hyder Ali (1722?-82) was a Mohammedan soldier of humble extraction, the son of a petty revenue officer. He entered the service of the Raja of Mysore, and about the year 1759 he succeeded in making himself master of the whole country. Out of the wrecks of the old principalities of South India he soon founded for himself a compact Mohammedan kingdom, and became a most formidable enemy of the British. He was the terror of all his neighbours, the Mahrattas of Poona, the Nawab of the Carnatic, and the Nizam of Hyderabad; while at the same time he was intriguing with the French at Pondicherry. His intrigues roused the suspicions of the British, and more especially so when Nizam Ali deserted their side for that of Hyder. The two new allies invaded the Carnatic, but were driven back, whereupon Nizam Ali renewed his alliance with the British (1768). For the next ten years Hyder Ali was engaged in quietly strengthening his army and his state. At last, on the outbreak of war between the British and the French in 1778, he was enraged at the British expedition sent by way of Mysore from Madras, against the French settlement of Mahé. This action decided Hyder Ali's mind. Bursting into the Carnatic at the head of 100,000 men, he laid the whole country waste with fire and sword (1780). He had allied himself with the French; Nizam Ali and the Mahrattas had engaged to support his arms, and the case of the British seemed very desperate for a time. But Warren Hastings, the governor-general, was more than equal to the occasion. Negotiations secured the friendship, or at least the neutrality, of the Nizam; while Sir Eyre Coote was dispatched against Hyder himself. The great leader of the war was defeated at Porto Novo (1781), and all immediate danger was over from that side. A year and a half later Hyder Ali died suddenly at Chittur (1782).

Ibea. [EAST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Iberians, a name given to the pre-Celtic population of the British Isles, who are supposed to have been of Eastern origin, and to have followed the northern shore of the Mediterranean and the western shore of the Atlantic in their migrations. They were of short stature and swarthy countenance, and were conquered and absorbed by the Celts, who invaded Britain in successive waves in the centuries preceding the Roman invasions. Traces of their language are supposed to exist in certain peculiarities of Welsh, and the Druidic religion has been thought to have been derived from them by the Goidelic Celts. The population in parts of South Wales, moreover, is of the Iberian type, and Iberian characteristics have also been discerned in the small dark Highlander and the Black Celts to the west of the Shannon.

Ibhar, or IBERIUS, St. (d. 500 ?), Bishop of Begerin, was probably a pupil of St. Patrick, and received the name of Ibhar on becoming a Christian. He lived first in the Aran Islands in Galway Bay, afterwards on Geshille Plain, King's County, and later in the island of Begerin in Wexford Haven. He kept a school, and soon gathered monks around him, and his memory is preserved in various local traditions. He died at Begerin.

Iceni, THE, were an ancient British tribe occupying an area roughly corresponding to the modern counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon. On the invasion of Claudius (A.D. 43), they hastened, under their king Prasutagus, to make submission to the emperor; being probably actuated by hostility to the family of Cymbeline (q.v.). In A.D. 48 they revolted against Ostorius Scapula, but were suppressed with comparative ease, and granted easy terms. In A.D. 60 a much more serious rising was provoked by Roman maladministration and injustice, the leader on this occasion being the famous Boudicca (q.v.): the suppression of this rebellion marked the final subjugation of this tribe, and the end of its independent existence.

Sir O. Oman, "England Before the Norman Conquest."

Ida, KING OF BERNICIA (d. 559), is said to have been the founder of that kingdom (547); but this phrase is perhaps to be interpreted as meaning that he united the various petty Anglian settlements existing in that district into one kingdom. His descent is traced from Woden, and he is spoken of as having been a wise and temperate ruler. Ida is said to have been in the prime of his life when he became king. He built the great fortress of Dinguardi or Dinguaro, later called Bebbanburgh, after Bebb, Ethelfrith's queen (the modern Bamburgh). Ida's immediate kingdom probably did not extend south of the Tees, though his power may have been felt beyond that river, for the kingship of Deira, between the Tees and the Humber, does not appear to have been founded previous to his death. He reigned twelve years, and is said to have fallen in a battle against the Britons, with whom he was engaged in constant conflict. The advance of heathen power under him and his sons (six of whom reigned in succession over their father's kingdom) caused a widespread apostasy from Christianity among the Picts.

Ikniel (or ICKNIELD) Way, THE. [ROMAN ROADS.]

"Ikon Basilike: or, the True Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings," was a work published some ten days after Charles I's death, and purported to have been written by that king in the last years of his life. It is divided into twenty-eight chapters, almost every one of which is appropriate to some remarkable incident in the closing years of the king's life. A short sketch of some event or reflection upon it is given, and to this is appended a prayer applicable to the occasion. So Chapter iii, entitled, "Upon his Majesty's going to the House of Commons," begins with an explanation of the king's reasons for this step—"To call in question half a dozen men in a fair and legall way, which God knowes was all my design"; an explanation of the fact that he was attended by some gentlemen of his ordinary guard, and a declaration that he had no design of overawing the freedom of the House. After two pages of such meditation follows a short prayer of some half a page in length, calling God to witness his innocence, and praying for forgiveness on his enemies. The work had an immense sale, though to modern eyes it must seem a somewhat dull performance. Fifty editions are said to have been sold within a year, and it was in vain that parliament gave orders to seize the book. So great was its popularity that in October 1649 Milton had to publish his "Eikonoklastes," or Image-breaker, in answer. The authorship of the "Eikon Basilike" has generally been attributed to John Gauden (q.v.), afterwards Bishop of Exeter.

Immigration. With the exception of the immigration of the Huguenot families from France to this country after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the population of Great Britain was never very largely increased from external sources until within the nineteenth century. The great influx within that period of destitute Russian, Polish, Rumanian, and German Jews drew public attention to the evil, and in 1888 and 1889 parliamentary committees were appointed to consider the questions of foreign pauper immigration and the sweating system. A royal commission was later instituted, and in its report, issued in 1903, it recommended that state legislation should be adopted and enforced to prevent the country from being burdened with undesirable aliens. In 1905 an Aliens Act was passed to check the immigration of such aliens. It was superseded in 1914 by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act (amended 1918 and 1922). [ALIENS.]

Impeachment is the name given to the judicial process by which any man, from the rank of a peer downwards, may be tried before the House of Lords at the instance of the House of Commons. In this case the Commons are the prosecutors, while the Lords combine in their own persons the functions of judge and jury. The process of conducting an impeachment is explained by Sir Erskine May as follows:—Some member of the Lower House charges the accused with high treason, or any other offence of which he may be considered guilty. If he succeeds in winning the House over to his opinion, he is empowered to go to the bar of the House of Lords and there impeach the offender. A committee is next appointed to draw up the articles of impeachment, which are then forwarded to the Lords in writing, with a reservation of power on the part of the Commons to add to the original counts if necessary. A day is then appointed for the trial, which generally takes place in Westminster Hall, under the presidency of the lord high steward if the accused is a peer, or of the lord chancellor in other cases. Certain managers conduct the case on behalf of the Lower House, and the accused may defend himself by counsel. Witnesses are called on both sides, and the whole series of charges is gone through article by article; the accusers are bound to confine themselves to the charges contained in the articles of impeachment, and when they have finished, the offender enters on his defence, after which the prosecutors have a right of reply. All the evidence being then completed, each peer in succession delivers his verdict on the first article in the words, "Guilty [or Not Guilty], upon my honour." And so on for every count. In conclusion, the lord chancellor or lord high steward reckons up the number of votes, and a simple majority acquits or condemns upon each charge. Though the House of Lords may have delivered its verdict, judgment is not to be pronounced unless the House of Commons demand it by their Speaker. On the other hand, in 1679, the House of Commons protested against the Earl of Danby's right to plead the king's pardon when impeached, and by the Act of Settlement (1701) it was made part of the law of the realm "that no pardon under the Great Seal of England shall be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament."

The first case of an impeachment in which both Houses took part would appear to be at the time of the attack on Richard Lyons and Lord Latimer, in the Good Parliament of 1376. Of course in this case we cannot expect to have the full record of proceedings which have characterized the impeachments of much later centuries; and in fact it seems to have been the whole parliament, and not the barons alone, who imprisoned these offenders. The impeachment of the Earl of Suffolk some ten years later (1386) seems to have been more in accordance with those of later times, for the Commons were clearly the prosecutors in this case, while it was the Lords who decided the question of his guilt. In a similar way, the judges who had in 1387 given their decision against the legality of the commissioners appointed in the preceding year were next year impeached by the Commons and found guilty by the Lords (1388). From this time it is hardly necessary to carry on the instances of impeachment down to later times in any detail. The practice was not discontinued for any very long period till the accession of the house of York; but from the reign of Edward IV the institution seems to have fallen into disuse, till it was revived in the reign of James I. Under the house of Tudor the Commons were too closely in accord with the royal authority to make use of their old privilege on their own account, and when the sovereign wished to be rid of an obnoxious subject he found a bill of attainder a readier instrument for effecting his ends. With the revival of the spirit of liberty in the first half of the seventeenth century, impeachments once more became frequent: the first two important instances being those of Francis Bacon (q.v.) in 1621 and the Earl of Middlesex in 1624. Buckingham, who had been very urgent in inducing the Commons to proceed against the latter nobleman, would in his turn have been impeached a few years later had not the king dissolved parliament for the purpose of saving him (1626). The cases of Strafford, Laud, Danby, Warren Hastings, Melville, etc., will be found alluded to under the articles devoted to these statesmen; but that of Fitzharris (q.v.) in the year 1681 deserves a passing notice as being the occasion on which the Commons affirmed their "right to impeach any peer or commoner for treason, or any other crime or misdemeanour." This claim of the Commons seems to have been practically conceded to them, but Blackstone and Lord Campbell are agreed "that a commoner cannot be impeached before the Lords for any capital offence, but only for high misdemeanours." The last impeachment in English history was that of Lord Melville (1805), but an unsuccessful attempt was made to impeach Lord Palmerston in 1848.

Sir T. Erskine May, "Constitutional History," ed. F. Holland, 3 vols., 1912; W. S. Holdsworth, "History of English Law," vol. i, 1922; Sir W. Anson, "Parliament." [T. A. A.]

Imperial Conference, THE, from 1907 has been an integral part of the machinery of government of the British Commonwealth of Nations. It developed from various colonial conferences which embodied a vague imperial sentiment in late nineteenth-century politics, and was constituted as a conference of prime ministers of the self-governing Dominions with the prime minister of Great Britain assisted by some of their ministers, to meet every four years to discuss matters of common interest. It was provided with a permanent secretariat on Lord Elgin's reorganization of the colonial office and modified in 1917 to admit India. In 1923 Ireland was first represented.

On the occasion of Queen Victoria's Jubilee in 1887, Stanhope called a conference of all colonial governors. Delegates arrived from all the self-governing colonies, Natal, Western Australia, and some of the Crown colonies, and discussed the organization of colonial defence with especial reference to Pacific naval problems and communications. From this resulted the Imperial defences inspection by Sir Bevan Edwards in 1890 and the Intercolonial conference at Melbourne which led to Australian federation largely for purposes of defence. In 1894 delegates from all the Australasian colonies, and the Cape and Canada, met at Ottawa on the invitation of the Dominion to discuss intercolonial trade and colonial trade with Great Britain. Resolutions in favour of an Imperial preferential tariff, a British-owned mail service between Great Britain and Australia via Canada, and of a Canada-Australian cable under British control were passed. Work was begun on the cable in 1902. On Queen Victoria's completion of sixty years' reign in 1897 the premiers of all the self-governing colonies were invited to London, and Joseph Chamberlain took occasion to hold a private conference on defence and trade relations. This was followed by Great Britain's denunciation, at the colonies' request, of existing commercial treaties with Germany and Belgium, and by the Canadian Tariff Act giving a British preference. In 1902 the premiers of the self-governing colonies were present at King Edward VII's coronation, and a conference resulted in an improved Australasian naval agreement and offers from the Cape and Natal to increase their contribution to the Imperial navy, to which Newfoundland now added a grant.

These colonial conferences were but a prelude to the Imperial Conferences which followed. Lyttelton's dispatch of 1905 suggesting a regular Imperial Conference was embodied in Resolution 1 of the conference of the prime ministers of all the self-governing colonies, including the newly-created Transvaal, held in 1907. The conference was given a constitution, the title of Imperial, and a permanent secretariat. It resolved that a general staff for Imperial defence and mail communications with Australia via Canada be established, that emigration should be encouraged to the colonies, and that uniformity of naturalization and company laws, trade statistics and marks be attempted, and that the rules governing colonial appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council be codified and brought up to date. It also reaffirmed the 1902 resolution for preferential trade, but to this the representatives of H.M.'s government were unable to agree. To embody these resolutions, orders-in-council were issued regulating appeal procedure; trade commissioners, a kind of consular service for commercial relations, were established in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, and an agent of the board of trade in Newfoundland; trade statistics of the Dominions were modified to show their trade with Great Britain and the empire, and some steps were taken towards uniformity in company and naturalization law and in trade-marks and patents.

A Defence Conference was held in 1909, and Australia and New Zealand substantially contributed to the Pacific squadron, while the Canadian fleet was inaugurated and a plan for Imperial mobilization drawn up. A copyright conference was held in 1910 to accept the Revised Copyright Convention of Berlin (1908), the acceptance of which was embodied in subsequent legislation (1911-23).

The Imperial Conference of 1911 was attended by all the prime ministers and by two other ministers each from Canada, Australia, and South Africa, and one each from New Zealand and Newfoundland. The constitution of the conference was approved and the question of how far colonies could be consulted in treaty-making was thoroughly discussed in view of the fact that the Declaration of London (1908) had been concluded without consultation. It was agreed that consultation should precede instructions for the Hague Conference, that conventions, etc., affecting the Dominions be circulated before being signed, and that Great Britain would approach foreign powers so to alter existing treaties with Great Britain as to allow the Dominions to be excepted therefrom if they wished. This was subsequently done in the case of commercial treaties with Sweden, Norway, Denmark, France, Costa Rica, Colombia, and Switzerland. It was also resolved, and carried out, to appoint two more lords of appeal for colonial cases and the number of overseas judges to be members of the judicial committee of the privy council raised to seven. With regard to emigration the colonial secretary declared that no more workers could be spared from Great Britain. The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, was redrafted to suit a resolution of the conference, and similar legislation passed in Canada, Newfoundland, in Australia (1921), and South Africa (1926), to give recognition to empire citizenship. Action was also taken with regard to cables, and a royal commission on the resources and trade of the empire with a view to improving intercolonial trade was appointed and reported at length by 1917. Shipping equality was also discussed and representatives from the four dominions signed the International Radiotelegraphic Convention in London, 1912.

The next Imperial Conference was postponed owing to the Great War, but various Imperial developments on similar lines are interesting. At Mr. Lloyd George's suggestion an Imperial war cabinet of the British cabinet with the addition, on a basis of equality, of the Dominion premiers and a representative from India was formed and held sessions in 1917 and 1918. In the latter session it was affirmed that Dominion prime ministers could communicate direct at will with the prime minister of Great Britain and could appoint a visiting delegate to attend the war cabinet meetings. Simultaneous Imperial War Conferences were held, with the colonial secretary as chairman, which resolved in favour of Imperial preference, recognized the "Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth," and their right, with India, "to have an adequate voice in foreign policy and foreign relations," all this compatibly with local autonomy, and proposed to embody these in a post-war conference. An Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau was set up, India was given the status of a Dominion and reciprocity of treatment agreed upon, while the question of double income taxation was mooted. The Imperial War Graves Commission was also set up. The conference of 1918 also reviewed Imperial economics and set up a committee on raw materials, minerals, petroleum, and dyes, while post-war supervision of shipping, an Imperial news service, transatlantic cable, and an intercolonial parcels delivery service were agreed upon and an Imperial Court of Appeal, naturalization, Imperial migration, statistics, and demobilization discussed. Specified conditions were laid down for reciprocity in the matter of Indian emigration. Imperial co-operation in the peace negotiations followed preliminary discussions in London, and two delegates each from Australia, South Africa, Canada, and India, with one from New Zealand and five for the British Empire, formed the British Empire delegation which used the panel system in meetings and ultimately signed the Peace Treaty as six separate powers, all of whom became original members of the League of Nations.

The Overseas Settlement Committee was formed in 1918 and state-aided emigration encouraged, while the 1919 budget gave a one-sixth Imperial preference on tea, cocoa, sugar, and tobacco, while the Mineral Resources Bureau was incorporated by a royal charter.

In 1920 Imperial statistical, entomological, and forestry conferences were held, and in 1922 an Imperial customs conference as well, while the Imperial Shipping Committee under Sir H. Mackinder issued a number of reports. The findings of the royal income-tax commission on double income taxation within the empire were embodied in the 1920 Finance Act and co-ordinated by legislation with Australia and New Zealand. A beginning was also made to carry out the 1920 report on high-power wireless stations.

The Imperial Conference of 1921 held in London under the chairmanship of Mr. Lloyd George (Newfoundland alone not being represented) considered in detail Imperial foreign policy and concomitant subjects, empire settlement and citizenship, defence and communications, and shipping. This was a useful preparation for the Washington Conference at which Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and India were represented and participated in the limitation of naval armaments, the Quadruple Pacific Treaty, and the Nine-power treaty re China conventions. The Dominions were also represented at the International Conference at Genoa and the technical conference at The Hague in 1922.

In 1922 the Empire Settlement Act granted one and a half, for 1922-3, and three millions subsequently for empire settlement. Legislation on status embodied resolutions of the previous conference. A conference on an empire patent (1922) was also held.

In 1923 an Imperial Conference was held concurrently with the Imperial Economic Conference (under the president of the board of trade), at both of which the Irish Free State was represented. An understanding was reached on the main heads of foreign policy, and treaty negotiation, signature, and ratification discussed. The status of high commissions was fixed and various matters of defence discussed.

At the Imperial Economic Conference (1923) the colonies and protectorates were represented as well as the self-governing Dominions, and resolutions passed in favour of Imperial preference, overseas settlement, financial co-operation for Imperial development, better Imperial communications and defence, while a permanent Imperial economic committee was advocated. The first and the last of these resolutions alone were not accepted by the Labour government of 1924 and parliament did not pass the preferential tariff proposals. In 1923 a British Empire Forestry Conference had been held in Canada and an Imperial Mycological Conference in 1924. The London Reparation Conference of 1924 followed from a discussion in 1923 of the United States' offer to participate in an inquiry. The Singapore naval base was negatived by Mr. MacDonald in 1924, but accepted by Mr. Baldwin, while Mr. MacDonald's suggestion to discuss foreign policy was negatived by Mr. Baldwin.

Neither Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, nor the Irish Free State would accept in 1924 the protocol for the pacific settlement of international disputes put forward by the fifth assembly of the League of Nations. In 1925 preferential tariffs were granted without raising existing duties and colonial state enterprises rendered immune from taxation; the Imperial Institute was reorganized, progress made in wireless communication with the outer empire, and an Empire Marketing Board set up with a grant of half a million. An Imperial Entomological Conference was also held (1925). The Dominions were kept informed of negotiations during 1925 of the Treaty of Locarno, and in the mutual Guarantee of London provision was made for the self-exclusion of the Dominions and India on the receipt of notice.

The chief work of the Imperial Conference of 1926 was done by a committee of prime ministers and heads of delegates under Lord Balfour on the general principles to govern inter-Imperial relations. Recognition was made of "autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another, in any aspect of domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations."

The title of the king was changed to "George V by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India," while the governor-general in a Dominion was recognized as being the representative of the Crown rather than of the government at Westminster, and no longer the formal channel of communication, the Dominion premier now having direct access. In foreign relations, Locarno was approved and the protocol re a permanent court of international justice and compulsory arbitration were discussed.

Special committees were appointed on some of the main topics, e.g., League of Nation mandates, shipping, and general economic sub-committees, e.g., on films and research, were set up.

Impressment. The practice of impressment, or compelling men to serve in the navy, seems to date back to a very early period of our history. It is said to have been in full force in the reign of John, that is, from the time of almost the first English king who was possessed of a regular royal fleet. Towards the end of the same century we find Edward I empowering William de Leybourne to impress men, vessels, and arms for the manning of his fleet. So, too, we read in the Black Book of the Admiralty that if a mariner who had been pressed for the king's naval service ran away he should undergo a year's imprisonment. The same penalty for the same offence may be traced in the legislation of later sovereigns, Richard II (1378), Henry VI (1439), and Elizabeth (1562-3), showing that this method of manning the royal vessels was in full force during these centuries. Towards the middle of the sixteenth century we come across what seems to be a serious attempt to make it criminal for a man to take steps for eluding impressment. In 1555 (2 and 3 Philip and Mary, xvi, 6), a very harsh law was passed against the Thames bargemen, according to which if any watermen "shall willingly, voluntarily, and obstinately hyde themselves in the tyme of prestying into secret places and out corners," they should suffer a fortnight's imprisonment and be debarred from following their calling for another year. A more generous enactment some seven or eight years later (1562-3) attempted to restrain the arbitrary character of impressments by enjoining that "no fisherman haunting the sea should be taken by the queen's commission to serve her highness as a mariner on the sea," without the commissioners having first consulted two neighbouring justices of the peace. Still more indulgent was the spirit displayed in a statute of 1695, according to which the lord high admiral was empowered to grant letters "to any landsmen desirous to apply themselves to the sea services and to serve in merchant shippis which shall be to them a protection against being impressed for a space of two years or more." The provisions of the act of 1555, with somewhat altered details and increased penalties, were, however, re-enacted after a lapse of one hundred and fifty years under Queen Anne (1705). Under George II the impressment question was once more taken up and its stringency modified (1739-40). By a statute passed in this reign it was decreed that all persons above fifty-five and under eighteen years of age should be exempt from impressment; and an attempt to encourage men to adopt a sailor's life was made at the same time by a clause which granted freedom from the above liability to all sailors who chose to demand it for two years from the time of their first going to sea. An act of William IV's reign improved the position of the impressed sailor still further by limiting his term of service to five years—unless in a case of urgent necessity when the admiral might enlarge it by six months (1835). By this time, however, the practice of impressment, which had been very extensively used during the great wars in the opening years of the century, had been rapidly losing ground, and its place is now altogether supplied by voluntary enlistment. Impressment is, however, still legal, though the Naval Enlistment Act of 1853 has, perhaps, the effect of limiting the liability to serve to seafaring men.

Incident, THE (1641), is the name given to a supposed plot to assassinate the Earls of Hamilton and Argyll during the visit of Charles I to Scotland in the summer of 1641. Although a parliamentary inquiry was instituted, the circumstances still remain shrouded in mystery; and it is scarcely possible to do more than guess at the real nature of the affair. It is said that the scheme was Montrose's, and that Charles I himself was privy to it; but there seems to be no foundation for the statement. Ludovick Lindsay, Earl of Crawford, was one of its most prominent authors.

Income Tax. The history of the income tax as a recognized means of supplementing the other financial resources of the State dates from the time of William Pitt's premiership, when (in 1799) a bill was passed imposing a graduated tax on all incomes above £60 a year. This tax continued to be levied till the end of the continental war, with the exception of a slight break for part of the years 1802 and 1803; and by the year 1806 had reached the rate of 10 per cent. It was not renewed after 1816 till the time of Sir Robert Peel's second administration (1841), when it was levied for three years at the rate of sevenpence in the pound, a deduction of £150 being allowed on all incomes. Time after time it was then renewed—but always for a limited period only, till in 1853 arrangements were made for its gradual extinction in seven years. Then, however, the Russian war intervened, and instead of being reduced it was doubled. From this time it has become a regular item in the revenue; and it has now almost entirely lost its original character of a special war-tax, though an increase in its rate still remains the readiest means of meeting the expenses of a war. In 1907 differential treatment was applied to earned and unearned incomes, a lower rate being imposed on the former. Since then further allowances for family obligations and relief in other special cases have been allowed, several changes having been introduced as a result of the report of the Royal Commission on the income tax in 1920. In 1910 a super-tax was imposed on incomes in excess of £5,000. The effect of the War of 1914-18 has been to bring down the super-tax limit to £2,000, increasing until 6s. in the pound is charged on all in excess of £30,000. The ordinary income-tax rate reached its highest point in 1918 when it stood at 6s.

Independents. [CONGREGATIONALISM.]

India. HISTORY.—The history of the British connexion with India dates from the days when Vasco da Gama rounded the Cape, and sighted the shores of Hindustan, on May 17, 1498. Indian products began to find their way to Europe first through the hands of the Portuguese, and then through the Venetians, who carried on their Eastern trade by way of Egypt and the Red Sea, thus anticipating the important route of modern times. On December 31, 1600, a charter was granted to "the Governor and Company of the Merchants trading unto the East Indies," entitling them to exclusive trade with the countries between the Cape of Good Hope and the Straits of Magellan. The first vessels dispatched returned home with cargoes of cinnamon, cloves, and pepper, and realized 95 per cent. profit on the capital invested. It was soon evident that the English would have to defend themselves against the jealousy of the Portuguese and Dutch, and a new charter was granted, with stringent provisions against "interlopers." In 1612 Captain Best repulsed a vastly superior Portuguese fleet, landed all his goods at the Surat factory, and obtained a confirmation of a commercial treaty between the Mogul emperor and the British.

During the following years subordinate agencies were started at Gogra, Ahmedabad, Cambay, and Ajmer, and at various places in the Indian archipelago. This led to numerous broils with the Portuguese and Dutch, which culminated in a massacre by the Dutch at Amboyna, in 1623. For this outrage the Dutch had to pay £3,615 as compensation; but from that date until the great naval wars, which began in 1793, they became supreme in those parts, and practically monopolized the trade of the Indian archipelago. In 1634 the company obtained a firman from the Great Mogul for permission to trade in Bengal, whence the Portuguese were expelled. Five years later Fort St. George, or Madras, was founded, and in 1661 Bombay was ceded to the British Crown as part of the dowry of Catherine of Braganza, and was subsequently transferred by Charles II to the East India Company. The separation of Bengal from Madras, 1681, was followed by Charles I's grant of the right of war and peace. Rival companies tried to prevent the renewal of the company's charter, but largesse and Godolphin tided the difficulties by 1708, when the rival Whig company was absorbed.

Our earliest territorial possession in India properly so-called was Madras, which was founded by Francis Day and purchased from the Raja of Chandragiri for an annual rent of about £500 to the representatives of the Mogul Empire. On the death of Aurungzeb (q.v.), in 1707, southern India broke up into a number of minor states. In 1744 war broke out between the French and British, and two years later Madras surrendered to a French squadron under La Bourdonnais. Indecisive hostilities followed, but the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, restored Madras to the British. Their first successes had, however, inspired Duplex with the ambition of founding a French empire in India, under the shadow of the Mohammedan powers. The British and French favoured the claims of rival candidates to the throne of Arcot. A war ensued, the chief incident of which was the capture and subsequent defence of Arcot in 1751 by Clive. For some years it continued, and culminated in 1760 in a final struggle, which was crowned by the decisive victory obtained by Colonel (afterwards Sir Eyre) Coote at Wandewash over the French. Pondicherry and Ginjee subsequently capitulated, and the French were expelled from Hindustan.

In Bengal, in 1740, Ali Vardi Khan, a usurper, but the last of the great nawabs of Bengal, ruled over Bengal, and in his days the Mahratta horsemen began to ravage up to the walls of Calcutta. The "Mahratta ditch" (q.v.) was constructed to keep them off. Ali Vardi Khan's grandson, Shuja-ud-Dowlah (q.v.), a youth of ferocious temper, marched on Calcutta with a large army in pursuit of an escaped kinsman who had aggrieved him, and thrust the remnant of the British who failed to fly at his approach into the "Black Hole," or military prison of Fort William. Out of 146 who were imprisoned there in during that fatal night in June, only 23 survived. Clive and Admiral Watson promptly sailed from Madras to the Ganges, recovered Calcutta, and induced the nawab to conclude a peace advantageous to the company. But the outbreak of hostilities between the British and French found Shuja-ud-Dowlah ranged on the side of the latter. Clive by a daring attack routed the nawab's force at Plassey (1757) (q.v.). Mir Jafar (q.v.), Clive's nominee, was placed on the viceregal throne at Murshidabad for vast sums of money, while the nawab made a grant to the company of the landholders' rights over the district of the Twenty-four Pargunnahs, an extent of 882 square miles around Calcutta.

In 1758 Clive was appointed the first governor of all the company's settlements in Bengal. He defeated the Shahzada, and finally crushed French influence throughout the nizam's territories. The return of Clive to England was followed by the dethronement of Mir Jafar and the substitution in his place of Mir Kasim (q.v.), his son-in-law, who provoked hostilities with the company. A massacre of Englishmen and sepoys at Patna and a sepoy mutiny, quelled by Major Munro, were followed by the battle of Buxar, 1764, which brought the ruler of Oudh and the Mogul emperor to the feet of the British.

The following year Clive (now Baron Clive of Plassey, and for the second time governor of Bengal) proceeded to Allahabad, and restored Oudh to the Nawab Vizir on payment of half a million sterling. The diwani, or fiscal administration of Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa, and the territorial jurisdiction of the Northern Circars were granted to the company, a puppet nawab was maintained on an allowance at Murshidabad, and tribute paid to the emperor. Thus the British received the revenue and maintained the army, while the criminal jurisdiction was vested in the nawab. Clive reformed the company service by increasing salaries from the revenues of the salt monopoly and by prohibiting private trade and the acceptance of presents, which had previously led to much venality.

Lord Clive left India for the last time in 1767. By Lord North's Regulating Act (1770), the government was reorganized. The company received a loan of a million and agreed to pay the £400,000 yearly to parliament. A supreme court with royal judges was established, the governor's council was appointed by the Crown, and the governor of Bengal was made governor-general of India. Two years later Warren Hastings (q.v.) assumed the governorship, the interval having been marked by a disastrous famine (1770), which is believed to have carried off one-third of the inhabitants. Warren Hastings abolished the dual system of government, removed the exchequer from Murshidabad to Calcutta, and appointed British collectors to see to the collection of the revenues and the administration of justice. He also created the nucleus of a police. He was, however, much thwarted in his reforms by the wars forced on him by native princes, by the incessant pressure from home for money, and the constant opposition of his colleague in council, Philip Francis. Hastings reduced the large allowance paid to the nawab, he resold to the Vizir of Oudh the provinces of Allahabad and Kora, formerly assigned by Clive to the Emperor Shah Allum, now forfeited, as Hastings contended, by the seizure of the emperor by the Mahrattas, and withheld the tribute of £300,000 from the puppet emperor. British troops were also hired to the Vizir of Oudh to enable him to put down the Rohilla Afghans. Warren Hastings also improved the financial position of the company by the so-called plunder of Cheyte Singh and the Begum of Oudh. For these and other alleged acts of oppression he was impeached in the House of Lords, and after seven years acquitted. Warren Hastings was practically ruined by the cost of the defence, and left dependent on the charity of the court of directors.

By the Treaty of Surat, concluded in 1775, Ragunath Rao ceded Salsette and Bassein in consideration of being recognized as sovereign at Poona. Hastings disapproved of the treaty, but on the outbreak of the first Mahratta War dispatched energetic officers across the peninsula, who conquered Gujarat, and captured the rock fortress of Gwalior. The reverse sustained by the Bombay force, however, equalized matters, and the Treaty of Salbai practically restored the status quo. Meantime Hyder Ali of Mysore (q.v.) fell upon the British possessions in the Carnatic, and ravaged the country up to Madras. Sir Eyre Coote hastened to the scene, but the contest was a tough one, and the peace concluded with Tippoo (q.v.), Hyder's son and successor, was based on a mutual restitution of all conquests.

Dundas's bill of 1783 was followed by Fox's India Bill, by which the company's authority was transferred to seven commissioners appointed by parliament (vacancies to be filled by the Crown), while the commerce and property of the company were administered by a subordinate council of directors nominated by the court of proprietors. This was rejected, but Pitt's India Bill passed in 1784 by which a board of control to supervise the political activities of the company was established as a ministerial department, while the appointment of the chief officers of the company had to receive royal sanction. Commerce and patronage, however, were left entirely to the company.

In 1786 Hastings was succeeded by Lord Cornwallis as governor-general. The settlement of the land revenue of Bengal was introduced by him in 1789 to stabilize the company's finances but made permanent in 1793, thus fixing the land tax at a low rate, preventing increased revenue with the increasing value of the land.

The second Mysore War of 1790-2 was undertaken by Lord Cornwallis with the Nizam of the Deccan and the Mahratta confederacy as allies. It resulted in the partition of half of Tippoo's dominions among the allies, and the payment of three millions sterling as indemnity.

Lord Mornington (Marquis Wellesley) during his rule enunciated the guiding principle that the British must be the one paramount power in India, the gradual development of which policy culminated in the proclamation of Queen Victoria as Empress of India in 1877. The presence of French battalions in the native states, and French intriguers in the islands of Mauritius and Bourbon, as well as in Hindustan itself, suggested to Wellesley the idea of frustrating all possibility of a French invasion of India by crushing their hopes there. The Mogul Empire was quite broken up, so the task of establishing our supremacy in northern India was at first easy. By the Treaty of Lucknow a large tract of territory was ceded to the British by the Nawab Vizir of Oudh, in lieu of a subsidy for British troops, thus extending British rule as far as the heart of the North-West Provinces. The Nizam of Hyderabad, to the south, was easily dealt with; his French battalion at Hyderabad was disbanded, and the nizam bound by treaty not to take any European into his service without the consent of the British government, a clause of universal application nowadays in the treaties with native states. Tippoo, Sultan of Mysore, was next crushed, his intrigues being rewarded by the capture of his stronghold of Seringapatam, where he died fighting (1799) and the partial partition of his territory among the nizams, the Mahrattas, and the British. The central portion was erected into a separate state (Mysore) under a descendant of the Hindu rajas whom Hyder Ali had dethroned. Wellesley then deliberately set out to bring the remainder of the native states into the subsidiary system. This led to the second Mahratta War (1802-4) and the cession of all territory north of the Jumna and the establishment of British protection over the emperor and Orissa, while Berar was handed over to the nizam. By the end of Wellesley's administration the North-West Provinces had been added to British India, the peshwa reduced, and the Madras Presidency formed.

Lord Wellesley was succeeded by Lord Cornwallis, now an old man, whose policy during his second and short tenure of office was to practise economy and relieve the financial pressure caused by prolonged military operations. The same policy was followed by Sir G. Barlow (1805), but on Lord Minto's arrival (1807) more resolute counsels prevailed, and though enjoined to abstain from drawing the sword, he managed to consolidate Wellesley's conquests. The islands of Mauritius and Java were occupied and friendly missions were dispatched to the Punjab, Afghanistan, and Persia. Lord Moira, afterwards Marquis of Hastings, was in power for nine years (1814-23), during which period two important wars were waged against the Gurkha mountaineers, or inhabitants of Nepal, subdued in 1815, and against the Pindaris and Mahrattas. In 1817 Hastings completely crushed the Pindaris of Central India, and the territory of the peshwa was annexed to the Bombay Presidency. Lord Amherst's administration (1823-8) was marked by the first Burmese War waged to repulse the aggressive King of Ava. After the loss of 20,000 lives and an expenditure of 14 millions in two years, by the Treaty of Yandaboo were ceded the provinces of Arakan and Tenasserim to the British, the king retaining the valley of the Irawadi. Another important event was the capture of Bharatpur (q.v.), which had baffled the army of Lord Lake in 1805, and which, protected by its impenetrable massive mud walls, was regarded as impregnable.

ADMINISTRATION.—The history of the British as benevolent administrators ruling with a single eye to the good of the natives may be said to have begun with Lord William Bentinck. He restored equilibrium to the budget, crippled by the Burmese War, by various important financial measures, and abolished suttee, or widow-burning, and the thugs, or hereditary assassins. In 1833 the East India Company's charter was renewed for twenty years, but on condition that the company should abandon its trade monopoly and permit Europeans to settle in the country, while a legal member, not a servant of the company, was added to the council. Other events of Lord William Bentinck's administration were the appointment of a commission to codify the law, the placing of the native state of Mysore under British rule (1830), and the annexation of Coorg, with the consent of the inhabitants.

After a brief interregnum, during which Sir Charles (afterwards Lord) Metcalfe held the viceroyalty, Lord Auckland (1836-42) began his rule, which is conspicuous for the memorable Afghan War, caused by an attempt to extend British influence in the north-west by using the Afghan prince as a weapon against French and Russian penetration. [AFGHAN WARS (1).]

The following year saw the conquest of the Amirs of Sind by Sir Charles Napier. Under Sir Henry (afterwards Lord) Hardinge, the Sikh War resulted in the recognition of Dhuleep Singh as the infant raja and the establishment of the Punjab as a British residency.

Probably, however, the most important results ensued from the administration of Lord Dalhousie (1848-56). Though sincerely desirous of peace, and of advancing the moral and material condition of the country, Dalhousie found himself compelled to fight two wars and to annex extensive territory in the Punjab, Burma as well as Nagpur, Oudh, and other minor states. At the same time he founded the Public Works Department with a view to creating the network of roads and canals now covering India. He opened the Ganges Canal, the largest irrigation work in India, and turned the sod of the first railway. He promoted steam communication with England via the Red Sea, and introduced cheap postage and the electric telegraph. After the second Sikh War, during which the Sikh army was wellnigh destroyed at Gujarat, the Punjab became a British province, and, thanks mainly to the successful labours of the two Lawrences and Colonel (afterwards Lord) Napier, became so contented and prosperous that the Indian Mutiny failed to turn its populace into rebels. The second Burmese War (1852) arose out of the ill-treatment of some merchants at Rangoon, and resulted in the annexation of the valley of the Irawadi, under the name of the province of Pegu, since which time British Burma has made the most astonishing strides in material development. Dalhousie, on the ground of persistent native misrule, also annexed Oudh and several other native states, including Nagpur and Suttara. His successor was Lord Canning, a year after whose accession began the Indian Mutiny. The causes of this great convulsion are still obscure, but probably may be traced to the excitable feelings of a fanatical though subject race alarmed at the sight of important annexations, such as those which have inevitably accompanied the development of the British power. The outbreak at Meerut occurred on May 10, 1857, and the mutinous sepoys hastened to Delhi, which thus became the centre and rallying-point of the rebellion. The Punjab was held by Lawrence, but the Cawnpore garrison fell to Nana Sahib, while Lucknow, fortified by Sir H. Lawrence, was relieved first by Havelock, and finally by Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde. The people of Oudh and Rohilkhand, who had risen en masse, were next attacked and vanquished by Campbell, while in Central India Sir Hugh Rose (afterwards Lord Strathnairn) conducted an equally successful campaign against the Rani, or Princess, of Jhansi, and Tantia Topi [INDIAN MUTINY].

This mutiny led to the extinction of the East India Company, for it was felt that the administration of India was now a national matter. In 1853 its position had been rendered anomalous by the substitution of open competition for patronage. An act was passed, to give effect to the assumption of the government by the Crown (1858). The company existed as a medium for distributing stock, but was finally extinguished in 1873. On July 8, 1859, peace was proclaimed. The cost of suppressing the mutiny had, however, been so serious that James Wilson, a distinguished financier, was sent to Calcutta to balance the budget. He reorganized the customs, imposed an income tax and licence duty, and created a State paper currency.

Lord Elgin's short rule (1862-3) was succeeded by that of Sir John Lawrence, who saw the Bhutan War, the ensuing annexation of the Duars, and the Orissa famine of 1866. The same year was marked by a serious commercial crisis which injured the rising tea industry in Bengal, and caused widespread ruin in Bombay. Lawrence returned in 1869. Lord Mayo's brief tenure of office was occupied with several useful measures, among which the creation of an agricultural department and of a system of provincial finance are important. He initiated the reform of the salt duties and developed the material resources of the country by roads, railways, and canals. He was assassinated in the Andaman Islands (1872). Lord Northbrook, who followed (1872-6), successfully contended with a famine in Lower Bengal by organized State relief. The tour of the Prince of Wales (afterwards Edward VII), 1875-6, was followed by the proclamation of Queen Victoria as Empress of India (January 1, 1877) at a durbar of unusual pomp, held on the Ridge above Delhi. This scene of rejoicing was followed by a disastrous famine throughout the Deccan and other parts of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies, which, despite the best efforts of the government, resulted in a loss of over five million lives.

The Afghan War of 1878 led to the temporary occupation of Kabul and Kandahar by the British [AFGHAN WARS (2)]. The appointment of the Marquis of Ripon in the place of Lord Lytton in 1880 was followed by the evacuation of Kandahar and other Afghan positions. Ripon's measures included a large extension of Lord Mayo's system of provincializing the finances, which has been attended with the happiest results, a scheme for the enlargement of native self-government, varied according to the requirements of the different provinces, and a law, known as the Ilbert Act, which has removed one of the disabilities under which native civilians laboured in regard to their powers of trying Europeans. In 1884 a commission was appointed, and the north-western frontier of Afghanistan delimited. An outbreak in Chitral in 1895 necessitated a large military expedition to relieve the garrison, and two years later a large number of troops was dispatched to quell the rising of the tribes along the whole border from Chitral to Baluchistan. A plague broke out in 1896. In 1897 an earthquake devastated Assam, and in the same year a famine affected an area of about 570,000 square miles with a population of 130,000,000. In 1900 occurred another famine, affecting tracts containing a population of 85 millions; and at one time over six millions were in receipt of relief. In 1905 a severe earthquake occurred in Northern India, causing great loss of life and damage to property. During the winter of 1905-6 the Prince and Princess of Wales (afterwards King George V and Queen Mary) made an extensive tour through India. By the partition of Bengal—effected in 1905, reconstituting the provinces of Bengal and Assam—the Bengali-speaking population found themselves divided into two provinces under separate governments. Considerable opposition to this division was manifested by the Bengali, and meetings were held in favour of boycotting British goods. In 1908 the unrest assumed such a violent character that the laws relating to the Press and to explosives were very considerably strengthened, and special prosecutions under these laws were carried out in 1909.

The twentieth century has seen the growth of a number of native movements which have voiced dissatisfaction with existing governmental methods and which are in themselves the expression of self-determining instincts in the progress of India. These movements have to some extent been met by constitutional and administrative experiments which have failed to satisfy the varying demands, the logical outcome of which is complete native autonomy. Disinclination to relinquish the white man's burden coupled with commercial and philanthropic fears have retarded the government's surrender of authority which necessity will probably cause at no distant time. Indians demand complete autonomy, and, with the application of Western methods of politics and propaganda by the educated classes to the masses of India, there is little doubt but that this demand will have to be met. The history of this movement begins perhaps in the first session of the unofficial Indian National Congress of 1885, which urged native representation in government. Lord Cross's Indian Councils Act (1892) provided for the addition of nominated non-officials to represent provinces in the governor-general's council and for the nomination by various municipalities, universities, and trading associations of eleven out of the twenty members added to the provincial legislatures of Madras and Bombay. In 1891 the permanent civil service was reorganized. The Imperial Indian Civil Service was recruited in England and natives could compete, while both the provincial and subordinate services were definitely opened to Indians. An educational report, followed by the reform of the universities (1904), preluded the Morley-Minto reforms, and the Japanese successes in the war with Russia, coinciding with the advent of Liberals to power in Great Britain, greatly stimulated democratic movements in India. The Indian National Congress of 1907 issued the moderates' manifesto demanding the status enjoyed by Canada. An outburst of political crime resulted in a policy blended of repression and concession that was not understood by the natives and regarded as a sign of weakness. The permissive Indian Councils Extension Act of 1909 introduced the elective element into the provincial legislative councils, and one Indian was put upon the viceroy's executive council and others upon the councils of Bombay and Madras, while two were appointed to the council at the India office. The Indian immigration question then became important and led to embittered feeling. South Africa (1913) prohibited Indians from trading, farming, or even from holding land in the Orange Free State, while Canada refused to admit Indians. Indians felt that the rest of the British Empire was joining against them, while the Imperial government would neither help them nor put them upon an equality of status so as to fight their own battle. From this began the policy of passive resistance. India's participation in the fighting and auxiliary services during the Great War, and her consequent representation in the councils and conferences of the empire, increased her claim to a benevolent attention on the part of popular statesmen. Montagu in 1917 enunciated the four principles to guide British policy in India as (1) an increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration; (2) a gradual development of self-governmental institutions with a view to the progressive realization of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire; (3) an emphasis upon the gradual nature of these changes; (4) which must be determined by the government and not by the people of India, the responsibility for whose welfare and advancement rests with them. This Montagu-Chelmsford Report advocated a system of government for India known as Dyarchy. In a modified form it was enacted by the coalition government in 1919 after the united claim on the part of both Moslems and Hindus for complete self-government, much later that year. Under this system the legislatures of the eight important provinces were given large elective majorities, while the provincial executive was divided into two separate departments. The first consists of a governor and two officials who are responsible for the "reserved" departments of administration, law and order, justice, land, forests, and the collection of revenue. The second consists of the governor and ministers responsible to the legislature and charged with the "transferred" business of education, health, agriculture, excise, and local affairs. Both depend on the legislature for laws and supplies, but in cases of necessity the governor can override the popular house. The central government remains undivided in function, responsible to the secretary of state for India, and has complete control over army, railways, customs, and post office. There are two chambers, a legislature chiefly elected, and an executive of the viceroy and his executive council, themselves responsible to the British parliament. The departments are divided among the members of the council, the viceroy assuming those of foreign affairs and the political department, while home affairs by custom rests with the leader in the House of Assembly. The legislature consists of the governor-general, a council of state with an elected majority (in which provision is made for communal or sect representation), and a legislative assembly of 140, of which 26 are officials and at least 100 elected. Special interests are represented by nomination. Bills affecting the public debt, religion, defence, and foreign policy are reserved for the viceroy's sanction, while the viceroy can actually enact a bill vetoed by one chamber.

The present position is one of uncertainty. The absence of complete autonomy and the wide discretionary nature of the British executives' power are not compatible with popular demands. A deadlock in Bengal resulted in the assumption of government by the executive. If Indian co-operation succeeds, however, there is no doubt that wider powers will be given to the popular elements of government. A revision of the Government of India Act (1919) is due in 1929.

Indian Mutiny, THE (1857-8). The causes of the Indian Mutiny are difficult to estimate, but it may be safely asserted that it was to a large extent due to the very rapid progress which European civilization had of late years been making in Hindustan, a civilization which threatened to swallow or assimilate all the native institutions of the country. Under Lord Dalhousie (1848-56) the Punjab and Oudh had been annexed, and it might well seem to an Indian mind that the British were bent on entirely subduing the whole of Hindustan, regardless of the dictates of faith or justice. About the same time a rumour was in circulation which limited the term of British rule to one hundred years from the date of the battle of Plassey (1757). The sepoy troops had learnt to know their own worth, and having fought battles and won victories under British generalship, conceived that their success was solely due to their own valour, and fancied that they held the destiny of India in their own hands. Added to this, in the deposed King of Delhi, Bahadur Shah, there was an ever-festering canker of rebellion and centre of disaffection which was just now rendered more dangerous than ever by Lord Dalhousie's threat to remove the Mogul's family from its old seat at Delhi. Finally, to set in flame all the smouldering ashes of discontent, there came the story that the cartridges of the new Enfield rifles which were being introduced among the native troops were greased with the fat of beef or pork, and were thus rendered unclean for Mohammedan and Hindu alike. The rebellion broke out with incendiary fires at Barrakpur in January 1857. The sepoys here conceived that the new cartridges were being distributed with the sole object of destroying their caste, and on February 25 they broke into open mutiny. Though they were restrained from violence and disbanded, these men carried the evil report through Oudh and Bundelkhand, inflaming the minds of the people. On May 16 a proclamation was issued by Lord Canning, denying the reports and warning the people against them. On May 9 the mutiny broke out at Meerut, being preceded by incendiary fires. The 11th and 20th Regiments of Native Infantry and the 3rd Cavalry rose, massacred their officers, and marched off to Delhi. The people of that city rose at once and butchered the Europeans. Meanwhile Nana Sahib was proceeding through Oudh and the North-West Provinces fanning the flame. In Oudh the mistakes of Mr. Jackson had made the government unpopular, and Sir Henry Lawrence, the new commissioner, was unable to remove the impression. In May risings took place at Ferozepur, at Lahore, and Peshawar, but were put down with severity by Sir John Lawrence and his subordinates, who armed the Sikhs, and with their help reduced the sepoys. The Punjab thus remained faithful, and Lawrence was able to send a strong body of Sikhs to aid in the siege of Delhi. On the 17th the commander-in-chief prepared to advance on Delhi, and on June 10 Sir Henry Barnard, his successor, advanced to within four miles of the town. Meanwhile, all through Oudh, the Doab, and Bundelkhand the rebellion broke out accompanied by massacres. In Rajputana and Malwa the native princes for the most part remained faithful, but Sindhia's and Holkar's body-guards mutinied, and the widowed Rani of Jhansi headed an outbreak in her annexed principality. At Cawnpore the mutiny broke out under Nana Sahib on June 5 and ended in a ghastly massacre. At Lucknow the foresight of Sir Henry Lawrence enabled the British garrison to hold out against the rebels till relieved by Outram. But the great point of anxiety was Delhi, where all the mutinied sepoy regiments were assembling in a final effort to restore the ancient dynasty of the Moguls. On June 8 Sir Henry Barnard invested Delhi, and on June 13 an unsuccessful attempt was made to capture the city by blowing the gates open. On July 17 Archdale Wilson took the command; on September 6 a heavy siege-train arrived, and on the 20th, after a severe struggle, Delhi was won [DELHI, SIEGE OF, 1857]. Meanwhile Havelock had marched into Cawnpore (July 17), after defeating the Nana, but only to find the prisoners massacred as at Jhansi [CAWNPORE]. Leaving Neill to punish the rebels, he endeavoured to advance to the relief of Lucknow, but was compelled to retire, August 13. On September 16, however, a grand army marched on Lucknow (q.v.), and on the 25th Havelock and Outram entered the besieged Residency with their reinforcements. On September 10 Brigadier Greathed, by a forced march, surprised the mutinous troops from Rajputana and Agra and routed them. Similar successes were obtained in Malwa, Berar, and elsewhere, and these were crowned in November by the final relief of Lucknow, achieved by Sir Colin Campbell (November 1857), who had arrived in India as commander-in-chief in August. Meanwhile the Gwalior contingent, under Tantia Topi, had advanced on Cawnpore and driven General Windham into his entrenchments, and it was only by a hurried march that Campbell could come to his assistance before the bridge over the Ganges was broken down. By the end of the year 1857 the rebellion in Bengal had been to a great extent stamped out, and the future war was restricted to Oudh, Rohilkhand, parts of Bundelkhand, and Central India. In Dacca, Mhow, Indore, Ferruckabad, and elsewhere, order had been restored; Outram was holding his own against the garrison of Lucknow, and Saugor, faithful to the last, would serve as a centre for operations in Central India. At the beginning of 1858 Mohammed Bahadur Shah, the last of the Moguls, being convicted of treason and murder, was transported to Burma. During January and February Sir Colin Campbell occupied himself with clearing Oudh and Rohilkhand. In March he made for Lucknow, and after a severe struggle wrested the city from the enemy's hands (March 21). On May 6 Sir Colin Campbell succeeded in crushing the revolt in Rohilkhand, but the rebel leaders and many of their followers escaped. Meanwhile the Bombay division, under Sir Hugh Rose, had advanced steadily into Central India to the relief of Saugor, and soon defeated the rebels at the pass of Muddunpur. General Roberts and Whitlock were marching triumphantly through Malwa and Bundelkhand; on April 1 Sir H. Rose defeated Tantia Topi, who was advancing on Jhansi, and two days later he stormed and took the fort of Jhansi. On May 7 he attacked and routed the united armies of Tantia Topi and the Rani of Jhansi, and on May 23, after a severe struggle, he assaulted and captured the strong fort of Kalpy. Tantia Topi now proceeded to Gwalior and organized an insurrection against the authority of Sindhia; but on June 17 Sir Hugh encountered and defeated the rebel force outside Gwalior, and on the 18th stormed and captured the city. Brigadier Napier pursued the enemy, and routed them again at Alipur, thus ending the campaign. General Roberts had meanwhile stormed and taken Kotah, and the rebellion was now practically at an end, and the time come for vengeance and reconciliation.

It was undoubtedly the splendid organization of the Punjab under Sir John Lawrence that contributed mainly to the ultimate success of the British arms; and had this district shared in the revolt instead of, thanks to the firmness of its ruler, sending assistance to the British forces before Delhi, it is difficult to see where the disasters would have stopped. But Sir John Lawrence, from the very commencement, bridled the mutinous sepoys in the Punjab with a stern hand, and the Sikhs were too grateful for the blessings of British rule to rise against their benefactors. The most important political result of the Indian Mutiny was the transference of the entire administration of Hindustan from the East India Company to the Crown.

Indulgence, THE DECLARATION OF, (1) was issued by Charles II in 1672, probably at the instigation of Shaftesbury and Clifford. It represented the king's determination to mitigate the severity of the Clarendon Code (q.v.) by an exercise of his Dispensing Power (q.v.). It declared a suspension of "all and all manner of penal laws in ecclesiastical matters against whatsoever sort of nonconformists or recusants." On February 19, 1673, the declaration was violently denounced in the Commons, and the opposition which it roused was sufficient to induce the king to revoke it on March 7, on the advice of Colbert. The direct result was the Test Act (q.v.). The victory lay with parliament, whose successful resistance had vindicated the Established Church and dealt the royal suspending power a severe blow. (2) was issued by James II in 1687, declaring that "as he would not force the conscience of any man himself, so neither would he allow any man to force the conscience of another." By this he hoped to show favour to the Roman Catholics without offending his Protestant subjects, whom he promised to keep in full possession of all the Church estates they had acquired at the Reformation. In order to disguise, at all events in some degree, that the real objects of this indulgence were the papists, he promised full freedom of worship at the same time to moderate Presbyterians and Quakers. All the penal laws against the Roman Catholics were suspended, and the king declared himself resolved for the future to employ the best men in his service irrespective of their creed (February and June 1687). In April next year James ordered the declaration to be republished, and sent an order to the bishops that they should bid the clergy of their several dioceses read it from their pulpits after divine service, on the Sundays, May 20 and 27. It was their refusal to do this that led to the trial of the Seven Bishops (q.v.).

Indulph, King of Alban (954-62), was the son of Constantine and succeeded Malcolm, the son of Donald, in 954. It was in his reign that Dunedin or Edinburgh was surrendered to the Scots by the English—a surrender which marked the first extension of the kingdom of Alban south of the Forth. Indulph's reign is further noteworthy for the descent of the Norwegian pirates. He is said, according to one account, to have been slain in battle with the invaders, but, according to another, he died at St. Andrews. Probably he retired to a monastery, and entrusted his kingdom to Dubh the son of Malcolm, who was his lawful successor on the tanistic principle.

Ine, or INA, King of Wessex (688-726), was descended from Ceawlin through Cenred, and succeeded to the throne on the abdication of Ceadwalla. He was one of the greatest of the West Saxon kings, and succeeded in reducing Kent, Sussex, and Essex to obedience. He also fought many battles against the Britons or Welsh, and extended the West Saxon kingdom as far as the Exe, building the burh of Taunton to protect his new frontier. We find him fighting against the Welsh of Glamorgan, and against Ceolred the Mercian king, with whom he fought a drawn battle at Wodnesbeorg (715) (Woodborough?). The latter part of his reign, however, does not seem to have been so prosperous. His wars with the Britons were less successful than before, and he was troubled by rebellions of members of the royal house, the leader of whom was Aldbert, who was eventually defeated and slain by Ine. Ine himself resigned the crown in 726 and went to Rome, where he soon died. He was great, not only as a warrior, but as a legislator, and made a collection of laws, seventy-six in number, which, with the exception of those of the Kentish kings, are the earliest known to us among the Anglo-Saxons. He likewise divided Wessex into two dioceses, placing the new bishop at Sherborne in Dorset; he moreover founded and endowed several monasteries, and rebuilt and enlarged the abbey at Glastonbury.

Infangtheof was the right of trying and punishing a thief caught "hand-having or back-bearing" within the limit of the franchise to which the right belonged. It was one of the rights of jurisdiction most commonly granted in Anglo-Saxon times.

Ingoldsby, SIR RICHARD (d. 1685), was closely related to Oliver Cromwell, and served with considerable distinction in the Parliamentary army. He was one of the High Court of Justice appointed to try Charles I, but did not attend any of the sittings, and though his signature appears on the warrant for execution, he declared that he was forced to affix it by violence, his hand being guided by Cromwell. He afterwards took part in the campaign in Ireland; in 1652 he was made a member of the council of state; in 1654 and 1656 he sat in Cromwell's parliament, and was made one of the members of the Upper House in 1657. He was a great favourite of Richard Cromwell, after whose resignation he was appointed one of the Committee of Safety. He was active in promoting the Restoration, and was in command of the force sent against Lambert after he had escaped from the Tower. He received a pardon from Charles II, and was created a knight of the Bath in 1661. He sat in the four parliaments of Charles II, but took no very prominent part in public affairs.

Inkerman, THE BATTLE OF (November 5, 1854), was fought during the Crimean War. Early in the morning the Russian army, which had lately received large reinforcements, made a sortie from Sebastopol. The chief point of attack was the plateau of Inkerman, where the British forces lay, and so dense were the mists that the troops were hardly aware of the enemy's advance till he was close upon them. There was little time for any regular plan of operations on the British side, and they were at a strong disadvantage compared with the Russians, who had received definite instructions before starting. The result was that the engagement became more of a hand-to-hand encounter than a regular battle. At last the French general, Bosquet, who had divined from the first that the attack was destined for the British troops and not against his own, came to their aid, and fell upon the Russians with such fury as to drive them down the slope, and thus decide the battle.

Inquest. Recognition by sworn inquest, i.e., the discovery of matters of fact by inquiry from sworn witnesses, is a custom of very ancient standing in England, and was the origin of the modern jury. A process of inquiry by government officers from witnesses from the district concerned first appears clearly in the capitularies of the Frankish kings. To them it possibly came from the regulations of the Theodosian code, which prescribed a special method of investigation by imperial officers in matters touching the fisc. From cases in which the king was concerned, the method was occasionally extended in the Frankish empire, but only by special permission, to the suits of churches and private persons. This system was found working by the Norman conquerors of northern Gaul, and became a part of the Norman jurisprudence. But it was still exceptional in private suits, and persons who wished their own cases to be tried by inquest had to gain the duke's consent. From Normandy it was apparently introduced by the Conqueror into England. Some authorities have maintained that an analogous institution existed in Anglo-Saxon England, but the evidence is inconclusive. The Domesday survey is a gigantic example of the employment of the sworn inquest to draw up a rate-book of the kingdom for the use of the central administration; and several writs of Rufus, Henry I, and Stephen are extant, ordering inquests through men of the county or hundred, to determine the rights of churches. It is the merit of Henry II to have made what had been "an exceptional favour" an ordinary part of English legal procedure. By the Grand Assize he established the more equitable method of inquest in cases concerning the ownership of land, as an alternative to trial by battle, which was a Norman innovation, and justly hated in England. The three processes of darrein presentment, mort d'ancestor, and novel disseisin provided similar means of settling disputes as to advowsons, and the claims of heirs and dispossessed persons. The Assize of Clarendon (q.v.) saw the extension of the principle to the sphere of criminal justice, with the establishment of the jury of presentment. In the Assize of Arms (q.v.) recognition by jury was employed to determine the liability of each individual; and in the Ordinance of the Saladin Tithe (q.v.) inquest by sworn jurors was used for the assessment of taxation. [For later history see JURY.] In ordinary modern use the word is almost confined to the inquest held by a coroner with regard to an unexplained death. This is one of the few of the originally numerous duties attaching to the mediæval office of coroner which have survived to the present day. [CORONER.]

Inscriptions, CELTIC. are chiefly confined to a number of rough stone monuments, upon whose edges the inscriptions are cut in characters of a peculiar type, consisting entirely of long and short lines. This character is styled Ogam or Ogham. The largest number of these Ogam inscriptions have been found in Ireland—almost exclusively in Munster—but a few have also been found in South Wales, in North Wales, and in Devonshire and Cornwall. Others occur in Scotland, and especially in Fife, Aberdeenshire, and Sutherland, and some even in the Shetland Islands. Of these the Irish are very imperfectly deciphered, and the Scottish still more so, but most of the Welsh have been satisfactorily investigated. These are nearly all bi-lingual, and a Latin translation or paraphrase makes the work of interpretation the easier. For though Irish MSS. of the fourteenth century give a systematic account of the character, yet the ravages of time, and the imperfections of the system, make it no easy task to decipher them. It is even doubtful whether some of the Scottish Ogam are of Celtic origin. The date of these inscriptions can only be vaguely ascertained. Probably most of the Welsh are about the fifth and sixth centuries; but it seems most likely that the character was invented at a much earlier date, for it is hard to believe that so imperfect an alphabet would have been adopted when the Roman letters were known. It is, indeed, strange that Ogam should have survived until the ninth or tenth century. It has been conjectured that Ogam is in a way derived from the Phœnician alphabet. A late Irish legend attributes its invention to a mythic Ogma. Rhys regards the word as etymologically akin to ὄγμος and agmen, and as a derivative of a root which is used in the senses of "a leading, a line, a row, writing, letters, and ultimately literature, or knowledge."

The historical value of the Ogam inscriptions is entirely indirect. They are nearly all mere sepulchral inscriptions of the name, and perhaps the father's name, of some forgotten chieftain. But philologically their interest is very great. Careful comparison shows that the language of these inscriptions is of the Goidelic rather than of the Brythonic type—Irish rather than Welsh. They testify to the presence of Goidels in South Wales and Damnonia, spots from which nearly all traces of them have now vanished, either Irish immigrants, or the survivors of an earlier population driven westward by the Brythons, just as the Brythons themselves were at a later date driven westwards by the English. Thus they have thrown new light on the early ethnology of Britain as well as on the study of Celtic philology. Besides the Ogam, there are other Celtic inscriptions written in the ordinary Latin character, or in that modification of it to which the name of the "Irish alphabet" has been given. But the bulk of the inscriptions of the Britons, centuries after the withdrawal of the Roman legions, were written in Latin.

Rhys, "Welsh Philology"; Hübner, "Inscriptiones Britannicæ Christianæ"; Westwood, "Lapidarium Walliæ."

Inscriptions, ROMAN. Roman rule in Britain began late and ended early, and the area of full Romanization was limited to the narrow confines of the south-eastern plain. As a result the Roman inscriptions in Britain are comparatively few in number, and limited in the variety of their subjects, but their historical, if not their philological, importance is none the less considerable.

Epigraphists divide inscriptions into two main classes—inscriptions in the strictest sense written on other objects to indicate their purpose, and those which are themselves the objects, and inscribed on stone or hard metal to make them durable. The former class (tituli in Latin) are divided into sepulchral inscriptions (tituli sepulchrales); dedicatory inscriptions (tituli sacri); honorary inscriptions (tituli honorarii), or inscriptions on statues erected to mortals, either after death or during their life, but not on their tombs, in which class are included tituli operum publicorum, via publica, the records of the names of those erecting public buildings, the inscriptions on milestones, boundary stones; and lastly, the comprehensive class of inscriptions arranged in the Corpus under the head instrumentum, which includes, for example, inscriptions on weights and measures, household articles, the tesserae, or little tokens with names of individuals or dates upon them, the inscriptions stamped on blocks of metal, very numerous in a mining district like England, or on military weapons, and the leaden marks which, perhaps, were borne by soldiers as countersigns, and have been found in Britain only. Of the inscriptions made for their own sakes, which are called instrumenta or leges—treaties, laws, local decrees, agreements of private persons, may be quoted as examples.

Most of the foregoing classes of inscriptions have been found in Britain, though certain classes are rare. Few inscriptions of the first century remain. "They are as scarce," according to Hübner, "as those of the republican period in the older portions of the empire." They include an inscription to Nero, found at Chichester, and a few leaden balls, marked with the names of Claudius, Britannicus, Nero, etc. Milestones are extant of the time of Hadrian and the Antonines. A few military inscriptions complete the record. During the next century fairly abundant inscriptions are found in the south-eastern part of the island, and especially in the great towns, such as Camulodunum (Colchester); Londinium (London); Regni (Chichester); Aquæ-Sulis (Bath). Though Eboracum had become a great Roman station so early as the reign of Trajan, few inscriptions of earlier date than the latter part of the second century are found in the land of the Brigantes. Still farther north, zones of inscriptions mark the site of the two Roman walls. But north of this district, and among the hills of Wales, the almost total absence of real Roman inscriptions attests the incompleteness of the Roman conquest. In the latter country it is only in a few garrisons, such as Isca (Caerleon), or Deva (Chester), or Segontium (Carnarvon), that they are at all abundant, and here none are earlier than the end of the second century. Many third-century inscriptions, both in the north and west, indicate the frequency of the Roman expeditions to those regions. It is, however, remarkable that few inscriptions of the "provincial emperors," such as Carausius and Allectus, remain. Great names, such as Diocletian and Constantine, are but scantily represented. There are few important Christian inscriptions of the fourth or fifth century. The sepulchral inscriptions of Wales and Damnonia are not strictly Roman. The Greek inscriptions are very few. As to the historical value of the Roman inscriptions in Britain, it is hard to generalize. They vary little in their information; a victorious legion, the death of a commander, the performance of a vow, a tribute to the memory of a departed relative, are the subjects generally commemorated. Yet it has been possible to illustrate from them some characteristics of the provincial administration and military history of Britain, and from the frequency or infrequency of their occurrence to draw conclusions as to the nature of the Roman occupation in any given locality. In many ways the inscriptions illustrate or vivify the historical knowledge which written authorities give us. They throw light on the religion and the customs of Roman Britain, and furnish some important clues as to the extent to which the Latin language had penetrated among the various ranks of the Romano-Celtic population.

The value of their contribution to our knowledge of the Roman period is abundantly evident in the works of such modern scholars as the late F. J. Haverfield. [ROMANS IN BRITAIN.]

The Roman inscriptions in Britain are collected by Emil Hübner in the seventh volume of the Berlin "Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum." Hübner's epigraphical map of Britain at the end of the volume indicates the localities in which they have been found in most abundance. The same scholar's article on Roman Inscriptions in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" may be referred to for an account of these inscriptions generally. Some of the inscriptions of historical interest have been printed in the "Monumenta Historica Britannica." Much of the available material is, however, still scattered in periodicals or in the proceedings of learned societies; and in the form of monographs in the various sections of the "Victoria County History." "Institution of a Christian Man,"

THE, is the name of a work written by Cranmer and other bishops, after a series of consultations ending in July 1537, and merely stamped with the king's approval. (It has sometimes been said that Henry VIII himself was the author.) It consists of an Exposition of the Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Angel's Salutation to Mary, and of the doctrines of Free Will, Justification, and Good Works. It concludes with an authorized prayer for departed souls.

Instrument of Government, THE,

is the name given to a paper constitution of forty-two articles called "the Government of the Commonwealth," by which the Protectorate of Cromwell was established (December 1653). The executive power was vested in the protector and a council of thirteen to twenty-one persons appointed for life. Until the meeting of parliament fixed for September 3, 1654, the protector, with assent of the council, could make ordinances to have the power of laws. After this, the legislative power was vested in the parliament alone, and, though bills were to be submitted to the protector for his assent, he had no power to veto them if they were themselves in accordance with the constitution. Parliaments were to be called of necessity every three years, and when called could not be dissolved for five months, except by their own consent. The representative system was reformed, in accordance with the plan proposed by Ireton, and amended by the Rump. Scotland and Ireland were each represented by thirty members, while the number of members for England and Wales was reduced from five hundred to four hundred. The county representation was readjusted, many rotten boroughs were disfranchised, and important places like Leeds, Manchester, and Halifax received representatives. At the same time, two classes of electors were disfranchised:—(1) All Roman Catholics and those concerned in the Irish rebellion were disabled for ever; (2) all persons who had been engaged in war against the Parliament since January 1642, except such as had given signal testimony since then of their good affection, were disabled from electing or being elected for the next parliament and the three following. By Article xii it was expressly inserted in the writs that the persons elected should not have power to alter the government as vested by the Instrument in a single person and a parliament. Accordingly, when parliament, assembled in September 1654, wished to debate the constitution, and settle the limits of the protector's power, Cromwell, whilst drawing a distinction between "circumstantials," which they might alter, and "fundamentals," which they must leave untouched, forced them to sign an engagement not to propose the alteration of the government in that particular. Gardiner says of the Instrument of Government that it was "the first of hundreds of written constitutions which have since spread over the world, of which the American is the most conspicuous example, in which a barrier is set up against the entire predominance of any one set of official persons, by attributing strictly limited functions to each."

Insurrection Acts (IRELAND). The first (1787) enacted the Riot Act for Ireland, constituted felony (to be punished with death) all attacks on clergy or churches, the administering of unlawful oaths, seizure of arms, and other similar offences. It also inflicted a punishment of fine, imprisonment, or the whip on all who conspired to deprive the clergy of their tithes. In 1796 a similar act was passed, but with terms, if possible, still more stringent than the first; and though it excited the wonder of the English ministry, it passed without difficulty. The third (1807) gave the lord-lieutenant power, if the magistrates in special session declared a county disturbed, to proclaim it. By so doing, trial by jury was suspended, and anyone out at night after dark became liable to seven years' transportation, unless he were able to give a satisfactory explanation. The act of 1807 remained in force till 1810. In 1814, 1815, 1816, 1817, 1822, and 1824 it was renewed, and a similar act was passed in 1833.

"Intercursus Magnus," THE, or "Great Intercourse" (February 24, 1496), was a treaty signed between Henry VII and Burgundy, providing for freedom of trade between the two countries, laying down detailed rules to govern their commercial intercourse, and prohibiting each contracting party from harbouring the rebels of the other. One important result of the treaty was the expulsion of Perkin Warbeck from Burgundy.

"Intercursus Malus," THE (April 30, 1506), was a commercial treaty concluded between Henry VII and the Archduke Philip of Flanders. It established freedom of trade, but the preferential terms which the English merchants obtained by it rendered it an engagement distasteful to Flanders. Disputes soon began to recur, and the system of mutual boycott which the Intercursus had been designed to destroy was soon in operation again.

Interdicts, Papal, may be defined as local excommunications. They deprived a certain district of all the privileges of Christian worship and ceremonies. The proclamation of an interdict put the country out of the pale of the Church. During the time that a country lay under an interdict, all public religious services ceased; churches were closed, and the sacraments suspended. To this general rule there were a few exceptions. On Sunday a sermon might be preached in the churchyard, and on Good Friday the cross was exhibited to the people in the same place; the dead might be buried, but without the full rites of interment; infants might be baptized; and the dying were allowed to communicate. But, beyond this, all the services of the Church ceased; the bell neither rang nor tolled; the solemn processions of the Church were discontinued; neither Virgin nor saint could be worshipped at their own shrines. Monasteries, however, preserved the right of holding their own services; but these had to be performed with closed doors, and no strangers might be present. The most famous interdict in English history was that proclaimed by Innocent III in March 1208, over all England. It was brought about by John's obduracy in refusing to recognize the papal nominee, Stephen Langton, as Archbishop of Canterbury, and it was not remitted till the king had made full submission, in May 1213.

Interest. Two principles seem in the Middle Ages to have been at work in mitigating the extent to which the usurer might take advantage of the distresses of his debtors: first, that of the mediæval Church, which, inheriting the doctrine of the Jewish Scriptures, has unhesitatingly condemned usury in all its forms and maintained that men should lend freely; and, secondly, that of the Roman Empire, which, while recognizing the necessity of paying interest on borrowed moneys, attempted to limit abuse by fixing a legal maximum percentage, beyond which payment could not be enforced. Among the Romans the rate at one time was 12 per cent. per annum, but it was reduced by Justinian to 4. It could not be expected that among the Teutonic tribes this question should have formed part of their original common law, and hence in the Middle Ages usury was not so much regarded as an offence against the law as a sin; and it was one of the great merits of the mediæval Church that it set its face steadily against this abuse at a time when no king had the self-denial, and no other court sufficient strength, to protect the poor from the oppression of the rich. The objections were that money did not breed money (Aristotle's view) and that usury was forbidden by the Scriptures. Accordingly, usury became a recognized offence in the spiritual courts; and thus we find Alexander III writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury that he should compel all lenders, whether ecclesiastical or others, to restore their pledges without usury. But despite the censures of the Church and the laws of Edward III, according to which the goods of a living usurer belonged to the Church, those of a dead one to the king (1341), the practice never died out, though in many cases the actual interest was disguised under the name of expenses. Complaints were made by the Commons under Richard II of the prevalence of this offence, but the king could only reply that it was the fault of the ecclesiastical courts, who did not use their own powers. As yet there was no thought of the State's taking the question in hand. It was a question of morality, and not of law. Some hundred years later, when the incapacity of the Church to deal with this subject became clearer, parliament at last took the matter up. Even under Henry III the Statute of Merton (q.v.) had forbidden usury to be charged on infants for debts incurred by their parents, and we have just seen the enactment of Edward III as regards the goods of deceased usurers. But it was not till Henry VII's reign that the State, following the old Roman principle and recognizing the legality of interest, fixed a rate, above which all charges should be unlawful. In 1487, at the instigation of Archbishop Morton, a law was passed directly aimed against the "dampnable bargayns groundyt in usurye, contrarie to the laws of naturell justis," and empowering the lord chancellor and justices of the peace to inflict a penalty of £100 on all transactions that savoured of this kind (3 Hen. VII, c. 6). Eight years later it was enacted that if the lender received back more than he had lent, he should forfeit half (11 Hen. VII, c. 8). The tendency of these laws is, as may at once be perceived, to restrict rather than to encourage usury. Under Henry VIII all former acts on the subject were repealed in 1545, and it was enacted that after January 31 next no more than 10 per cent. should be charged, on pain of the lender's losing threefold the debt and suffering imprisonment (37 Hen. VIII, c. 9). This was a clear breach with canon law, which recognized no quantitative distinction between interest and usury. Its effect, whatever was intended, can only have been to stop all loans at less than 10 per cent., and that it had this result is evident by the enactment of Northumberland in 1551-2, which pronounced all usury to be unlawful, declared that the former law had not been intended for the maintenance of usury, and lamented that, since its passing, usury had been daily used and practised in the realm. Under Elizabeth this act was repealed, "because it hath not done as much good as it was hoped it should." The maximum rate of 10 per cent. was reintroduced (1571). Usury, perhaps, in its simplest form, had decreased, but the old evil had only taken new forms, and had "by shifts increased and abounded to the utter undoing of many gentlemen, marchauntes, and others." The old law had erred by making no distinction in the kind of offences, and punishing all alike. Accordingly Henry VIII's act of 1545 was revived for five years. It seems, from the wording of the new statute, that men were still nominally liable to prosecution in the spiritual courts for taking any interest whatever (13 Eliz., c. 8). Under James I (1621) it was enacted that, because of the general fall in the value of land and prices of merchandise, only 8 per cent. should be allowed from June 24, 1625. This enactment was to last seven years, and the penalty of its infringement was to be treble the amount lent. Here again we see the double feeling at work—the conflicting sentiments of the injustice of all usury, and the expediency of allowing it under restrictions; for a clause was added to this bill declaring that its terms were not to be so expounded as to allow the practice of usury in point of religion or conscience. But there is no longer any mention of ecclesiastical courts; though, on the other hand, the expenses of scribes who might negotiate a loan are jealously defined. On the Restoration, it was enacted that as previous experience had justified the lessening of the legal rate of interest from 10 to 8 per cent., it would be expedient to reduce it to a nearer level with that of the nations with whom we chiefly traded, and from henceforth it was to run at 6 per cent. Under Queen Anne, on the conclusion of the War of the Spanish Succession, it was still further reduced to 5 per cent., on the plea of its being good for trade and to the interest of the landowners, on whom the expenses of the war had mainly fallen. Another reason assigned for this reduction was that the great interest which could be secured for money invested at home had rendered people unwilling to embark in foreign trade. This remained the legal rate of interest till the reign of Queen Victoria, when all the previous laws for its regulation (they are listed in the schedule to 17 and 18 Vict., c. 90) were swept away in the year 1854.

Interregnum is a term commonly applied to (i) the interval which elapsed between the execution of Charles I (January 30, 1649) and the restoration of Charles II (May 8, 1660), during which England was governed as a republic. It embraces, therefore, both the government of the Commonwealth and the Protectorate of Cromwell and his son Richard. [COMMONWEALTH; CROMWELL.]

(ii) A second interregnum of great constitutional importance occurred between the "abdication" of James II, which was held to have taken place on December 23, 1688, the day on which he dropped the great seal into the Thames, and the offer of the crown to William and Mary on February 15, 1689. [REVOLUTION; WILLIAM III.]

Inverkeithing, THE BATTLE OF (1317), was fought in Fifeshire, between the Scots, under the Earl of Fife, and the English. Fife was at first driven back, but his men, being rallied by William Sinclair, Bishop of Dunkeld, at last drove the English back to their ships.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Inverlochy, THE BATTLE OF (February 2, 1645), resulted in the victory of Montrose and the Royalists over the Covenanters led by Argyll. Inverlochy is near Fort William, in the south of Inverness.

Inverness was most probably at one time the capital of the Pictish kingdom. It was granted a charter by William the Lion, and sacked in 1429 by Alexander of Harlaw, Lord of the Isles. In later days it possessed a strong castle, erected by the Earl of Huntly (c. 1460). In 1562 this castle was taken by the Regent Moray from the insurgent followers of the Earl of Huntly, and nearly a century later was garrisoned by Cromwell (1651). In 1689 it was pillaged by Claverhouse, and in 1746 was taken by the Jacobites, but recovered by the Duke of Cumberland after the battle of Culloden.

Inverury, THE BATTLE OF (May 22, 1308), was fought on the Don, in Aberdeenshire, and resulted in a complete victory for Robert Bruce over his enemy, the Earl of Buchan, and the English commanded by Mowbray.

Iona (or HIR), an island situated to the west of Mull, is famous as the place where St. Columba (q.v.) landed (May 12, 563) on his departure from Ireland, and as the spot he selected for his monastery. For 150 years Iona, the cradle of the Scottish Church and of Scottish letters, was the centre of the national Church of the Dalriad Scots. From it all Pictland was evangelized and Christianity was established in Northumbria and Middle England. In 716, owing to the zeal of Adamnan, its abbot and the other members of the monastery conformed to the Roman views both as regards the date of Easter and the shape of the tonsure. There appears, however, to have been another party which still adhered to the old way. From 795 onwards Iona was repeatedly ravaged by the Danes; in 818 the monastery, already once restored by Adamnan, was rebuilt by the abbot Diarmid, who deposited therein the shrine of Columba, which had been removed to Kells by Abbot Cellach. The monastery was again rebuilt in the eleventh century by St. Margaret, but its importance was now rapidly declining. In 908 St. Andrews was formally recognized as the primatial see of Scotland, and from this recognition dates the disappearance of Iona's insular primacy. In 1203 a new monastery and a nunnery were founded by Benedictine monks, by whom the Celtic community was either expelled or absorbed.

Ionian Islands, THE, are situated in the Mediterranean, off the west coast of Greece. They are seven in number—Corfu, Cephalonia, Zante, Cerigo, Santa Maura, Paxos, and Ithaca. In 1797 they were taken from the Venetians by the French, and confirmed in French possession later in the year by the Treaty of Campo Formio. In 1800 they were erected into an independent "Septinsular Republic" under the joint protection of Turkey and Russia. By the Treaty of Tilsit (July 1807) they once more became French. Four of the islands, however, were captured by British arms between 1809 and 1814, and in 1814 the seven were placed under British protection and administered by British high commissioners until 1864, when they were incorporated in the kingdom of Greece. The chief British lords high commissioners were Sir Thomas Maitland (1814-23), Sir Frederick Adam (1823-32), Lord Nugent (1832-5), Sir Howard Douglas (1835-41), C. A. Mackenzie (1841-3), Lord Seaton (1843-9), W. E. Gladstone (1859), and Sir Henry Storks (1859-64).

Iraq is a mandated kingdom in Asia Minor formed by the former Turkish districts of Baghdad, Basrah, and Mosul. The mandatory power is the British Empire. British troops entered the country in November 1914 on the outbreak of war with Turkey, and the long Mesopotamian campaign, beginning with the occupation of Basrah (November 22, 1914), culminated in the fall of Baghdad in July 1917, after the defence and surrender of Kut (q.v.—April 1916). The Anglo-Iraqi treaty of 1922 was ratified in December 1925, and the mandate extended to twenty years. In 1926 the vexed question of the Mosul frontier between Iraq and Turkey was definitively settled, the Mosul district being incorporated in Iraq.

Ireland. The early history of Ireland is wrapped in an obscurity which the researches of scholars into the evidence afforded by archaeology, inscriptions, and etymology are only beginning to dispel. Valuable contributions to the study of the subject have been made of recent years by Professor Macalister in his "Ireland in Pre-Celtic Times"; Sir John Rhys in his "Studies in Early Irish History"; and by Professor Eoin MacNeill in his "Phases of Irish History" and "Celtic Ireland."

Legend tells of five successive immigrations from the East, of incessant wars between the invaders, and of the final triumph of the Milesians (Celts or Gaels) who arrived in Ireland about 350 B.C. Niall of the Nine Hostages (A.D. 379-405) is the first real historical personage that we meet with in early Irish history. He established a kingship over all Ireland, and from him sprang the Ui Neill of Ulster and Meath, who held the high-kingship for several hundreds of years. The two most important events which took place in Ireland before the coming of the Normans were the conversion of pagan Ireland to Christianity by St. Patrick and the invasion of the Northmen. St. Patrick is said to have begun his labours in the year 432. He won over the tribal kings, founded religious communities, notably at Armagh, and organized a Church. The greatness of his work consists in the fact that he brought Ireland into touch with Latin civilization and so paved the way for the ecclesiastical cultural movement which earned for her later the description of the "Island of Saints and Scholars" (see "Life" by Professor Bury and "Cambridge Mediæval History," ii. 502-8). From the middle of the third century to the close of the fifth, both the northern and southern Irish planted colonies in Britain. The former settled in North Wales, Man, and Scotland; the latter in South Wales, Devon, and Cornwall. About the middle of the sixth century the migratory spirit revived in a new form. The Irish monks carried their missions to various parts of Europe. Monasteries were founded at Bobbio and St. Gall, St. Columba helped to christianize northern England and Scotland. At home, the Irish schools were visited by foreign students, who, while the rest of Europe was being overrun by the barbarians, fled to Ireland as an asylum, bringing their art and literature with them.

The remarkable Irish cultural movement which resulted from this contact with foreign influences received a serious set-back as the result of the Danish invasions. The Norwegians first pillaged the Irish coast in the year 795. They were succeeded by the Danes (852), who at first raided the country and then effected permanent settlements at the chief seaports. The end of the tenth century brought a change. The invaders under their king, Ivar, occupied Limerick and conquered part of Munster. In the struggle that followed a native ruler appeared, who for a time seemed destined to unite his countrymen into a nation. Brian Boruma, of the Munster tribe of the Dalcassians, routed the Danes near Tipperary in 968. Six years later he succeeded his brother Mahon on the throne of Munster. In 989 he made war on Malachy II, the titular over-king of the Ui Neill dynasty. After thirteen years of fighting and negotiation, Malachy submitted. The victory of Glen Mama had quelled a desperate revolt of Leinster and the Dublin Danes. Brian was at last supreme. For twelve years (1002-14) he ruled Ireland strongly and well. Then the Dublin Danes again rebelled. They sought and found allies amongst all the Scandinavians of the west. The battle of Clontarf was the last desperate conflict of the pagan Northmen with the Christian Irish. It was fought on the banks of the Tolka, near Dublin, on Good Friday, 1014. The enemy was driven into the sea, but the old king was slain by the "apostate deacon" Brodir as he prayed for his people. The Danes were not absolutely banished from Ireland as the result of this battle, but they failed in their main object, which was to establish a kingdom. They performed a permanent service for the country, however, in originating the commercial life of the towns. (See Eleanor Hull's "History of Ireland," chaps. 3 and 4.) Brian's death was a great misfortune for Ireland. He had destroyed the traditional supremacy of the Ui Neill; his own house was unable to make good their claims. Long and ruinous wars between the O'Neills, the O'Briens, and the O'Conors of Connacht continued to the Norman invasion.

Over a hundred small kingdoms of some sort existed in early Ireland whose boundaries loosely corresponded to those of the modern baronies. Some of the old Irish kingdoms (tuatha) were free, i.e., they gave no tribute nor owned any allegiance to an overlord, others were subject to the conquering over-king of the district. In the seventh and eighth centuries the various classes of kings were formally classified in writing. There was the king of Ireland, the king of a Fifth (the Four Great Fifths were the provinces into which ancient Ireland was divided), and the king of a great tuath which had lesser kingdoms under it. The king, who was elected, had to be of the royal kindred or fine; all his duties were carefully defined in the written law tracts. He had to consult the airecht or assembly of nobles, and also the ænach, the periodic gathering of the body of freemen to whom he owed his election. The chief, who lived in a dwelling fortified by stockades and earthworks, had some of the tribe lands set apart for his own use, and exacted tributes in cattle and services from his people. He also lent out cattle on hire. The order of old Irish society was intensely aristocratic. The noble class or nemith were naturally the most privileged. The flaiths were the landowning nobles, then in order of importance came the freemen (féni) holding property of various kinds, and finally the findirs. These last were of the ancient stock of the country and had sunk to the position of serfs. The social position of craftsmen, bards, etc., was carefully defined. Each had his "honour-price" which carried with it a definite penalty or compensation in case of crime or offence. The Brehons were the hereditary lawyers and judges. They interpreted the tribal customs to the people. Each tuath was a complete community with a king (ri), nobles, freemen, law courts, armies, assemblies, and fairs. In her "History of the Old Irish State to 1014" Mrs. J. R. Green deals shortly with the old Irish political arrangements, embodying the results of recent research. The subject is one of considerable complexity, and students must await a further study of the Brehon laws for full elucidations of particular points.

Life in ancient Ireland was naturally rural, there being no cities or towns before the coming of the Northmen. There were large forest areas which abounded in game, deer, boar, and wolves. Oats were the chief crop, but wheat, barley, and rye were sown. The chief wealth of the country consisted in its cattle, by the value of which all else was measured. The food of the Irish was very simple, consisting mainly of cheese, milk, oatmeal cake, and butter. Houses were built of wattles or hewn timber. Dress consisted of a loose woollen shirt covered by a tight tunic. A shawl fastened by a brooch hung from the left shoulder. The chief exports were hides and frieze, which were largely exchanged for English slaves at Bristol and for French wines at Poitiers. The native artists excelled in copying and illuminating books and in working the precious metals. Many beautiful specimens of early Irish work may be seen in the Dublin museums and elsewhere. Giraldus Cambrensis, the historian of the Norman Conquest, who had hardly a good word to say of the Irish people, praised their love of music and skill in harp-playing. There must have been variations in social customs at different periods of Irish history, but the chief features were much the same at the end of the sixteenth century as they had been at the time of the Norman Conquest. Two of the most striking customs which persisted into Elizabeth's reign were those of tanistry and fosterage. The tánaiste was the successor appointed to the chieftainship during the lifetime of the reigning chief, who had thus no more than a life interest in his land. Fosterage was the practice of sending children to be educated with the family of another member of the clan. The English lawyers and administrators approved of neither. Tanistry conflicted with feudal ideas of landholding; while fosterage was a dangerous method of promoting tribal alliances.

In the year 1169 Robert Fitz-Stephen and Maurice Fitz-Gerald landed in Wexford, as nominal allies of Dermot McMorrogh, a deposed king of Leinster. The more famous "Strongbow," Richard de Clare, followed the next year. The conquests they made were so easy and so rapid that Henry II feared they would establish an independent Norman state across the Channel. To prevent the danger, he came himself to Ireland in 1171. Many native chiefs acknowledged his supremacy; many did him feudal homage in ignorance of the obligations they incurred. The conflict thus introduced between the Brehon law of the tribes and the feudal law of the English is the true explanation of the subsequent relations of the two races. Henry acted under colour of a bull of the English pope, Adrian IV. He was at first well received by the churchmen. The brutality of John (1185) estranged both clerks and laymen.

The Norman power spread without consolidating. The Crown discouraged the growth of strong principalities, and without strength order was impossible. The Irish could isolate the scattered settlements at pleasure, by seizing the passes through the woods and the hills. The foreigners fought amongst themselves, and called in Irish aid. They were compelled to serve their king in his wars with France and Scotland. Estates passed by marriage into the hands of English absentees. They were ill guarded, and retaken by the tribes. The barons themselves in the wild districts bowed before the Celtic revival. They abandoned their feudal pretensions, and acted as native chiefs. (The best account of the Norman Conquest and settlement of Ireland has been given by Mr. Goddard Orpen in his "Ireland Under the Normans," 4 vols.)

By the beginning of the fourteenth century the English power had sunk to a low ebb. It was ruined by the Scottish invasion of Edward Bruce. For two years he wasted Ireland. At length, "after eighteen successive victories," he was defeated and slain by the viceroy near Faughart (1318). But he had exterminated the English yeomen, the sinews of the settlement. In 1333 William and Edward de Burgo, the heads of a great Norman house, the sons of an English viceroy, deliberately renounced their allegiance, divided the lordship of Connacht between them in defiance of the English rule of succession, and adopted the Irish "language, apparel, and laws." Their example was followed by many. Large territories in Ulster and Leinster were reoccupied by the O'Neills and the McMorroghs. The flight of the English population was vainly forbidden by law. In 1367 the Statute of Kilkenny (40 Edward III) recorded the conscious impotence of its authors. They had ceased to dream of conquests. Their ambition was to preserve the shrunken remnant of their dominions from the insidious encroachments of the Celt. The natives were rapidly assimilating the colonists to themselves. The statute attempted by savage penalties to isolate the English from the contagion, and to put a stop to the adoption of the native dress, language, and customs. In 1374 the great constitutional question, which, four centuries later, cost England an empire, arose in the Irish parliament. The viceroy tried to force the colonists to send representatives to England, with power to assent to taxation on their behalf. He was firmly and successfully opposed. A few years later the Kavanaghs and the O'Briens levied blackmail on Dublin Castle.

King Richard II was at last provoked to vindicate the power of the Crown. He crossed the sea with a great army, but the Irish "mocked him with their light submission," so that "he enlarged not the English borders the breadth of one acre of land" (1395). Four years later he returned. A march through the Kavanaghs' country reduced his forces to a rabble. He fled from Dublin to meet Henry of Lancaster.

For a century the colony continued to dwindle. Parts of four shires formed the English dominion, and these were full of native Irish. (The only complete history dealing with this period is Professor Curtis's "Mediaeval Ireland, 1110-1513.")

The Wars of the Roses were disastrous to the settlers. They were Yorkists to a man. They formally acknowledged Duke Richard as their viceroy, in defiance of the English attainer. They solemnly asserted the independence of their parliament. They followed the pretender Simnel into England. They were decimated at Sandel Castle and at Stoke. To Henry VII the Anglo-Irish were more dangerous than the Celts. The only important Irish measure of his reign was that which made the colonial parliament completely subject to the council, and extended all existing English statutes to the colony (Poynings' Act, 10 Henry VII, c. 4). For the first fifty years of the Tudor rule the Leinster Geraldines were the true lords of the settlement. Their rebellion in 1534 brought a new force into Ireland. All over Europe the old feudal monarchies had been succeeded by despots, who embodied the national forces and the national will. Henry VIII was the first king of England who could strike with the whole force of the State. He resolved to let the Anglo-Irish feel the blow. A disciplined force and a train of artillery reduced the Geraldine castles. The king was master of the island. He desired to rule his new kingdom well. But the greed of his servants, and his unhappy determination to thrust English manners upon the Celts, inevitably led to resistance and repression. The secularization of the Church lands was not unpopular. Many abbeyes were granted to the chiefs "as the means to make them rather glad to suppress them." The doctrinal changes on the other hand provoked a bitter opposition. No open outbreak occurred, but on the accession of Mary the old order was triumphantly restored. [CHURCH OF IRELAND.]

The garrison of English landholders, the bulwark of Protestantism in Ireland, was by a curious irony introduced in the name of Philip II of Spain. King's and Queen's Counties were "planted" by statute in 1556. The third chapter of the same act authorized the chancellor to dispatch commissioners throughout the island "to set out shires and counties," that is, to substitute English for Irish law without regard for vested rights. The disputed succession to the earldom of Tyrone brought matters to a crisis under Elizabeth. Shane O'Neill was the tánaiste of his tribe; the bastard of Dungannon claimed by an English patent. A war followed, disgraceful even amongst English wars in Ireland. Shane visited the queen. He was detained, in breach of his safe-conduct, until he accepted terms he could not keep. On his return home, "my lord treasurer's man" tried to poison him. In 1566 the war was renewed. The new lord deputy Sidney fought O'Neill by the hands of his native rivals. The O'Donnells defeated him near Lifford; the Scots of Antrim murdered him. His death was followed by an act of 1569 making all Ireland shire-land, and thereby depriving many chiefs of benefits expressly secured to them by indenture with the Crown. Ten years later the Desmond rebellion (1579) was quelled by a war of extermination. The plantation system was definitely adopted. The policy of the government was not to subdue, but to destroy. Women and infants were regularly murdered. A well-planned famine removed the fugitives who escaped the sword. Munster was a desert, fit at last for the civilization of the Raleghs and the Spensers. Half a million of acres were bestowed on English adventurers, on condition that they should plant their vast estates with English farmers. The condition was never fulfilled. The starving Celts crept from the woods and glens to outbid the strangers. But one province did not satisfy the English. Hugh O'Neill, the English Earl of Tyrone, the son of the bastard of Dungannon, was reluctantly driven into war. Bred at the English court, and conscious of the English power, he tried to combine the impossible parts of an Irish chief and an English noble. His tribe accepted him as their leader in 1593. The next year he was summoned before the council, and, to the queen's great indignation, suffered to return. His course could be no longer doubtful. He contrived to unite all the Ulster tribes beneath his banner, and he sought for aid from Spain. In 1598 he routed Bagnall at the Yellow Ford, and roused Munster. For three years he harassed without engaging the enemy. At length, in September 1601, a strong Spanish force landed at Kinsale. If Hugh could join them, his triumph was secure. They were blockaded by veteran troops. Hugh was betrayed and beaten (December). In the following March he made peace on almost the same terms he had himself proposed in 1587. But although O'Neill had held his own in the field, he could not resist the "war of chicane," which at once began against him. He and his ally, O'Donnell of Tyrconnel, the representatives of the old royal house of the Uí Neill, were forced to fly. Their lands were confiscated and "planted," and the tribesmen treated as tenants-at-will under the Crown. This flagrant injustice led directly to the outbreak of 1641. The "subtle ravage" of the lawyers, and the growing Protestantism of the government, which now, for the first time, had a large Protestant population at its back, gradually forced even the old Anglo-Irish Catholics into a close union with the Celts. Strafford claimed all the estates of Connacht for the Crown, on the plea that the Chancery officers had neglected to enrol the patents of the owners. The Irish gentlemen offered £120,000 for quieting their titles. The offer was accepted, the money was paid, and then the viceroy announced that he would not observe the conditions.

Meanwhile the religious tension was increasing. A Catholic revival had spread over Europe. In England the Puritans were rising into power. On October 22, 1641, a rising occurred in Ulster. In December the English Commons resolved to extirpate popery in Ireland. Then the rebellion spread. The lords justices were careful not to limit it; the wider the rebellion, it was said at the time, the wider would be the forfeitures at their disposal.* The struggle was very horrible. The colonists were everywhere expelled, and often murdered. The Irish chiefs did what they could to humanize the war; the English leaders encouraged the ferocity of their men. The divisions of the Irish Royalists gave Cromwell an easy victory. The act of devastation was perfected by the Saints. Nearly half the population perished in eleven years. When the war was over, many hundreds of boys and of marriageable girls were sold into slavery. Thirty or forty thousand men enlisted in foreign service. Three provinces were confiscated, and parcelled out amongst the soldiers and the creditors of the Parliament. By the peace of 1648, Charles I promised to restore the Irish Catholics to their estates. In 1650 Charles II confirmed the engagements of his father. He changed his mind when he was king. He "considered the settlement of Ireland as an affair rather of policy than justice," and "thought it most for the good of the kingdom, advantage of the Crown, and security of his government, that the loss should fall on the Irish." By the Acts of Settlement and Explanation he confirmed to the Cromwellians the estates of his father's last supporters. Before the rebellion two-thirds of the fertile soil belonged to the Catholics. Under the Act of Settlement two-thirds remained to the Protestants. The War of the Revolution gave the final blow to the old race. They saw in it a chance of undoing the wrongs of the last thirty years. Their ablest leaders, backed by D'Avaux and Louvois, desired to establish Ireland as a separate kingdom, under French protection. The king landed in March 1689. The parliament met in May. Poyning's Act and the Acts of Settlement and Explanation were repealed. The Cromwellians and their heirs were dispossessed, as wrongful possessors, but bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration were to be reprimed. To provide for these reprisals, the estates of the English colonists who supported the Prince of Orange were confiscated. A wholesale Act of Attainder was passed to increase the forfeitures. But the war went against King James. He had neither money nor arms. His troops were ill-disciplined, and his counsels divided. The relief of Derry and the battle of Newtown Butler (q.v.), in 1689, were followed up by the passage of the Boyne, in 1690, and the decisive defeat of Aghrim, in 1691 (q.v.). The capitulation of Limerick was signed, after an heroic defence, on October 3. The flower of the Irish soldiers followed their king into France, to "find their graves in strange places and unhereditary churches." Parliament refused to ratify the Treaty of Limerick (q.v.); fresh confiscations were made; and the national faith was proscribed.

A great development of material prosperity might, perhaps, have reconciled the Irish to the conquest. The English and the Irish parliaments vied in legislation which made prosperity impossible. Trade was crushed by the commercial jealousy of the one; society was sapped by the bigotry of the other. Ireland was already excluded from the Navigation Acts. Acts of 1665 and 1680 had prohibited the importation of Irish cattle and provisions into England. The colonial trade was ruined in 1696; the wool trade with England in 1698; the wool trade with the continent in 1699. Catholics were forbidden by Irish acts to purchase lands, to lend on real securities, to take long or beneficial leases. The Gavelling Act (1703) broke up existing estates. Catholic minors were placed under Protestant guardians. The Courts of Equity assigned a liberal provision to apostate wives and children. The English grantees of confiscated estates were necessarily absentees. They leased vast tracts to Irish Protestants on beneficial terms. The lessee sub-let, sometimes four or five deep. The misery of the cottier was extreme. He paid a rack-rent; he supported his priest; he was tithed by the parson. The steady growth of pasture drove him to the mountain and the bog. Famine and disease were chronic. A vast emigration set in. Before the trade laws and the Test Act, the Presbyterian artisans and yeomen fled to Germany and America. The Catholics served under every European flag save one. At home they were a rabble. "The tendons of society were cut." When the masses came to power they had none to lead. The penal code was so repugnant to human nature, the commercial code was so opposed to the common interest, that their regular execution was impossible. Priests, "whom the laws did not presume to exist," publicly discharged the duties of their office; smuggling became a national industry. The whole population was educated into contempt for the law. They came soon to have a law of their own, enforced by the Houghers (q.v.) and the Whiteboys (1761) (q.v.) with merciless severity. The government was a corrupt oligarchy. The hereditary revenue, which included two-thirds of the taxation, made the Crown independent. The judicial interpretation of Poyning's Act and the Declaratory Act of 1719 ensured the subservience of the parliament. All bills were submitted

* Whether the terrible charge of Carte, Leland, Lord Castlehaven, and Nalson be well founded it is, perhaps, impossible to determine. But it is certain that the measures of the lords justices were eminently adapted to spread the rebellion. It is certain, too, that from the first they looked forward to confiscations. When the seven lords of the Pale revolted, they hastened to point out how "those great counties of Leinster, Ulster, and the Pale" lay now "more open to his Majesty's free disposal, and to a general settlement of peace and religion by introducing of English."

were to the Irish, then to the English privy council. They were suppressed or altered at the pleasure of either. If approved by the two councils, parliament might pass or reject, but could not amend them. The Upper House was largely controlled by the English courtiers who sat upon the right reverend bench. An English act of 1691 excluded Catholics; an English test clause of 1704 excluded Dissenters from the legislature. The Catholics lost the franchise. Protestants exercised it once in a lifetime. The parliament of George II sat for thirty-three years. Two-thirds of the members were returned by boroughs, and the boroughs were in the hands of "Undertakers" (q.v.) and patrons. The Houses met once in two years. The judges were removable at pleasure. The greatest offices were habitually bestowed on English non-residents. A spirit of resistance slowly grew amongst the colonists. The House of Lords vainly protested against the deprivation of its appellate jurisdiction in the Annesley case (1719—q.v.). Three years later the country rose against "Wood's halfpence" (q.v.), and drove Walpole to submission. The struggle "had a most unhappy influence on the state of the nation, by bringing on intimacies between papists and Jacobites, and the Whigs, who before had no correspondence with them." In 1749 the Crown worsted the Houses over an Appropriation Bill. In the next two sessions the contest was renewed, and the government outvoted. The opposition grew, the pension list swelled, the price of the boroughs advanced. Between 1750 and 1754 seats trebled in value. The influence of the middle classes was first felt at the dissolution on the demise of the Crown. Their objects were to control their representatives by an Octennial Act, and to correct the scandals of the pension list. The Peace of Paris added India and Canada to the empire. An increase of the standing army was essential to their safety. Ministers did not dare to make the proposal in England. By the concession of an Octennial Act (February 1768) they secured an increase of 3,000 men to the Irish establishment. The overthrow of the "Undertakers" followed. Lord Townshend and Lord Harcourt attempted by lavish bribes to create a party of "king's friends," dependent only on the Crown. Between 1757 and 1777 the civil list had nearly doubled, the pension list had nearly doubled, and a million had been added to the debt. The American War brought a crisis. In 1778 the impending bankruptcy of Ireland forced Lord North to relax the commercial code in defiance of the English middle classes. The government was too poor to replace the garrisons withdrawn for the colonial war. The country was defenceless, and invasion seemed imminent. The whole Protestant population armed. In December 1778 the Volunteers numbered 8,000; in June 1779, 42,000; in 1781, it is said, as many as 80,000 men. They were for the most part Protestants; they were officered by the Protestant gentry, and they were thoroughly loyal to the English connexion. But they resolved to free their country from the commercial tyranny of England. They began to discuss political questions and to concert their action. In December 1781 came the news of Saratoga and of York Town. In the following February the delegates of 143 Ulster corps met at Dungannon. They asserted the independence of the kingdom, and the right to free trade. They demanded that the judges should be made independent, and the Mutiny Act limited to a single session. They condemned the penal laws, and appointed a committee to communicate with other corps. Their example was everywhere followed. Grattan pressed the demand for independence in the Commons. In April the House addressed the Crown. It adopted in full the constitutional theories of Dungannon. They were accepted in May by the parliament of England. Fox, it has been said, "met Ireland on her own terms, and gave her everything she wanted in the way she herself seemed to wish for it."

But independence was not the sole legislative achievement of the Volunteers. Between 1778 and 1782 many wholesome measures were passed. Almost all the commercial restraints were removed. A Habeas Corpus Act and a limited Mutiny Act became law. The judges were made immovable. The Test Act was repealed. Bills for the relief of the Catholics were carried in 1778, 1782, and 1792. In 1793 the Catholics were enfranchised.

Two grievances remained—the corruption of parliament, and the exclusion of Catholics from its walls. Upon both points the patriots were divided. Charlemont and Flood feared to extend the political power of the Catholics. Grattan was their earnest advocate. All agreed upon the necessity of reform, but Flood alone was ready to overawe the Houses into honesty. The Volunteer convention showed a growing appetite for politics. Charlemont and Grattan were entirely opposed to legislation by menace. Flood's Reform Bill was rejected by a great majority, and the convention was immediately dissolved. For fifteen years Pitt debauched the Irish parliament. Reform or emancipation would alike have been fatal to the union which he presently began to design. It was to redress these evils that the club of United Irishmen was formed by Hamilton Rowan. The persistent opposition of the government, however, drove its members to disloyalty. Sympathy with the French revolution grew active in the north. In 1793 the Convention Act became law. At last, in 1794, Pitt seemed to waver. Lord Fitzwilliam, a known friend of the Catholics, was named viceroy; and the expectations of the Catholics were raised to the highest pitch. Suddenly the viceroy was recalled. The miserable rebellion of 1798 followed. A brief and horrible agrarian rising was suppressed, and punished with the cruelty that comes of fear. The English minister saw his opportunity, and bought the parliament he had degraded so ably and so long. The union with England was accomplished by the act 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 67, July 2, 1800, and the Irish parliament ceased to exist a month later. For many years the country was profoundly disturbed. Robert Emmet (q.v.) was hanged in 1803 for plotting a second rebellion. Orange outrages prevailed in the north, and Daniel O'Connell (q.v.) was beginning to marshal the Catholic democracy. He determined from the first to win emancipation without conditions. The Liberal Protestants under Grattan, the Catholic gentry under Lord Fingall, the English Catholics, and a strong party at Rome under Gonsalvi, were prepared to give the Crown a veto on the nomination of Irish prelates, in return for the boon. The bishops themselves favoured the compromise. O'Connell opposed and beat them all. The Catholic Association (1823—q.v.) organized the peasantry through the priests. The Waterford election (1826) proved the power of the movement. The return of O'Connell for Clare in 1829 convinced the Duke of Wellington that he must choose between concession and civil war. The Emancipation Act was passed, the forty-shilling freeholders were disfranchised, and the Catholic Association (q.v.) suppressed. The horrors of the Tithe War led to a severe Coercion Act in 1833, and to the abolition of tithes and the substitution of a land tax in 1838. A Poor Law was passed in the same year, and a Municipal Reform Act two years later. The national schools were founded in 1831-2, and the Queen's colleges in 1845. O'Connell's formidable agitation for repeal marked the second administration of Sir Robert Peel. The prohibition of the monster meeting at Clontarf (October 8, 1843) broke his power. He died at Genoa in 1847. The "Young Ireland" party (q.v.), chiefly composed of Protestant journalists and men of letters, made a foolish attempt at rebellion in 1848. The potato famine of 1846-8, and the Encumbered Estates Court Act, caused a vast exodus to America. A considerable amount of English capital was invested in Ireland, and some years of steady progress ensued. But the enduring existence of social and political discontents was revealed by the Phoenix Conspiracy of 1858. They culminated in Fenianism at the close of the American War. [FENIAN CONSPIRACY.] In 1868 Gladstone became premier and proceeded to legislate for Ireland. The Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed in 1869, and a Land Bill embodying some novel principles became law in 1870. Two years after the Ballot Act (1872), the Home Rule party came into prominence under Isaac Butt. He was soon ousted from his position by Parnell, who availed himself of the distress caused by bad harvests in 1878-80 to organize the formidable Land League movement. By a second Land Act, passed in 1881, Gladstone transformed the whole system of Irish tenures. The Land League was suppressed in the same year, but immediately revived as the National League. Systematic outrages, however, still prevailed over three of the provinces. Offenders against the "unwritten law" were shot or "boycotted," and in May 1882 Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, the chief and under secretaries for Ireland, were stabbed by the "Invincibles" in the Phoenix Park. In 1885, nearly ninety Nationalists having been elected to parliament under the reduced franchise, Gladstone, followed by the great bulk of the Liberal party, embraced the cause of Home Rule. His bill was rejected in 1886, his government being succeeded by one pledged to maintain the Union intact. But he returned to power in 1892 and introduced a second bill, which passed the Commons but was thrown out by the Lords.

Home Rule was postponed once more. A Local Government Act in 1898, however, assimilated the administration of Ireland to that of Great Britain, and a new Land Act was passed in 1903 (and amended in 1904) to the advantage of both vendor and tenant. During the next five years the chief events of political importance in Ireland were the royal visit of Edward VII and Queen Alexandra (1903-4) and the Irish Universities Act (1908).

The Home Rule question became dominant in 1910, when the parliamentary elections left the Liberal and Conservative parties practically equal, and so made the Liberal government dependent on the support of the Irish Nationalists under John Redmond (q.v.). Ireland itself was divided in opinion among the Nationalists (Home Rule party), the Sinn Féin party (q.v.) under Arthur Griffith, the Republican party founded by James Connolly, and a Unionist minority, mainly Protestant in religion, under Sir Edward Carson. Despite the Unionist protest at Craigavon, Ulster, in September 1911, a Home Rule Bill was introduced by Mr. Asquith in April 1912, and repeatedly rejected by the Lords amid continued protests against it from the Ulster Unionists, who established a provisional government under Sir Edward Carson (September 1913) and adopted an attitude of defiance, enlisting and arming companies of Volunteers. The Republicans on their side began to enrol the National Volunteers as a challenge to Ulster; and hopes of a peaceful solution dwindled when Mr. Asquith's proposal for a compromise excluding Ulster from the scope of the bill for five years was rejected by both sides in March 1914, and followed later in the month by the Curragh incident (q.v.). The transport of arms to Belfast, and the passage of the Home Rule Bill through its third reading on May 25, augured ill for Irish tranquillity. John Redmond did indeed make an earnest gesture of peace on the outbreak of the Great War, and the operation of the Home Rule Bill, which received the royal assent in September, was postponed; while Northern and Southern Ireland sank their differences in a campaign of recruiting for the British army during 1915. But the War was viewed by the Sinn Féin party and the Irish Republican

Brotherhood as an opportunity to secure their demands. On Easter Monday, 1916, the Irish Republic was proclaimed in Dublin, and all the principal buildings seized by the rebels, who counted on the active assistance of Germany. The rebellion was short-lived, however; the Volunteer stronghold surrendered unconditionally to government troops on April 29, and 15 of the leaders were court-martialled and shot. During 1916 another attempt at a compromise on the basis of excluding Ulster from the Home Rule Act was undertaken by Mr. Lloyd George, without success. A fresh proposal in 1917 for an all-Ireland conference was accepted by all parties except Sinn Fein, which would be content with nothing short of Irish independence; but the conference was unable to reach an agreement. The Conscription Act of 1918 could not be enforced, and the 73 Sinn Fein members elected to parliament in that year refused to take their seats and set up instead the Assembly of Ireland (Dail Eireann) under the presidency of Eamon de Valera (q.v.). The two governments—British and Irish—at once began a duel which was to last for three years. It was marked in 1919 by the efforts of Sinn Fein to raise the Irish question at the Versailles Conference and in Washington, by raids and shootings in Ireland, "special military areas" being proclaimed wherever an officer of the Crown was shot, and by the last Home Rule Bill, introduced with a view to providing two parliaments in Ireland, one for Ulster and one for the rest of the country. The bill received scant support. The next year, 1920, was signalized by the activities of the "Black and Tans," authorized by the British government in April, the campaign of Sinn Fein reprisals, and the Act for the Better Government of Ireland (December). But feeling was rising everywhere in favour of a cessation of hostilities. In May 1921 a conference took place between Sir James Craig (Lord Carson's successor in Ulster) and de Valera (the leader of Sinn Fein), and a path to peace was opened which led, after the burning of the Dublin Customs House and its records by the Irish Republican Army (May 25), to the acceptance by Northern Ireland of the Home Rule Bill of 1919. The Northern parliament was opened on July 7. On July 8 a truce was signed between North and South. On September 30, de Valera sent envoys to London to settle the future condition of Southern Ireland. The Irish Free State finally came into being as a British Dominion by a treaty signed on December 6, according it fiscal autonomy and providing that Northern Ireland should be allowed to ratify or reject the treaty at will within one month. Ireland, NORTHERN, a partially self-governing part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, was constituted in 1920 by the Government of Ireland Act. The first parliament met in Belfast on June 7, 1921, and was opened by the king on June 22, Sir James Craig (q.v.) being the first prime minister. At the outset the government of Northern Ireland made it clear that it would not consent to union with the Irish Free State (q.v.), and decision on this point was left to it by the Irish Free State (Agreement) Act of 1922, which provided also that, if Northern Ireland voted for separation, the boundary between north and south should be fixed by a mixed commission. Another act of the same year restricted the operation of the Government of Ireland Act to Northern Ireland and established a governor and a privy council for Northern Ireland. Fiscal separation from the Free State was achieved in April 1923, and the boundary question was finally settled on December 3, 1925. Northern Ireland is administered by a governor, a Senate, and a House of Commons. The governor, acting in the name of the king, gives or withholds assent to bills passed by the two Houses, subject to certain limitations. The Senate consists of 26 members and the House of Commons of 52. The initiation of money bills is vested in the Commons. All executive power continues to reside in the king, but is exercised by the governor. [A. C. F. B.]

Ireland, DUKE OF. [VERE, ROBERT DE (1362-92).]

Ireton, HENRY (1611-51), was educated at Oxford, and on the outbreak of the Civil War joined the Parliamentary party, and fought at Gainsborough, Newbury, and Naseby. In January 1647 he married Cromwell's daughter Bridget. He was active in putting down the Royalist risings in 1648, and was one of the most energetic members of the High Court of Justice which condemned Charles I to death. He was nominated in the council of state in 1649, but his name was struck out by parliament. When Cromwell went over to Ireland Ireton was appointed second in command, and on Cromwell's recall he was made lord deputy, which office, says Ludlow, who was his colleague, "he conducted with great ability, and with unbounded devotion to the public service." Parliament settled £2,000 a year on him, but he refused to take it. He died of the plague, and was buried in Westminster Abbey; but his remains were dishonoured at the Restoration with those of the other "regicides," and hung in chains at Tyburn.

Irish Free State, THE (SAORSTAT EIREANN), was created on January 15, 1922, with the status of a British Dominion, on the ratification by the parliament of Southern Ireland (Dail Eireann) of the Irish Peace agreement signed in London on December 6, 1921. The first president was Arthur Griffith. A provisional government of 8 members was immediately set up under the chairmanship of Michael Collins (q.v.) and a new police force (the Civic Guard) inaugurated. The immediate difficulties in the path of the new State were the hostility to it maintained by the Republicans under de Valera (q.v.) and the refusal of Northern Ireland under Sir James Craig (q.v.) to adopt a policy of reunition. The first of these precipitated civil war in July 1922, when the Republicans were defeated at the June elections. Within a month Griffith and Collins had been killed, and the presidency passed to Mr. Cosgrave (q.v.), under whose direction the dail assembled in Dublin in September to draft a constitution which was ultimately ratified by the Imperial parliament on December 6. The Free State constitution embodies the democratic principles of adult suffrage, referendum, and initiative. By December the state of the country had reached an extreme of terrorism; trial by jury had become futile, and outrage and looting were universal. Northern Ireland refused to join the Free State, and the latter was accordingly constituted a separate Dominion under the governor-generalship of Mr. T. M. Healy. By May 1923 order was restored and de Valera signalled his followers to abandon hostilities. The Free State developed a customs system along the Ulster border, formally entered the League of Nations, and sent its president to the Imperial Conference in London (1923). Nevertheless 1924 was an unfortunate year. Resistance to the State was still threatened; the harvest of 1923 had been bad; finances were at a low ebb despite the loan of £10,000,000 raised in December 1923; a mutiny occurred in March among certain officers of the army who demanded a voice in the administration of public affairs; taxation was heavy and the customs barrier was unpopular; while the general tendency towards centralized and bureaucratic administration was distrusted. This unhappy state of affairs was in part alleviated by the successful budget of 1925, and by the settlement in London of the outstanding boundary dispute with Northern Ireland (December 3, 1925) which confirmed the existing boundary.

Irish Land Acts. [LAND LEGISLATION, IRISH.]

Irish Repeal Agitation is the name given to the movement headed by Daniel O'Connell (q.v.) for the repeal of the English and Irish Union. From his first appearance in public life, O'Connell displayed a steady hostility to the Act of Union. His activity was long absorbed in the great struggle for emancipation, but he consistently avowed his purpose of using emancipation as a step to repeal. The Catholic controversy had two abiding results: it substituted the power of the priests for the power of the landlords in Ireland, and it gave an immense impetus to the system of organized agitation in English politics. When the act became law, O'Connell applied the machinery which carried it to the promotion of repeal. The agitation was suspended in 1831, renewed after the Coercion Act of 1833, and again suspended on the accession of Lord Melbourne to power in 1835. The Emancipation Act had been in force for six years, but Catholics were still systematically excluded from office by the government. O'Connell believed that the new premier would admit them to the equality they demanded, and upon those terms he was prepared to drop the question of repeal. His expectations were not altogether disappointed. The Whig administration carried many just and useful reforms, and dispensed its Irish patronage between the rival creeds. But in the end O'Connell's support was fatal to his allies. Sir Robert Peel returned to office in 1841. The repeal agitation was at once revived. It was conducted by a "Repeal Society," modelled on the lines of the Catholic Association (q.v.). The ecclesiastical organization of the popular Church, which necessarily permeated every corner of the land, was again the basis of a political movement. The subscribers were classified according to the amount of their payments, which were collected by the priests. Repeal wardens administered the several districts. The great agitator himself controlled the whole. The educated Catholics had dissevered themselves from O'Connell early in the emancipation contest. They held utterly aloof from repeal. Their conduct gave a last blow to their political power. The Repeal Society manipulated elections, prepared gigantic petitions, and, above all, devoted itself to the promotion of "monster meetings." These enormous gatherings proved in O'Connell's hands the most striking feature of the agitation. It is credibly reported that at Tara (August 15, 1843) he addressed an audience of 250,000 men. On October 1 there was a demonstration at Mullaghmast, in Kildare. Arrangements were made to hold another at Clontarf on the 8th. The government were seriously alarmed. The Clontarf meeting (q.v.) was prohibited by proclamation on the 7th. Ample military measures were taken to enforce obedience. The action of the government, as O'Connell afterwards complained, had made a massacre imminent. Such an event would probably have strengthened his position; but he shrank from bloodshed. By strenuous exertions he succeeded in inducing his followers to disperse. The repeal movement virtually ended with the Clontarf proclamation. O'Connell was tried for conspiracy, and convicted on February 12, 1844. The judgment was reversed by the House of Lords on September 4. The agitation completed the division of classes in Ireland, and made the minority feel that the Union was essential to their existence.

Irish Society. THE. Under James I a committee was formed by twelve of the London city companies, to colonize the confiscated lands of O'Neill and O'Donnell in Ulster (1609). The Ulster plantation, with Londonderry and Coleraine as chief towns, was the result (1613). The charter was taken away in 1637, but restored, though with some changes, in 1670. This corporation still owns much land in the north of Ireland.

Iron Age. [ARCHÆOLOGY.]

Ironsides. [ROUNDHEAD.]

Isabella of ANGOULÊME (d. 1246), second wife of King John, was the daughter of Almeric, Count of Angoulême. She was betrothed to Hugh of Lusignan, Count of la Marche, but in 1200 John, who had in 1199 put away his first wife Hadwisa of Gloucester on the plea of consanguinity, proposed to marry her. She was accordingly removed by stealth from the custody of her affianced husband and married to King John in August 1200. The marriage contributed in no small degree to the loss of John's continental possessions. After John's death Isabella returned to Angoulême, and in 1220 she married her former lover, Hugh of Lusignan, whom she induced to transfer his allegiance from the French king to her son Henry III. This step resulted in the war in Poitou, in which Henry and his stepfather were beaten and the latter was compelled to make submission to Louis IX. Isabella fled in 1244 to the abbey of Fontevraud, "where," says Matthew Paris, "she was hid in a secret chamber, and lived at her ease, though the Poitevins and the French, considering her the cause of the disastrous war, called her by no other name than Jezebel, instead of her rightful appellation of Isabel." At Fontevraud she remained until her death in 1246.

Isabella, wife of Edward II (1292-1358), was the daughter of Philip IV of France. She was betrothed to Prince Edward in 1303, and the marriage took place in 1308. Her husband's attachment to Gaveston (q.v.) alienated her from him, and towards all his confidential ministers she displayed a settled aversion. She seems to have been popular with the baronial party, and on several occasions mediated between them and her husband. She seems also to have commanded the loyalty of the citizens of London. In 1302, however, the insult offered to her by Lady Badlesmere, who refused her hospitality at Leeds Castle, Kent, was the cause indirectly of the temporary downfall of the baronial party, and the defeat of Lancaster at Boroughbridge. The ascendancy of the Despencers over Edward in the year following his triumph furnished Isabella with a new grievance, and drove her once more into the arms of the opposition. It is doubtful whether she had formed any intimacy with Mortimer previously to her journey to France in 1325, although some writers have asserted that it was by her means that he effected his escape from the Tower. A dispute having arisen between Edward II and his brother-in-law, the French king, Isabella was sent over to France to arrange the matter in 1325. Having induced the king to send over Prince Edward to join her, she openly declared her intention of returning to England to deliver her husband from the hands of the Despencers. Many of the excited and discontented barons had assembled at the French court, and with their aid, and the troops she obtained from Hainault, she got together a sufficient force to enable her to venture on invading England. She landed in September 1326, near Harwich, where she was joined by many of the nobles. Her party gradually gathered strength as she marched westward against the king. Edward surrendered, the Despencers were executed, and shortly afterwards the king was deposed and Prince Edward placed on the throne (January 1327). From this time till the end of 1330 the queen and her paramour, Mortimer, were supreme. Edward II was, in all probability, put to a cruel death, the greater part of the royal revenues were placed in the queen's hands, and all attempts to give the young king a real share in the government were defeated. The terror which these two confederates had managed to establish was seen by the way in which the death of Edmund, Earl of Kent, the uncle of the young king, was encompassed. But a formidable opposition was now forming under the leadership of the young king himself. Edward, acting in alliance with some of the barons, suddenly seized Mortimer at Nottingham (October 1330), and had him speedily tried and executed. The queen was excluded from all further share in the government, and compelled to pass the remainder of her life in comparative retirement at Castle Rising and other royal manors, on a yearly allowance of £3,000. Isabella (d. 1409) was the daughter of Charles VI of France, and at the age of eight, in 1396, became the second wife of Richard II. By this marriage an end was put for a time to the war between the two countries. After her husband's deposition she returned to France (1401), but for some time resolutely refused to marry again, retaining her belief that Richard was still alive, and attempting more than once to join him. In 1406, being convinced of his death, she married Charles, Duke of Orleans. [RICHARD II.]

of Flanders in 1347. This marriage, however, was distasteful to the young noble, and he escaped into France to avoid fulfilling the contract. Eighteen years later (July 1365) she was married to Enguerrand de Coucy, who had, in the previous year, come to England as a hostage for King John of France. Her husband was made Earl of Bedford soon after the birth of his first child (1366). De Coucy, in the course of the next few years, went over to the French side and eventually parted from his wife, whom he left in England in 1376. She died in 1379.

Isabella (1214-41), the second daughter of King John, was married to the Emperor Frederick II in the year 1235, after negotiations had been set on foot for her marriage with Alexander II of Scotland (1220), and even with Henry, King of the Romans (1225), the son of her future husband. In 1238 the new empress gave birth to a son, who was named Henry, after his uncle Henry III. Isabella was kept in strict seclusion by her husband, and spent most of her time alone at Noenta. In 1241, however, she met her brother Richard on his return from the Holy land, though not without considerable difficulty. Isabella died at Foggia towards the close of the same year. Henry III's grief for his sister's death was so great that he gave the large sum of £208 6s. 8d. to his almoner to be distributed among the poor in one day for his sister's soul. Her son Henry, in later years, became titular "King of Jerusalem," but died in 1254 at the age of sixteen—"a victim, as is generally supposed, to the traitorous artifices of his brother Conrad."

Island Scots, THE, seem to have settled in Ireland some time during the reign of Henry VIII. These Redshanks, as they were often called, were most of them Highlanders, and they issued forth from their Ulster fastnesses for the sake of plunder. The efforts of the Earl of Sussex as lord deputy, and of Ormonde, were insufficient to repress them. Their chief, MacDonnell, was as a rule the close ally of the terrible O'Neills; but in 1565 Shane O'Neill attacked them and defeated them at Ballycastle, killing their chiefs. In revenge for this defeat, Oge MacDonnell, the brother of the slain chief, caused Shane, when a suppliant in his camp, to be brutally murdered (1567). During the whole of the troubles of Elizabeth's reign, and until 1619, the Island Scots held Antrim and Down.

Island Voyage, THE, is the name given to the disastrous expedition to the Azores undertaken by Essex and Raleigh in 1597.

Isles, LORDS OF THE. The Lords of the Isles claimed their descent from Somerlaed, Regulus of Argyll, who towards the middle of the twelfth century obtained possession of half of the Sudreys (q.v.). [HEBRIDES.] Douglas has quoted a letter, dated 1292, bidding Alexander de Insulis Scotia to keep the peace within his bounds of the isles till the next meeting of parliament. The same authority mentions an indenture, dated 1334, by which Baliol yielded to John of Isla the isles of Mull, Skye, Islay, and other islands, while that nobleman in return became the liegeman of the king. In 1341, however, John made his peace with David II. In 1356 Edward III treated with him as an independent prince, and in the treaty for the liberation of King David (1357) the truce between England and Scotland included John of the Isles and all the other English allies. Though some years later John of the Isles (d. 1386 ?) bound himself to answer for all taxes the king might impose on his dominions, yet he was to all intents and purposes an independent prince, and was the first to assume the title of Lord of the Isles. He was succeeded by his son Donald, who, claiming the earldom of Ross in right of his wife, invaded the Lowlands, and was defeated at Harlaw (q.v.), near Aberdeen (1411). His son Alexander, who succeeded to his father about 1420, was forced in 1429 to beg pardon for the rebellion he raised against James I, "attired in his shirt and drawers and kneeling before the high altar of Holyrood Church." Alexander's son John, who was Lord of the Isles from 1449 to 1498 (?), joined in the Douglas rebellion of 1451; and in 1462-3 made a treaty with Edward IV of England, and assumed the title of King of the Hebrides. In 1475 he was attainted and his lands were declared forfeit, but next year he made his peace with the Crown, receiving recognition as a lord of parliament, but surrendering his earldom of Ross. From this time the glory of the lordship disappeared; the title was indeed resumed by a John of Islay under James V, but it was only an empty vaunt. The real power on the western coast passed from the Macdonalds to the Campbells, though the former long kept up a kind of royal state in Skye.

Islip, SIMON (d. 1366), Archbishop of Canterbury (1349-66), began his career in the king's service as a royal chaplain and secretary, and on the death of Bradwardine was appointed to the metropolitan see at the special request of Edward III. He is famous as an ecclesiastical reformer, and did much to remedy some of the crying abuses in the Church, and to check the demoralization occasioned by the Black Death. It was during his primacy that the famous Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire were passed to limit the abuses of the papal power in England. The conduct of this archbishop on several occasions merits great praise; especially so in the case of the Flagellants, who in the early days of his office were swarming into England. These he found on inquiry to be mere enthusiasts, and not men of loose lives; hence he left their frenzy to die of its own accord, and would not encourage it by persecution. In 1359 we find him ordering prayers throughout the kingdom for the success of Edward III's French expedition.

Italy, RELATIONS WITH. As Italy has only comparatively recently become a single state, its relations with England are very hard to define. In a sense, all the relations of England with Imperial and papal Rome come within this question. The literary and civilizing influences which the home of ancient culture has constantly exercised on mediæval England have a still more direct claim for treatment. But the mere political relations of the various governments of Italy and England only necessitate a cursory consideration. The states of mediæval Italy were too small, too self-centred, and too remote to have many direct political dealings with the distant and barbarous English. Some of the more important transactions will be found under EMPIRE, RELATIONS WITH; PAPACY, RELATIONS WITH, etc. The close friendship of the Normans of England with the Normans of Naples, especially as instanced in the effect upon each other of the systems of government of Henry II and William the Good—the long struggle of Henry III to get Naples for his son Edmund of Lancaster—the influence of Italian lawyers and financiers on Edward I—the want of faith of Edward III to his Florentine creditors—our commercial dealings with Venice, are, if we leave literary connexions out of sight, perhaps the most important examples of direct relations between the two countries during the Middle Ages. The struggles of Henry VIII to enter into the European system which was formed almost in consequence of the break-up of the political system of mediæval Italy—his political alliance with the pope and the Venetians—his efforts to exclude both French and imperial influences in turn, are of small importance when compared with the influence of the New Learning on the spiritual and intellectual life of the country, or even the indirect political influences of Italian examples of tyranny in an age when Thomas Cromwell learnt his methods of government from the "Prince" of Machiavelli. Despite the cessation of all religious dealings in consequence of the Reformation, and of most political dealings as the result of the subjection of Italy to the Austro-Spanish house, the literary and civilizing—too often the corrupting—influence of Italy on England was never stronger than during the Elizabethan age. All writers, from Harrison to Ascham and Shakespeare, testify to its importance. Yet, hardly excepting the constant intercourse with Venice—whose diplomatists still embodied the results of their objective study of our affairs in their dispatches and Relazioni—our political dealings with Italy were unimportant. This is especially the case during the seventeenth century, a period peculiarly barren in its foreign relations. James I's sympathy for Father Paul and the Venetians—Cromwell's intervention on behalf of the Vaudois of Piedmont—the travels of Duke Cosimo III of Tuscany in England during the reign of Charles II—the marriage of James II with Maria of Modena—are fair instances of the sort of relations that existed between the two countries. After the Revolution of 1688 had again made England a great European power, our political dealings with Italy became more important. The assistance which from time to time England gave to the rising power of Piedmont excited great indignation on the part of the Austrians. There are, for example, the Treaties of Worms (1743) (q.v.) and Aachen (1748), and the consequent rupture between Austria and Great Britain. The vigour which compelled Don Carlos of Naples to abandon his allies during the same war may also be mentioned as illustrating the natural hostility of Britain to the Bourbon kings of Naples. Yet British fleets protected the Neapolitan partners of the Family Compact (q.v.) when, in evil days for monarchy, the French Directory and the Empire successively drove them from the mainland. Nelson's unfortunate dealings with Naples and the gallant incursion which led to the victory of Maida are conspicuous instances of British relations with that monarchy. The gradual emancipation of nineteenth-century Italy, associated as it is with the name of Garibaldi, has constantly found warm sympathy from British public opinion, though the colder support of British diplomacy drove Cavour to seek in Napoleonic France a strange ally in a struggle for national liberty.

J

Jacobites, THE (from Jacobus, the Latin for James), were the adherents of the Stuart cause after the Revolution of 1688. The expulsion of James II had been effected with surprisingly little difficulty; but the unpopularity of the new government, the crushing taxation which the great war involved, the party triumph of the Whigs, the presence of James in Ireland, and the reaction which always succeeds revolution, had produced in a very short time a formidable party of friends of the exiled house. The Tories and High Churchmen began to realize that the Revolution could be justified only on Whig principles, when, despite the efforts of William III, the Whigs assumed the control of the administration. The very churchmen who had led the opposition to a popish king became the founders of the schism of the Non-jurors (q.v.). They and the Catholics could not be other than avowed Jacobites. But among the nominal adherents of William there was a class of what a prominent Whig called "Non-juring swearers," whose acquiescence in the Revolution was at best formal, whose more active section might be relied upon to join a Jacobite revolt, and whose passive section would, at least, welcome the restoration of the exiled dynasty. A large section of the Tory party fell within the latter category. "Several in England," writes a Jacobite agent, "wish the king well who would not risk their estates for him. If he came with ten thousand men, not a sword would be drawn against him." Thus there were, besides the avowed Jacobites, the Non-jurors, and the Catholics, a very large class of Jacobite sympathizers. There were, moreover, a large number of prominent statesmen who, in an age of loose political morality, did not scruple to secure a safe retreat for themselves in the event of the restoration of King James. Many of the great Whig and Tory leaders—Russell, Leeds, Shrewsbury, Godolphin, Marlborough—carried on an active intrigue with the banished king. Besides the above classes, there was a nucleus for organization in the exiled court of St. Germain, whence many a subtle and experienced intriguer set forth to win back for the king his lost throne. The active support of the French could be depended upon; and, besides the English Jacobites, they could rely, in Scotland, on the bulk of the Highland clans, more jealous of the Whig clan of the Campbells than zealous for divine right, but ever ready to revive the glories of Montrose and Dundee. The persecuted Episcopalian sect in the Lowlands were Jacobites to a man; and, after the Darien episode (q.v.) had rekindled the national animosity of Scotland against England, the Jacobite emissaries were not without hope even that Whigs and Presbyterians might be impelled by patriotism to support the old line of Scottish monarchs. In Ireland, after the failure of James II's forces and the triumph of the English, there was little chance of any Jacobite movement. Religious and national sentiment brought the Irish to the side of James. The penal code (q.v.) and the Protestant ascendancy made revolt impossible. Still, something could be hoped for if England were to rise.

When the appeal to arms had proved unavailing in Scotland and Ireland, and a French landing had been made impracticable by the victory of La Hogue, a series of plots and conspiracies—aimed against the life and throne of William—kept up the activity of the Jacobite party. Of these, the Assassination Plot (q.v.) was the most famous. But such atrocities only had the effect of weakening the Jacobite cause. Combined with the sturdy bigotry of James and his traitorous dependence on the foreign enemy of England, they alienated the bulk of the Tory party, on whom the hopes of the exiled house really depended. Even the Jacobite party split up into Compounders (q.v.), who were anxious only for a conditional restoration with constitutional guarantees, and the Non-Compounders, who, in blind adherence to the theories of divine right and passive obedience, thought it downright Whiggery to impose terms on the Lord's anointed. The prevalence of Non-Compounding views at St. Germain, and the refusal of James to abdicate in his son's favour or bring him up a Protestant, completed the alienation of the Jacobites from English popular sentiment. The Peace of Ryswick (q.v.) was, for a time, fatal to their hope of French aid. The passing of the Act of Settlement (q.v.) in a Tory parliament marks the lowest point of their fortunes. Under Queen Anne the Jacobite policy was changed. The death of James was a great help to it. His son, James III, as he styled himself—the Chevalier de St. George, or the Old Pretender, as others styled him—was at least personally innocent; and his recognition by Louis XIV, and the renewal of hostilities with England, revived the hopes of the party. But most was expected from the development of the High Church Toryism, of which Dr. Sacheverell was the popular exponent. The Scottish Jacobites might, indeed, under cover of hostility to the Union, assail the queen's throne; but the English Jacobites directed their main efforts to secure the succession on her death, to avail themselves of Anne's notorious affection for her family and dislike of the House of Brunswick, and even to obtain, by peaceful means, a repeal of the Act of Settlement. The ministry of Harley and Bolingbroke put all the resources of the State in the hands of the Jacobite intriguers. The army was newly modelled under the Jacobite Ormonde. All possible means were taken to secure the proclamation of James on the queen's approaching death. But the quarrel of Harley and Bolingbroke, the new attitude of the Whigs in Church matters, the coup d'état which made Shrewsbury treasurer, and the premature death of the queen, frustrated the well-laid plan. George I peacefully ascended the throne. The Tory ministers were impeached, imprisoned, exiled. The death of Louis XIV, and the anxiety of the Regent Orleans to be on good terms with England, was the culminating disaster. Bolingbroke was now the Pretender's secretary of state. His hopes died when the old king expired; but either James was too obstinate or the news came too late to stop the revolt in the Highlands, which was the outcome of the intrigues of the last few years.

In such gloomy circumstances the first great Jacobite rising—the affair of 1715—began; the offspring of levity or despair, after the death of Anne and Louis XIV had made any external assistance impossible. Ormonde made a gallant but ineffectual attempt to land in Devonshire; but there, as elsewhere, the planned revolt of the friends of James was prevented by the vigour and activity of the new government. The arrest of six Tory members of parliament deprived the Jacobites of leaders. The University of Oxford and the western counties were dragooned into loyalty; only in Northumberland was a rising effected in England, and the choice of Forster as its leader was fatal to its small hopes of success. Meanwhile more formidable risings had broken out in Scotland. On October 12 Lord Kenmore proclaimed King James at Moffat. Foiled at Dumfries, but joined by Lords Nithisdale, Wintoun, and Carnwath, with two hundred horse, he crossed the border and joined Forster's "handful of Northumberland Foxhunters." But the Highland revolt alone possessed any real importance. This was led by the Earl of Mar, who, after accepting George I, had suddenly hurried north and raised his standard in Braemar on September 6. A large number of the clans joined him; and, despite his personal incompetence and failure to surprise Edinburgh Castle, he entered Perth, detached Brigadier Macintosh to join Kenmore and Forster, and ultimately advanced against Argyll, appointed to command King George's forces in Scotland. On November 13 the battle of Sheriffmuir (q.v.), near Stirling, was fought, and Mar was compelled to retreat northwards. The landing of the Pretender at Peterhead could not revive the falling cause. James and Mar re-embarked for the continent, and the insurgent army was dispersed. The southern rebels, after a fruitless march southward to Preston, in Lancashire, surrendered at that town to the royal forces. The chief prisoners were tried and executed. The last hope of the Jacobites was destroyed by the dismissal of Bolingbroke. The expulsion of the Pretender from France ratified the alliance of England and her old enemy. So little formidable were the Jacobites now that Harley's impeachment was dropped; and, though the intrigues of Alberoni and the plot of Bishop Atterbury (q.v.) for a while revived interest in the cause, the long ministry of Walpole, his policy of conciliation and peace, and the similar disposition of the French government, postponed the hopes of the Jacobites for a generation. In 1742 the fall of Walpole revived political intrigue, and the renewal of war with France gave the Jacobites fresh hopes of French aid. In Prince Charles, the Young Pretender, the party found a more gallant and romantic leader than James, his father. Undeterred by the disastrous storm which wrecked the French transports and ruined the projected invasion in 1744, Charles landed near Moidart, with seven followers, on July 25, 1745. Joined by Lochiel and other important chieftains, Charles found little difficulty in gathering a great army of the clans, and was accepted as prince by the greater part of the Highlands. Sir John Cope, the English commander, abandoned his strong position at Corry Arrack and left the road to the Lowlands open. At Perth the Duke of Perth and Lord George Murray joined the Pretender's cause. After the "Canter of Coltbrigg," in which the regulars fled in disgraceful panic from the irregular Highland hordes, Edinburgh was occupied by Charles. On September 20 the battle of Prestonpans inflicted on Cope the defeat he had avoided at Corry Arrack. After a brief period of inaction and gaiety, Charles started in November on an invasion of England. He besieged and conquered Carlisle, and, helped by the inactivity of Marshal Wade, marched far into the heart of England. At Manchester some slight feeling in the Pretender's favour was manifested; but as a rule the population, though not very zealous for an unpopular and foreign monarch, were perfectly indifferent to the cause of the Jacobites. On December 4 Charles entered Derby, but the division of his followers, and the vastly superior forces of Wade and Cumberland, necessitated a retreat. Meanwhile the Lowlands of Scotland had quietly renewed their allegiance to George II when the backs of the Highlanders were turned. Followed closely by a superior army, Charles retired hastily to Glasgow; but strengthened by new Highland reinforcements, he gave battle on January 23, 1746, to General Hawley at Falkirk (q.v.). The wild charge of the Highlanders again won the day; but they dispersed to their homes with the booty, and Charles, deserted on every side, was driven to bay on Culloden Moor (q.v.) on April 16. Cumberland, with 12,000 regular troops, made short work of the dispirited clansmen. The revolt was over. The Highlands were subdued thoroughly, and for the first time. The abolition of the heritable jurisdictions destroyed the power of the chiefs, and for ever put an end to Highland revolts. Charles, after many adventures, escaped to France.

The very success of the "45" demonstrated the hopelessness of a Jacobite reaction. The national, religious, and political principles of the vast bulk of the nation made it impossible. The age was not one favourable for lost causes or chivalrous hallucinations. The party which adhered steadfastly to obsolete political doctrine, which found in France its constant supporter, and in Catholicism its congenial creed, could make no way in eighteenth-century England. Charles himself visited London in 1750, if not on later occasions; but he soon gave up politics for drink and debauchery. The brilliant successes of Pitt reconciled his party to the new administration. The accession of George III was gladly availed of as an excuse for a return to their allegiance. The new Tory party was purged from all suspicion of Jacobitism. Under George III that party became triumphant. The downfall of the Whigs was the downfall of the last hope of the Jacobites. But years before that, none but a few theorists of divine right, or the fanatics of Non-juring, hoped for a Jacobite restoration.

Jacquetta, or JACQUELINE, of Luxembourg (d. 1472), was the daughter of the Count of St. Pol, and was married in 1433 to John, Duke of Bedford. The match occasioned a rupture between Bedford and Philip of Burgundy, whose consent as overlord of the bride's father had not been asked. After Bedford's death she became the wife of Sir Richard Woodville, and by him was the mother of Elizabeth Woodville, the queen of Edward IV.

Jaenbert, Archbishop of Canterbury (763-91), is chiefly famous for his vigorous opposition to the scheme of Offa of Mercia for raising the see of Lichfield to metropolitan rank and transferring to it the primatial authority of Canterbury. In 786 Offa, with papal approval, carried his plan into execution and Jaenbert was compelled to surrender a large portion of his province to Higbert of Lichfield, retaining jurisdiction only over the sees of London, Winchester, Rochester, Selsey and Sherborne. He was the first Archbishop of Canterbury of whose coins specimens have been preserved.

Jalalabad, THE SIEGE OF (1842), took place during the first Afghan War. On March 11, 1842, Akbar Khan made his appearance before Jalalabad, and advanced to the attack of the town with his whole army. The garrison, however, sallied out and drove him ignominiously from the field, upon which he turned the siege into a blockade. On April 1 the troops sortied, and swept into the town 500 sheep and goats they had seen grazing in the plain. Akbar now pitched his camp within two miles of the ramparts, to cut off foragers. On April 6 General Sale determined on an assault on the enemy's encampment. The troops issued from the gate at dawn, and were received with a flanking fire from one of the ports. This was gallantly stormed. The advance guard under Captain Havelock moved on, repelled two charges of Akbar's splendid cavalry, and drove them into the camp. The enemy were dislodged from every point, and pursued to the river, with the loss of their guns, equipage, and ammunition.

Jamaica, the largest of the British West Indian islands, was discovered and named St. Jago by Columbus in 1494, though the native name of "Jamayco," the island of springs, persisted. It was first colonized by the Spaniards in 1509 from Hispaniola, the town of St. Jago de la Vega being founded by Diego Columbus in 1523 and the Arawák inhabitants being subsequently exterminated. Spanishtown was plundered by an English fleet in 1596 under Sir Anthony Shirley and held to ransom by Captain Jackson in 1635. In 1655 the island was captured by Cromwell's West Indian expedition, the Spaniards expelled, and attempts made systematically to colonize it. Port Royal, however, was for long the buccaneer base for attacks upon Spain. The Treaty of Madrid (1670) confirmed the English title, which a French invasion of 1694 unsuccessfully disputed, while until 1740 the Maroons, originally slaves who had fled from Spanish masters to live as bandits in the mountains, made security impossible. The last Maroon revolt was crushed in 1795, and by 1842 they had acquired all the rights of British subjects. In 1782 a Franco-Spanish invasion was prevented by Rodney and Hood's naval victory, and in 1806 Admiral Duckworth defeated a projected French invasion. Soon difficulties with the slaves began. Introduced in numbers to work sugar plantations after the foundation of the Royal Africa Company in 1672, attempts to improve their status by the British government and the emancipation campaign provoked ill-feeling among the colonists, who talked of secession to the United States of America. The slave revolt of 1831 was crushed with severity, but an Emancipation Act was passed through the assembly in the face of much opposition, changing the slaves into apprenticed labourers. A parliamentary committee sat, and its report was followed by the abolition of apprenticeship in 1839. Another revolt was crushed with severity in 1865, followed by the abolition of the constitution. From 1655 to 1661 the island had been ruled by a military council, which settled troops on the land. Charles II confirmed D'Oyley as governor, but granted an elected council of twelve in 1661. The new governor, Windsor, in 1662 was to rule with a nominated council and a legislative assembly of 30, municipal institutions were granted, and the colonists proclaimed to have the ordinary rights of British citizens. In 1680, taking their stand upon this, the assembly successfully withstood the Crown's attempt to apply the principle of Poyning's Law to Jamaica and to tax the island, and so vindicated its own legislative independence. In 1728 the question was settled; in return for a fixed revenue of £8,000 the Crown confirmed the body of Jamaican laws and its legislative independence. After forcing emancipation upon the assembly, the Imperial government took control of all West Indian prisons, whereupon the assembly refused to transact business. Lord Melbourne's motion to suspend the constitution for five years led to his resignation, and the crisis ended in a compromise. After a deadlock in the legislature over finance, in 1854, a new constitution was adopted, which preserved the assembly, and gave a majority to the unofficial element in the legislative council to which was granted the right of initiating all except financial measures. The council's executive functions were transferred, however, to a separate privy council, while an executive committee, of 3 assembly and 1 legislative council members, became virtually a responsible ministry paid by the Crown.

favour of strong government. Jamaica was thereupon constituted a Crown colony with a single nominated legislative chamber until 1884, when an elective element was introduced into the legislative council (9 being elected while 4 officials and another were nominated). Unanimity of 6 of the elected members could secure control of finance. A nominated executive council of 8, some of whom were not officials, was also added and called a privy council. The legislative council now consists of the governor, 5 officials sitting ex-officio, 10 nominated and 14 elected members. Local government was introduced in 1885. The Morant and Pedro Cays, annexed in 1882, the Caymans (1862), and the Turks and Caicos Islands (q.v.) (1873) are dependencies of Jamaica. In 1921 the Hon. E. Wood on a colonial office mission made constitutional recommendations now being discussed.

James I, KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1394, s. 1406, d. 1437), the second son of Robert III, was captured, when only eleven years old, by an English ship whilst on his way to the court of France to receive his education there (1406). On his father's death, in the same year, he was acknowledged King of Scotland, the regency being undertaken by the Duke of Albany, to whose machinations his capture and subsequent long captivity have (though without definite justification) been ascribed. Whilst a prisoner in England James, naturally a man of great ability, received an education which eminently fitted him to play the part of king, and made him one of the most accomplished princes of his age. After the death of Albany (1420) negotiations for his release were begun which at last ended in his return home, where he was crowned at Scone, May 1424. Before he left England James I had married Joan Beaufort, daughter of the Earl of Somerset, and cousin of Henry V. The effect of his English education was soon apparent on his return to Scotland; his first act was to put to death the Regent Murdoch of Albany for abusing his power (1425), a step which was quickly followed by the reconstitution of the Scottish parliament, the reformation of the statute law, and a general valuation of all property for the purposes of taxation. In 1427 James seized and imprisoned the Lord of the Isles and sundry other turbulent Highland chieftains at Inverness, and declared his intention of putting down the acts of lawlessness which were so common. In 1436 he sent his daughter to France to be married to the dauphin, afterwards Louis XI, thus cementing the connexion which already existed between Scotland and the French court. Meanwhile, the king's reforms, his attempts to diminish the power of the great nobles, and the necessity of imposing taxes, gave rise to a conspiracy against him. On the night of February 20 or 21, 1437, he was brutally murdered, in the abbey of Black Friars at Perth, by a band of conspirators headed by Sir Robert Graham. This murder was amply avenged by his queen, whom the assassins had spared in their hurry. James I has been acclaimed as the "ablest king Scotland had yet known." That he was a man of energy and determination there can be no doubt, but recent historians admit that his rapacity, improvidence, and personal ambition cannot be gainsaid. His reputation as a poet similarly appears somewhat tarnished in the cold light of modern research. "Christie's Kirk on the Green" has now been definitely dissociated from his name, and doubts have even been thrown on the authenticity of the "King's Quair." James retains, however, his claim to an abiding place in the constitutional development of the kingdom, while his legislation testifies to the fact that his rule, if despotic, was also paternal.

James II, KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1430, s. 1437, d. 1460), was the son of James I, whom he succeeded at the age of seven. After his coronation at Holyrood he was immediately conveyed by his mother to Edinburgh Castle for safety. The chief power in the realm was shared between Sir Alexander Livingstone and Sir William Crichton. The queen, alarmed at the pretensions of the latter, contrived to escape to Stirling (1439) and placed herself under the protection of Livingstone. Crichton, however, succeeded in seizing the young king, who himself did not begin to rule for some years. In 1449 James married Mary, daughter of the Duke of Gueldres, and his marriage led to his emancipation from tutelage. The Livingstones were overthrown in 1450, and James, two years afterwards, in a fit of passion, stabbed with his own hand William, Earl of Douglas, who had been for some time past in more or less open rebellion to the royal authority. The king was now at war with the house of Douglas, whose estates were declared forfeited to the Crown (1455). As a result the royal power was immensely increased, and for the rest of his short reign the king was virtually absolute. In 1460 James, who was of a fiery and warlike nature, crossed the English border at the head of a large army to lend aid to Henry VI. He undertook the reduction of the castle of Roxburgh, where he was killed by the bursting of a cannon, August 3, 1460. He was on the whole a good king. We are told that "in the time of his later days, his realm was in quiet, prosperous estate, in no fear of outward enemies, and he kept his nobles in loving and noble obedience, and the commons in good peace." His ability, perhaps, comes out more clearly than elsewhere in his method of dealing with the Douglas rebellion. When the Earl of Douglas made alliance with the Earl of Crawford, James succeeded in enrolling a third noble, belonging to a rival house—the Earl of Huntly—on his own side; and even contrived to split up the great family of the Douglasses by winning over one of its chief members, the Earl of Angus, to the royal party (1452-5).

James III, KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1451, s. 1460, d. 1488), was the son of James II, whom he succeeded when nine years old. The queen-mother retained the chief power, being assisted in the government by Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews, till, in 1466, the young king was carried off to Edinburgh by the Boyds, after which event the head of this family (Sir Alexander Boyd) became guardian of the kingdom. In 1469 James married Margaret, daughter of Christian, King of Denmark and Norway, receiving as her dowry the Orkney and Shetland Isles. About this time the Boyds fell into discredit. They were deprived of the estates which the royal bounty had conferred upon them, and the head of the house was forced to flee into England, while his son, the Earl of Arran, who had married the king's sister, escaped to Denmark. In 1476 the Highlands were reduced as a result of the submission of the Lord of the Isles, and his earldom of Ross was annexed to the Crown. So far James's reign had been singularly fortunate, but his popularity now rapidly waned. He was suspected of causing the death of his brother, the Earl of Mar, while in 1479 his other brother, Albany, was compelled to seek refuge in France. Later Albany went to England and entered into a plot with Edward IV to establish himself upon the Scottish throne. Meanwhile James's partiality for favourites of low tastes, notably two, named Cochrane and Rogers, gave rise to a conspiracy against him on the part of the Scottish nobles, who seized and hanged several of them at Lauder (1482), where the king had halted on an expedition to defend the border against the projected invasion of Albany. James was seized and carried to Edinburgh, where, however, he was soon set at liberty, at the request of his brother, with whom he had now become reconciled. Albany, however, continued his treasonable practices, and in 1484 was again compelled to flee to France, where he died the next year. In 1488 a new and formidable revolt was organized against James by the great lords and nobles. The king's unsuccessful attempt to arrest the ringleaders at a parliament at Edinburgh added fuel to the flames, and James had to flee to the north. There he raised a large army and attacked the rebellious lords at Sauchie Burn (q.v.), near Stirling. He was, however, defeated, and fled for refuge to Beaton's Mill, near Bannockburn, where he was stabbed by an unknown hand (June 1488). James III was ill-fitted to be the ruler of Scotland, and seems to have been a man of avaricious and cowardly disposition. He was charged with drawing his chief friends from the lowest ranks of society; but how far this accusation is true is doubtful. The "mason" Cochrane was probably in reality the architect of the noble buildings which, about this time, began to adorn Scotland; while Rogers the "musician" may have been no mere performer of other men's music, but a great composer. Great as were his defects, James had a share of the culture of his race. He was a lover of letters, music, painting, and architecture, and a patron of the arts.

James IV, KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1473, s. 1488, d. 1513), succeeded his father James III, after the battle of Sauchie Burn 1488 (q.v.), and at once found himself compelled to guard against a plot formed for the purpose of seizing his person by Henry VII, with the aid of Lord Bothwell. In 1495 James hospitably received Perkin Warbeck at his court, and the following year sent an expedition across the borders on his behalf. This, however, came to nothing, and shortly afterwards James contrived to get rid of his visitor. In 1497 Henry began to make overtures of peace to Scotland, and in 1502 James IV married the Princess Margaret of England, and joined the English and Spanish alliance. In 1512 a dispute arose with England out of the capture of some Scottish vessels in the Downs; the French alliance was vehemently pressed upon the king by the Queen of France, who appointed him her knight to maintain her own and her country's cause against their common English enemy. Urged by her entreaties and his own wrongs, James determined to undertake the disastrous campaign which ended in his total defeat, and was followed by his death at Flodden Field (September 9, 1513). The king left behind him the character of a brave soldier and a just administrator, though his private life is open to severe blame. "For his political government and due administration of justice, which he exercised during the time of his reign, he deserveth to be numbered among the best princes that ever reigned over that nation." To James IV must be ascribed the establishment of the first efficient navy possessed by Scotland, and the settlement of the Highlands, by distributing garrisons throughout the turbulent districts. With regard to the first of these two achievements, letters of marque were given to two Scottish sea-captains, Sir Andrew Wood (q.v.) and Sir Andrew Barton (q.v.), who cleared the coast of English pirate vessels, and carried on their depredations against England and other nations. We are told that towards the close of the reign the Scots navy consisted of no fewer than thirteen vessels, one of which, the Michael, was the marvel of its day for bulk. The settlement of the Highlands was facilitated by using the influence of two great families—the Huntlys and the Argylls—who, though Lowland in their origin, had by marriage or other means been gradually acquiring immense possessions and influence in the Highland districts; and this influence James did not scruple to manipulate, so far as he could, for the purposes of strengthening the royal authority in those remote parts.

James V, KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1512, s. 1513, d. 1542), the son of James IV and Margaret of England, succeeded his father after the fatal battle of Flodden (q.v.). As he was not quite two years old, the regency was entrusted to his cousin, the Duke of Albany, who was invited over from France—of which country he was admiral—to undertake this office at the request of the Estates of the Realm (1515). The queen-dowager, who had married the Earl of Angus almost immediately after her first husband's death, was soon obliged to yield up her son, whom she had carried off for safety to Stirling Castle. Within a year of his first landing the regent had crushed all attempts at rebellion, and very soon left Scotland, after having placed French garrisons in several of the strongest fortresses. In Albany's absence Angus seemed likely to secure the chief power, had he not offended his wife, who urged the absent regent to return (1521). At last, after various fluctuations, and the interference of Wolsey, the young king was installed in Edinburgh as king, and the regency taken away from the Duke of Albany (1524). But despite the apparent pacification, the great nobles, Angus, Argyll, and Errol, were struggling for power among themselves, and the young king was kept in close duress, till, in 1528, he managed to escape to Stirling. James now took the government into his own hands, and Angus was driven into England. The details of domestic government, the reduction of the lawless borderers and the Highland clans, occupied the next few years of the reign.

In spite of the failure of the proposed alliance with the Princess (afterwards Queen) Mary, and in spite of various border frays, a peace was concluded with England in 1534, though James rejected all proposals for a meeting with Henry VIII, believing that his safety would be endangered. In 1536 the king, whilst at the court of France on a visit undertaken with the object of marrying Marie, daughter of the Duke of Vendôme, fell in love with and married Madeleine, the French king's daughter. Next year, however, the queen died, and James married Mary, daughter of the Duke of Guise (June 1538). On his return home the king had begun to occupy himself with domestic affairs, and succeeded in alienating a great number of the nobility by confiscating many estates which had passed into their hands during his minority. Towards the close of his reign he roused Henry VIII to fury by promising to meet him at York, and failing to keep his word through fear. Henry at once declared war on the ground that James was acting treacherously towards England, and the Scottish king could not prevail upon his nobles to cross the border. The disorganization in his army was taken advantage of by the enemy, and the defeat of Solway Moss (q.v.) was the consequence. A few days afterwards (December 16, 1542) the unfortunate monarch died at Falkland, having just before his death received with chagrin the tidings of the birth of a daughter, afterwards the famous Mary Queen of Scots. From his restraint of the nobles, his lavish expenditure, his accomplishments, and his carelessness, he was a favourite with his people, by whom he was long remembered as "the King of the Commons."

James I, KING (James VI of Scotland) (b. June 19, 1566, s. in Scotland, July 24, 1567, in England, March 24, 1603, d. March 27, 1625), was the son of Mary of Scotland by Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley. He was entrusted to the care of the Earl of Mar and of Alexander Erskine, and his principal tutor was the celebrated George Buchanan. In 1578 the regency was taken from the Earl of Morton, and James was henceforth, in name at least, ruler of Scotland. His reign in Scotland was, to a large extent, a quarrel with the clergy and the nobles. In 1582 the general assembly resolved to abolish Episcopacy; and James, who had been seized by some of the nobles at the raid of Ruthven (q.v.), was unable to prevent the measure. In 1585 he came to terms with Elizabeth, and made a treaty with her, consenting to receive a pension. The same year he was besieged by the banished lords in Stirling Castle, and was compelled to pardon them, to dismiss his favourite Arran, and to deprive him of his title and estates. Notwithstanding the execution of his mother (1587) by Elizabeth, done probably with his assent, he co-operated in the preparations against the Spanish Armada in 1588, and in 1589 drew closer his alliance with the Protestant powers by his marriage with Anne of Denmark. A treasonable attempt was made upon him by Bothwell in 1591, and another in 1593, and in the latter year he was seized and imprisoned by that nobleman, but soon released. In 1594 he undertook a campaign against Huntly and Errol, the great Catholic nobles of the north, and, after a victory at Glenlivet (q.v.), reduced them, and compelled them to quit the country. They were, however, allowed to return in 1597. The breach between James and the Presbyterian clergy had been growing wider for some time, and was increased by the publication of his work, the "Basilikon Doron" (q.v.), and by the appointment of bishops in 1599. In 1600 occurred a somewhat mysterious plot against his life, known as the Gowrie Conspiracy (q.v.). On the death of Elizabeth James immediately set out for England, and was proclaimed king in March 1603, being crowned at Westminster on July 25 following. He assumed the title of King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland the next year. In ecclesiastical matters he immediately manifested his preference for the High Church view. The Puritans were thwarted and punished at the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.), while at the same time the Jesuits and seminary priests were ordered to quit the kingdom (February 1604). The anger caused among the papists by these stringent measures led to the abortive Gunpowder Plot (q.v.). James almost from the first year of his reign was involved in disputes with his parliament, chiefly turning on the questions of money and redress of grievances. In 1604 a dispute on the subject of privilege had terminated in favour of the Commons. The government was extravagantly administered, and the expenses of the court were very great. In order to supply the deficiency in the revenue, Cecil raised loans under the privy seal, and in 1608 issued a Book of Rates, by which the customs on various articles were considerably increased. Notwithstanding, in 1610, the king was obliged to ask the Commons for a large grant, which was made the subject of much bargaining, until finally the parliament was dissolved, without any result having been attained (February 1611). Cecil died the following year. The chief place in the king's favour was now taken by Robert Carr (q.v.), a young Scotsman, who was created Earl of Somerset. In November 1612 the young Prince of Wales, Henry, of whose character high expectations had been formed, fell ill and died. The following year James, still adhering to Cecil's policy of opposition to Spain, cemented the alliance with the German princes by marrying his daughter Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine, Frederick V. Somerset was ruined and degraded by the revelation of his wife's murder of Sir Thomas Overbury (q.v.), and the management of affairs was henceforth (1615) in the hands of James's second favourite, George Villiers (q.v.), afterwards Duke of Buckingham. The anti-Spanish policy of Cecil was given up, and James entered into negotiations for peace and alliance with Spain. In 1614 parliament was reassembled, and attempts were made to secure its docility by a body of managers called "Undertakers" (q.v.). These, however, were unsuccessful; and the "Addled Parliament" (q.v.), as it was called, was dissolved before any business had been done. The king now resorted to several emergency means of raising money. Benevolences were collected, patents of peerage sold, and numerous monopolies let out to private individuals. In 1617 Sir Walter Raleigh, who had been in prison since 1603 on a charge of complicity in the plots against the king, was released, and allowed to lead an expedition to Guiana, where he hoped to discover gold mines. The expedition proved a failure, and Raleigh on his return was put to death. This was done in deference to Spanish susceptibilities, and was greatly resented by the people. At the beginning of the Thirty Years' War (1618) the feeling in England was strongly in favour of interference on the part of this country in favour of the Protestant elector. James, however, refused to interfere vigorously, and trusted to his diplomatic skill to mediate between the parties and restore peace. In 1621 another parliament was called. But after impeaching Bacon, the lord chancellor, and inquiring into grievances, a dispute on foreign policy took place between the king and the Commons. James in anger dissolved parliament (January 1622). Negotiations were set on foot for a marriage between Prince Charles and the Spanish Infanta, to effect which Charles and Buckingham went to Spain in 1623. Buckingham, however, quarrelled with the Spanish ministers, and the match was broken off (December 1623). This led to a sudden reversal of the king's policy. War was declared on Spain in March 1624, and Count Mansfeldt was allowed to enlist troops in England for the Protestants in Germany. Negotiations were set on foot for a marriage between Charles and Henrietta Maria, the French princess, but before it was completed James died. "He had many qualities befitting a ruler in such difficult times. Good-humoured and good-natured, he was honestly desirous of increasing the prosperity of his subjects. . . . He was above all things eager to be a reconciler, to make peace where there had been war before, and to draw those to live in harmony who had hitherto glared at one another in mutual defiance. . . . With a thorough dislike of dogmatism in others, he was himself the most dogmatic of men. . . . He had none of that generosity of temper which leads the natural leaders of the human race to rejoice when they have found a worthy antagonist, nor had he, as Elizabeth had, that intuitive perception of the popular feeling which stood her in such stead during her long career" (Gardiner). James wrote a variety of tracts on a number of different subjects. Most of them are absolutely worthless. They were collected in 1616.

James II, KING (b. October 14, 1633, r. February 6, 1685—December 1688, d. September 16, 1701), was the second son of Charles I and Henrietta Maria. He was created Duke of York immediately after his birth. He accompanied his father during the Civil War, and he was captured by Fairfax on the surrender of Oxford, but contrived to escape to Holland disguised as a girl, in April 1648. He served with reputation in both the French and the Spanish armies, and was to have taken command of a force for the invasion of England if the rising of Sir George Booth in 1659 had been successful. In 1660 he returned to England with his brother, and was made lord high admiral, subsequently receiving large grants of land in Ireland. In 1665 he took command of the fleet against the Dutch, and showed great ability in the conduct of naval affairs. In 1669 he avowed his conversion to Roman Catholicism, and on the passing of the Test Act in 1673 he was obliged to resign his office of lord high admiral. The Whig party, headed by Shaftesbury, attempted to get an Exclusion Bill passed depriving him of his right of succession to the throne, and so great was the feeling against him that in 1679 he was induced by the king to go abroad, but before long he was recalled and sent as lord high commissioner to Scotland, where he showed such harshness and severity that he had to be recalled in 1680. He was in that year presented by the grand jury of Middlesex, at Shaftesbury's instigation, as a popish recusant, but the judge, by suddenly dismissing the jury, quashed the proceedings. He returned to Scotland shortly afterwards, and remained there till 1682. In 1684 he was restored to his office of lord high admiral, and to his seat in the council, and on his brother's death in the next year succeeded to the crown.

James II commenced his reign by disclaiming any intention of interfering with the Church, and promising a legal form of government; but his acts were not in accordance with his declarations, and his opponents, who in the last years of his brother's reign had found an asylum in Holland, at once began to concert measures for an invasion. Accordingly the Duke of Monmouth landed in England, and the Earl of Argyll in Scotland, but both failed, and the attempt of the former especially was punished with great severity. James was emboldened by his success to proceed with hasty steps in the design which he had formed of restoring Romanism. He had, at the opening of his reign, made arrangements with that view in Scotland and Ireland, and he now ventured to extend them to England. He claimed a power of dispensing with the penal laws, dismissed his parliament when it showed a resolution to oppose him, exhausted every effort to gain converts, called such, as well as Roman ecclesiastics, to his councils, laboured to procure the repeal of the Test Act, and forbade the controversial sermons which the clergy, justly alarmed at his proceedings, felt it their duty to deliver. This injunction was disregarded, and to enforce it a new Court of Ecclesiastical Commission was established, which suspended the Bishop of London from his office, and afterwards perpetrated the most flagrant injustice on both universities. The king induced the judges to give a decision in favour of the dispensing power, and he followed this up by forming a camp on Hounslow Heath, the officers of which were chiefly Romanists. He had already published a Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.), April 1687, and sedulously courted the Protestant Nonconformists; but they in general mistrusted him, and declined to forward the restoration of Romanism by joining in his attack on the Church. Undeterred by this, he ordered the Declaration to be read in all churches, and on seven of the bishops petitioning against the order he sent them to the Tower on the charge of libelling the king. They were put on their trial and acquitted. Just at this juncture a son and heir was born to James, and was considered by the people to be a supposititious child. Meanwhile a number of the leading statesmen of all parties requested James's son-in-law, William of Orange, to come over to England to secure his wife's right to the throne, and protect the liberties and religion of the English people. Accordingly William issued a manifesto, and eventually landed in England on November 5, 1688. James now attempted to retrace his steps. He reinstated the Bishop of London, made such reparation as he could to the universities, and dismissed his most obnoxious counsellors; but he could not regain the confidence of his people. His army melted away, and the prince advanced towards London. James, deserted by most of his friends, sent his queen and infant son to France, and attempted to follow them, quitting Whitehall in disguise on December 11. He was, however, seized at Sheerness and detained at Faversham, whence in a few days he was removed to London and thence to Rochester, and was then allowed to escape to France, landing at Ambleuse on Christmas Day. He was kindly received by Louis XIV, who warmly espoused his cause, and assisted him with troops in his expedition to Ireland in 1689. Landing at Kinsale, he was received with enthusiasm by the Catholics, and for some time seemed likely to succeed in making himself at all events master of Ireland, but the raising of the siege of Londonderry was a great blow to him, and on July 1, 1690, he was totally routed by William in the battle of the Boyne, after which he fled to France. James spent the remainder of his life at St. Germain, engaged in intrigues for recovering possession of his lost crown, but constantly finding his hopes dashed to the ground. He married first, Anne Hyde, daughter of Lord Clarendon (September 3, 1660), by whom he had two daughters, Mary and Anne, and four sons and two daughters who died in infancy; and, secondly, Mary of Modena (November 21, 1673), who bore him one son and four daughters, who died young, and one son,

Japan, RELATIONS WITH, have become important only in recent years. The rapid development of Japan in the latter half of the nineteenth century was watched with keen interest by the British government, which was the first government to assent (1894) to a revision of existing treaties in a manner compatible with the growing position of Japan among the powers. The British Capitulations were abolished. This, the first step towards an alliance, was followed by a rise of resentment in Japan against Russia and Germany for the annexations of Port Arthur (1898) and Kiao-Chow (1897) and the combined intervention which had robbed Japan of some of the fruits of her Chinese War of 1894. Identity of interests between Great Britain and Japan in the Far East at last found expression in the Treaty of Alliance signed on January 30, 1902, which recorded the desire of both parties to preserve the status quo and the peace of the Far East, and emphasized their concern for the integrity of China and Korea. Each party undertook (a) to safeguard, without aggrandizement, its interests in the Far East, (b) to remain neutral if the other contracting party went to war in defence of its interests, (c) to come to its aid if any other power joined its enemy, and (d) to contract with other powers no arrangements prejudicial to the interests of the other contracting party. The treaty was to last for five years. In 1905 it was renewed, with certain modifications, for a further ten years. Its immediate effect was to confine the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-5 to a duel between the two powers. In 1914 Japan entered the Great War on the side of the allies (August) and speedily cleared the German flag from Kiao-Chow and from the Pacific. At the close of the war she shared the German Pacific territories with Great Britain, obtaining those lying north of the equator, and entered the League of Nations. She played a creditable part in the Washington Conference of 1921 on the limitation of armaments. The Anglo-Japanese alliance here terminated. Japan also took part, with Great Britain and the United States (on the invitation of the last-named), in the Geneva Conference on the Limitation of Naval Armaments (June 1927).

Java, EXPEDITION TO (1811). The subjugation of Holland by Napoleon rendered it important to British interests to occupy the Dutch settlements in the East. An expedition was therefore sent against the Spice Islands in 1809, and Amboyna, Banda, and Ternate were occupied after a feeble resistance. The island of Java alone remained, and an expedition was fitted out against it, consisting of ninety sail, on which were embarked 4,000 Europeans and 4,000 sepoys. Lord Minto accompanied it as a volunteer, and with him went Mr. (afterwards Sir) Stamford Raffles (q.v.), who was well acquainted with the habits, languages, and interests of the inhabitants of the Eastern Archipelago. The fleet anchored in the bay of Batavia (August 4). The capital was occupied without resistance, and the capture of the fortified position of Cornelis gave the whole island to the British. The Sultan of Djocjocarta, however, a native prince, called upon the Javanese to assert their independence, and set up the standard of revolt. Colonel Gillespie conducted a force against Fort Cornelis, which was protected by a high rampart, and batteries mounted with 180 pieces of cannon, and manned by 13,000 men under General Janssens. It was carried by assault, and the fortifications razed. Lord Minto committed the command of the army to Colonel Gillespie, and the government to Raffles, under whose administration it continued to flourish for several years, till Java was restored to Holland at the general peace of 1815.

Jedburgh, in Roxburghshire, was one of the Scottish strongholds delivered to England in 1174, as security for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Falaise. About the year 1408 it was wrested from the English, by whom it was burnt, a century later (1523), during the invasion under Lord Dacre. In 1544 it was again burnt, by Sir Ralph Evers. Jedburgh was one of the royal burghs, and its abbey was founded by David I.

Jeetgurh (JEETPUR), THE BATTLE OF, was fought in India (January 14, 1815). General Wood, having been appointed to take Butwal and penetrate Nepal, took the field in December 1814, after a great deal of delay, and, without any reconnaissance, allowed himself to be brought before the stockade of Jeetgurh, by the treachery of a Brahmin guide. A heavy fire was immediately opened from the redoubt, which was garrisoned by 1,200 Gurkhas, and he was forced to retreat. [GURKHA WAR.]

Jeffrey, FRANCIS, LORD (1773-1850), was born and educated at Edinburgh. On being called to the bar, he found that he could obtain very little legal business, owing to his being a Whig at a time when Tory influence was so predominant in Scotland. Turning his attention to literature, he became one of a small group of men who, in 1802, planned the publication of the Edinburgh Review, of which he very soon became the editor. This periodical, which, before long, took rank as the leading exponent of Whig views, continued under Jeffrey's management till the year 1829. In 1830 Jeffrey was appointed lord advocate, and he subsequently entered the House of Commons as member for Edinburgh. He was entrusted with the Scottish Reform Bill in 1831-2, and in 1834 was made a judge in the Court of Session.

Biography by Lord Cockburn, 1852.

Jeffreys, GEORGE, LORD JEFFREYS OF WEM (1648-89), was born in Denbighshire of a respectable family. After receiving his education at St. Paul's and Westminster Schools, he seems to have entered the Inner Temple, when very young, in 1663. When called to the bar (November 1668) he confined himself for a long time to the Old Bailey and criminal courts, where he speedily rose to the top of his profession. In 1671 he became common serjeant of the City of London. Six years later he was made solicitor-general to the Duke of York, and knighted; while towards the end of the next year he was appointed recorder of London. Having placed his services at the disposal of the court, he was employed in prosecuting those who were accused of being concerned in the Popish Plot (q.v.). The government speedily rewarded him by making him chief justice of Chester and a baronet (1680). Before the close of that year he was reprimanded in the House of Commons for having obstructed the meeting of parliament. This censure was mainly due to the instance of the City of London, on which he attempted to revenge himself by his efforts to destroy its municipal institution. After the trial of Lord William Russell and the offenders connected with the Rye House Plot (q.v.), Jeffreys was made a privy councillor (October) and chief justice of the King's Bench (November 1683). When James II became king he was raised to the House of Lords as Baron Jeffreys of Wem, May 1685, and almost immediately afterwards went to Somerset to try the insurgents who had assisted in Monmouth's rebellion (July 1685). In September he was made chancellor. Jeffreys was next instrumental in obtaining the verdict of the judges in favour of the Dispensing Power (q.v.), and the revival of the High Commission Court. Then followed the Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.). On the landing of the Prince of Orange, when James II left London for Salisbury, Jeffreys was one of the five lords appointed to represent him in his absence. As William's cause prospered daily, the chancellor attempted to escape in a sailor's dress; he was seized by the mob in a Wapping ale-house, and, being secured by the trained bands, was carried before the lord mayor and committed to the Tower, where he died a few months later (April 1689).

Jekyll, SIR JOSEPH (1663-1738), was called to the bar in 1687. In 1697 he was appointed chief justice of Chester, and in the following year was returned to parliament for Eye, and received a knighthood. In 1710 he was one of the managers of Sacheverell's impeachment. In 1717 he became master of the rolls, and in 1725 one of the commissioners of the great seal. In 1733 he astonished the ministry by his vigorous support of Walpole's excise scheme. In the year 1736 he introduced the Gin Act (q.v.) and the Mortmain Act. Pope has summed up his character as one "who never changed his principle or wig."

Jellicoe, JOHN RUSHWORTH, 1ST EARL (1859-), entered the navy in 1872, became a commander in 1893, was appointed director of naval ordnance at the admiralty in 1905, and became vice-admiral in 1911 and second sea lord of the admiralty in 1913. On the outbreak of the Great War he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Grand Fleet. He was in command at the battle of Jutland (q.v.), May 31, 1916, and became first sea lord later in the same year. He was raised to the peerage in 1918, became admiral of the fleet in 1919, and in 1920 was appointed governor of New Zealand, where he remained till 1925. On his return to England he was created an earl.

Jenkins, SIR LEOLINE (1623-85), was educated at Oxford. On the death of Charles I he retired to Wales, and later to the continent, whence he returned shortly before the Restoration. In 1661 he was elected principal of Jesus College, Oxford, of which society he was a munificent benefactor. In 1664 he was engaged in reviewing the maritime laws, and in 1668 was made judge of the Prerogative Court at Canterbury. In 1678 he was employed in negotiating the Treaty of Nimeguen, and next year succeeded Sir William Temple as ambassador at The Hague. On his return home he was a strong opponent of the Exclusion Bill, for which service he was appointed a privy councillor about the year 1680. Five years later he died.

Biography by William Wynne, 1724.

Jenkins's Ear, THE STORY OF, was circulated in 1738, greatly to the prejudice of Sir Robert Walpole. At this time war with Spain was eagerly desired by the nation, but opposed by Walpole. Robert Jenkins, who was the master of the trading sloop Rebecca, from Jamaica, asserted that his ship had been boarded by a Spanish guarda costa, and that, although no proof of smuggling had been found on the vessel, one of his ears had been barbarously torn off. This ear he carried about in cotton to display to his hearers. It was said at the time that he had lost it on another occasion, probably at the pillory. On being asked by a member what were his feelings when he found himself in the hands of such barbarians, "I committed," he said, "my soul to God, and my cause to my country." The truth of the story is extremely doubtful, but the end that was aimed at was attained. The indignation of the people, fanned as it was by the press and by the untiring efforts of all sections of the opposition, became uncontrollable. War with Spain followed in October 1739.

Jenkinson, ANTHONY (d. 1611), was one of the most famous travellers and explorers of Elizabeth's reign. In 1557 he was sent out to Russia as the agent of the Muscovy Company, and made his way to Astrakhan, Persia, and Bokhara, revisiting the last-named place no fewer than six times in the interests of commerce. In 1571 he was sent as ambassador to the Muscovite court by Elizabeth.

Jenkinson, CHARLES, 1ST EARL OF LIVERPOOL (1727-1808), was educated at the Charterhouse and at University College, Oxford, and first came into notice by the lampoons which he furnished to Sir Edward Turner in his contest for Oxfordshire (1760). By him he was introduced to Lord Bute, whose private secretary he soon became. In 1761 he was returned to parliament for Cockermouth, and was made one of the under-secretaries of state. In 1763 he became joint secretary of the treasury. He was dismissed from all his appointments on the accession of the Rockingham government. Lord Chatham, however, recognizing his talents for business, appointed him a lord of the admiralty in 1766, and he was soon afterwards advanced to be a lord of the treasury. In this capacity his particular form of ability had room for display, and he soon became an influential authority on all matters of finance. In 1778 he became secretary-at-war, and held that office until he was driven out with Lord North. He then travelled on the continent, and only returned to England in 1784, joining Pitt's government as president of the board of trade, for which place he was admirably adapted, both by nature and experience. In 1786 he was appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and was soon afterwards created Baron Hawkesbury. Ten years later, while still at the head of the board of trade, he was raised to the dignity of an earl.

Jenkinson, ROBERT BANKS, 2ND EARL OF LIVERPOOL (1770-1828), son of the 1st earl, was educated at the Charterhouse and Christ Church, where he was the contemporary and friend of Canning. He entered political life under Pitt's auspices, and was in parliament before he had attained his majority. On his father being created Earl of Liverpool he became Lord Hawkesbury (1796). In the Addington ministry he was foreign secretary, and had charge of the negotiations which ended in the Treaty of Amiens (q.v.); but when Pitt returned to office in 1804 Lord Hawkesbury went to the home office. On Pitt's death, the king earnestly wished him to become premier, but he very wisely declined the troublesome office, and again on the fall of Lord Grenville's ministry in 1807, contenting himself with being home secretary. On Perceval's assassination, he imprudently yielded to the urgency of the Prince Regent, and became premier. He at once became the object of popular hatred by his opposition to reform, especially in the shape of Catholic emancipation, and the adoption of arbitrary coercion to suppress the violent discontent which gathered head during the period of his ministry. His unpopularity was still further increased by his introduction of a bill of pains and penalties against Queen Caroline, which he afterwards withdrew. He was struck down by paralysis in 1827, and died after lingering in a state of imbecility for nearly two years. He had been prime minister for the unprecedented period of fifteen years. It has been said of him that "in honesty, as a minister, he has never been surpassed; in prejudices, he has rarely been equalled."

C. D. Yonge, "Life of Lord Liverpool," 1868.

Jennings, SARAH, DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH (1660-1744), at an early age entered the household of the Duchess of York. There she became the companion and friend of the Princess Anne, who became passionately attached to her. So intimate were they that they afterwards, as is well known, corresponded under the names of Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman. In 1678 Sarah Jennings married Colonel John Churchill, afterwards Duke of Marlborough. Owing to the influence of the Churchills, Anne deserted her father, and joined the party of the Prince of Orange. In 1692, on her husband's disgrace, Anne refused to dismiss Lady Marlborough from her employment. The result was a quarrel between the queen and the princess, and the latter set up an opposition court at Berkeley House. On the accession of Queen Anne, she received the rangership of Windsor Park and the offices of groom of the stole and mistress of the robes. The duchess soon proved herself a violent Whig, having been converted to these principles by the Dowager Lady Sunderland. Hence she often had disputes with her mistress, in which Marlborough was not infrequently involved. In 1703 she lost her only surviving son. Her violent temper had already caused the friendship of the queen to cool towards her. She gradually found herself supplanted in the royal favour by Mrs. Masham (q.v.), a poor relation of her own, whom she had introduced into the household. She found that Harley was employing this lady as an instrument whereby to undermine the administration of her husband and Godolphin. In 1708 Marlborough threatened to resign, and the duchess implored Anne to confer her places on her daughters. A temporary reconciliation took place on the death of the queen's husband; but on the departure of the duke for the continent the friendship cooled again. It was in this year that she is said to have spilled the mythical glass of water on Mrs. Masham's gown, which, according to Voltaire, "changed the face of all Europe." She several times forced herself into the queen's presence. In April 1710 she saw Anne for the last time. Early in 1711 Anne demanded her key of office, and the personal entreaties of the duke were of no avail. The duchess promptly began to lampoon the queen and the Tory ministry. She also sent in a claim for the payment of sums she would have received had she accepted the queen's offer of an additional pension as keeper of the privy purse. In 1712 she joined the duke on the continent. She prayed him not to accept employment under the Hanoverian regime. In 1720 she was accused by Sunderland of having furnished money to the Pretender, but she disproved the charge in a series of letters to the king. On the death of Marlborough (1722), the Duke of Somerset and Lord Coningsby were smitten by her mature charms, but both were rejected. Her last years were occupied in drawing up the celebrated "Vindication" of her husband's character and her own. Of the numerous sketches of her character the most famous is Pope's, in his moral essay, "On the Characters of Women," where she is satirized under the name of "Atossa."

Jerusalem, the capital of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem from its capture by Godfrey de Bouillon in 1099 until its surrender to Saladin in 1187, was offered to Henry II in 1185 by the refugee Templars in England. Henry refused the offer because of the responsibility involved and because there was not one of his sons to whose care the country might be safely trusted. Richard I advanced on Jerusalem twice during the Third Crusade; in July 1191, after the fall of Acre, and in June 1192, after the battle of Arsuf. But he abandoned the attempt and made a truce with Saladin in September 1192. The city persisted in Saracen and Turkish hands until the close of the Great War, when, following the entry of General Allenby (q.v.) in December 1917, a civil administration was set up in 1920 and Jerusalem became (July 1922) the capital of Palestine under the British mandate from the League of Nations.

Jervis, JOHN, EARL OF ST. VINCENT (1735-1823), entered the navy in 1749, and first saw active service in the expedition against Quebec in 1759, after which he was promoted to be a commander. In 1775 he was appointed to command a ship of 80 guns, and in 1778 took a distinguished part in Keppel's engagement off Brest. In 1782 he was knighted for capturing a large French ship when separated from the rest of his fleet by a fog. In 1784 he was returned to parliament for Yarmouth. In 1790 he was returned for Wycombe, and was at the same time promoted to be rear-admiral. He vacated his seat on the outbreak of war, and was dispatched to the West Indies. His health suffered considerably, but in 1795 he took command in the Mediterranean, where he won the battle off Cape St. Vincent (q.v.) on St. Valentine's Day. Created Earl St. Vincent, he rendered invaluable service in the mutiny at Spithead (q.v.) and the Nore in 1797, by his resolution and prudence. In 1800 he was appointed to command the Channel fleet in succession to Lord Bridport, but threw up the command in the next year on being appointed to preside at the admiralty. There he set to work to reform some of the many abuses which had long existed in the management of the navy. In May 1804 he was superseded by Viscount Melville, and on Fox's accession to office in 1806, again took the command of the Channel fleet. In that year he was accused in the House of Commons of "gross neglect in the building and repairing of ships." The charge was, however, refuted by most convincing details: and Fox moved that "the conduct of the Earl St. Vincent, in his late naval administration, has given an additional lustre to his exalted character, and merits the approbation of the House." The motion was agreed to without a division. In the following March St. Vincent retired from his command, but devoted some of his time to politics, and was a keen opponent of the Perceval ministry. In 1814 he was appointed governor of marines, and in 1821 admiral of the fleet. A great and original commander at sea, St. Vincent gained by his impartial justice the love and admiration of his men.

Jewel, JOHN, Bishop of Salisbury (1522-1571), was one of the most active of the reformers during the reign of Edward VI. Under Mary he was compelled to seek an asylum in Germany, but returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, and was made Bishop of Salisbury (1559). He was one of the champions of the Protestants at the Theological Conference at Westminster in the same year. He was a strong upholder of the doctrine of the divine right of kings, a great controversialist, and a voluminous writer. His great work, the "Apology; or Defence of the English Church" (1562), is mainly based on a denial of the theory that truth necessarily resides in a numerical majority; it is practically a claim made on behalf of Protestant bodies to be admitted to the Council of Trent, and while denying that Roman Catholic doctrines have the support of the great fathers, is content to rest all its arguments on the direct teaching of Christ and his apostles. This work was translated into English very soon after its first publication, and was so generally esteemed that Elizabeth gave orders for one copy of it to be placed in every parish church.

Jews in England. The first appearance of the Jews in any number in England must be reckoned among the results of the Norman Conquest. Immediately after 1066, many coming from Rouen, Caen, and other Norman cities, arrived in London in the train of the invaders. Like the forests, the Jews were declared in early Norman Law to be the peculiar property of the king, and his local representative, usually the constable of the tower or castle erected to signalize the submission of a town to Norman conquerors, ruled over each settlement. The Jews were subject to tallages at the arbitrary will of the Crown, and the Norman kings claimed a large proportion of their wealth. But they enjoyed, in early times, no small security in return. Their religion excited little hostility. In their special districts, known as the Jewries, they were allowed to practise all their religious rites, and synagogues with schools attached to them sprang up in all parts of the country. Standing outside the authority of the Church, the canon-law forbidding trade in money did not affect them, and it was that calling that most of them successfully pursued. Their general financial skill was widely acknowledged. William I employed them to farm the revenues of vacant sees, and at this and later dates great barons and ecclesiastics sought their services as stewards of their estates. Many at the same time gained distinction as physicians, and in several towns, notably at Oxford, the lectures of their rabbis on medicine, and other sciences, were attended by Christian as well as by Jewish scholars. After the death of Henry I the security which the Jews had previously enjoyed was rapidly weakened. At the close of the twelfth century, and throughout the thirteenth, their position was one of growing danger. They became the helpless victims of the kings, who made their wealth an important source of revenue. Stephen and Matilda, and their supporters, robbed them recklessly. In 1187 Henry II demanded a fourth of their chattels, and Richard I depended largely on them to meet his extravagant expenditure. Until the reign of Henry III, however, a somewhat tolerant policy was still pursued toward them by the government in matters of religion. In 1176 permission was given them to acquire burial-grounds outside the towns where they were settled. Richard I practically legalized their own forms of oath in civil cases. John corresponded with a chief rabbi on terms of intimacy. But from the middle of the twelfth century the people of the towns, stirred constantly by the preachers of the Crusades to a fanatical hatred of them, attributed to them, as heretics, as foreigners, and as capitalists, their poverty and misfortunes, and subjected them to every variety of persecution. In 1146 the baseless charge was preferred against the Jews of Norwich of murdering a child to use his blood in their religious ceremonies, and this and similar accusations were repeated later in London, Gloucester, Bury St. Edmunds, Lincoln, and elsewhere. In 1189 riots took place in every town where any Jews resided.

The Jewries were pillaged and fired, and their inhabitants brutally murdered. Restrictions, too, were frequently placed on their financial dealings. The Assize of Arms (q.v.) forbade the Jew to take into the towns any weapon of war. In 1194 Richard I issued a decree placing their commercial transactions more thoroughly under the control of the local officers of the Crown. To the same period belongs the development of the machinery of the "Exchequer of the Jews" (Judeorum Scaccarium), which dealt with cases in which both Jews and Christians were concerned, and supervised the revenue which flowed into the royal coffers from the Jews in the form of reliefs, escheats, fines, and tallages. The barons introduced into Magna Carta a clause forbidding the Jews on the death of a baronial debtor to distrain the property of his survivors, and in 1218 they were ordered for the first time to wear a distinguishing badge.

The thirteenth century witnessed little change in the position of the Jews. The first years of John's reign, and of his son's, gave them brief respites from persecution, and speciously extended their privileges, but otherwise their history is a mere repetition of extortionate exactions and deeds of popular violence. John not only constantly levied tallages upon them, and imprisoned and tortured those unable to pay, but he confiscated the property of their insolvent debtors, and distributed it among his supporters. When Henry III came of age he followed his father's example, and reversed the moderate policy that his justiciars, William Marshal and Hubert de Burgh, had pursued towards them. They were made responsible for all the extravagances of himself and his wife's relatives, who bitterly hated them, and hardly a year passed without a heavy exaction, varying from 10,000 to 60,000 marks, being made upon their property. In 1255 Henry made them over to his brother, Richard of Cornwall, as security for a large loan. And these exactions and indignities were far from being their only difficulties. The Church now deliberately attacked their religion. The friars—the new preachers of religion in the towns—were filled with zeal against Judaism, and they sought and obtained, as at Cambridge, many synagogues for their own habitations. Simon de Montfort shared the friars' hostility to them, and the battles of Lewes and Evesham were followed by revolting attacks upon the Jews throughout the country. In vain they begged permission to leave England altogether. The king found them too valuable to lose them lightly. His refusal of their petition was followed by a harsh edict forbidding them to hold in future any property in land. From Edward I's connexion with the Jews a similar story has arisen, but with his reign their mediæval history ends. He shared the antipathy for which his mother, Eleanor of Provence, was remarkable, and the statute de la Jewerie, issued in 1275, was calculated to ruin them utterly. Lending money at interest was absolutely forbidden, and every Jew was to pay a poll-tax of threepence or fourpence annually. Persecution by people and priests was meanwhile left unpunished, and at length, in 1290, Edward I, exercising some self-denial, consented to expel them. About 16,000 are reported to have left the country, and the majority of them appear to have sought refuge on the coast of France and Flanders. Many, however, were wilfully wrecked in their passage, and perished at sea. The grounds of their expulsion were stated to be the blasphemous character of their religious belief, and their oppression of the people as usurious money-lenders. Their real property was naturally confiscated by the Crown.

It is frequently stated that after the banishment of 1290 no Jews came to England until the later years of Cromwell's protectorate, but special investigation of the subject leaves little doubt that small numbers of them were present in the country from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century. Throughout this period the House for Jewish Converts ("Domus Conversorum") in London was seldom without some inmates. In 1594 Roderigo Lopez, a Jewish physician of Queen Elizabeth's, was hanged at Tyburn on a charge of treason. Charles I borrowed money, there can be little doubt, of some of their race who came to England from Amsterdam, and Cromwell employed several Jews as foreign spies. It was not, however, till 1655 that Edward I's decree was practically repealed. In that year the Protector, on his own responsibility, in answer to the petition of Manasseh-ben-Israel, a Dutch rabbi, granted permission to a few Jews to settle openly in this country. Much opposition was raised to the order by the London merchants, who feared commercial rivalry, and in 1660 a petition was presented to Charles II to reverse Cromwell's action, but it met with no success. The king had received loans from the Jews in the days of his exile, and had already pledged his word to maintain them in England. The first Jewish immigrants in the seventeenth century were descended from Spanish and Portuguese families who had taken refuge in Holland, and they were followed later by Jews from Germany and Poland. The English law at first allowed them few civil rights. By a statute of James I's reign the sacramental test was essential to naturalization, and the various penal laws, excluding Catholics from civil and municipal office, and from the legal profession, were applicable to them. Their public worship contravened a law of Elizabeth making attendance at church compulsory, but their various places of worship in London, erected in this and the next century, were never seriously menaced. Their marriages, however, were only valid by courtesy, and all Jews were subject to the alien duties (a heavy tax imposed on all goods exported by foreigners), from which, however, James II relieved them for a few years.

In commerce the English Jews rapidly gained a high reputation. In the War of the Spanish Succession a Jew contracted to supply the army with bread, and it was currently reported that Jews entered in the same reign into negotiations with Godolphin for the purchase of Brentford as an exclusively Jewish settlement. In the succeeding reigns several attempts were made to relieve them of their various disabilities. In 1723 they were permitted to omit from the oath of abjuration all words obnoxious to their faith, and a little later naturalization was allowed to all who had lived seven years in America, or had engaged in the flax or hemp trades, or who had served in the navy. Thus the principle of their right to naturalization was admitted. In 1753 the Pelham ministry introduced the Jews' Naturalization Bill, extending the privilege but not making it universal; in spite of much opposition in the Commons, it became law. Popular fanaticism and commercial jealousy were, however, roused against it in the country, and predictions of the evils that would flow from the measure excited a very bitter agitation against the Jews. In 1754 the government, in obedience to the panic, moved the repeal of the act. A clause, however, in Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act of the previous year gave practical legal validity to Jewish marriages.

In the nineteenth century the disabilities of the Jews were finally removed, and their cause found strong support in the City of London. In 1832 they were given the rights of freemen of the city, and by Lord Campbell's Act of 1835 they were enabled to take the oath requisite for admission to the office of sheriff. In 1832 the Reform Bill granted them the suffrage. A motion for the abolition of all their civil disabilities was introduced into the House of Commons in 1833, and Hume, O'Connell, and Macaulay spoke strongly in its favour, but after passing the Lower House it was thrown out by the Lords. The same fate awaited the bill on many subsequent occasions. In 1846, however, by the Religious Opinions Relief Bill, the public exercise of their religion, and the education of their children in it, were legalized. In the next year Baron Lionel de Rothschild was elected member of parliament by the City of London, but the law necessitating an oath which he could not conscientiously take prevented his taking his seat. In 1851 Alderman Salomons was elected for Greenwich, and he took his seat after omitting from the oath the words obnoxious to his faith, for which he was subsequently fined £500 in the court of Queen's Bench. Finally, in 1858, the remaining Jewish disabilities were removed by law, and the oath admitting members to the House of Commons so altered that Jews might conscientiously take it. [All restrictions on Jews at Oxford and Cambridge were removed in 1870.]

Jhansi is the name of a district in Bundelkhand, lying 142 miles south of Agra. In 1804, on the first connexion of the government with Bundelkhand, a treaty was concluded with Gheo Rao Bhao, a tributary of the Peshwa, and governor of this small territory. In 1817, when all rights of the Peshwa in the province were ceded to the company, in consideration of his fidelity the territory was declared hereditary in the family of the above-mentioned ruler. On the death of his grandson, who died without leaving any issue (1835), the territory was given to a collateral branch of the same family; and when in 1854 the last descendant of Gheo Rao Bhao died childless, the British government declined to recognize his adopted son, and annexed the province. The rani protested in vain at the time; but on the outbreak of the Mutiny in 1857 she massacred the Europeans and proclaimed herself independent. The fortress of Jhansi, garrisoned by the 12th Native Infantry, fell into the hands of the insurgents led by the rani, who was not expelled until April 1858 by a column under Sir H. Rose. She was eventually slain before Gwalior fighting in the front ranks like a man.

Jhindur Bhye was the wife of Ranjit Singh, on whose death she assumed the regency of the Punjab, or rather shared it with her paramour, Lal Singh. Her intrigues brought about the reduction of the Punjab by Lords Hardinge and Dalhousie. After a series of strange and romantic vicissitudes, prematurely old, well-nigh blind, broken and subdued in spirit, she found a resting-place at last under the roof of her son, in a quiet corner of an English castle, and died in a London suburb.

Jingoes was a name given during the excitement of the Eastern Question in 1878 to the party which was in favour of war with Russia. The word sprang from a popular song of the period the refrain of which was—

"We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do, We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too."

The term, however, was adopted in serious political controversy, and used to designate those who favoured an aggressive foreign policy.

Joan, wife of Edward the Black Prince (d. 1385), commonly called the "Fair Maid of Kent," was the daughter of Edmund of Woodstock, Earl of Kent, sixth son of Edward I.

On the death of her brothers without issue, she became Countess of Kent (1352). Sir Thomas Holland and the Earl of Salisbury both became suitors for her hand. She was contracted in the first instance to Holland, but during his absence in France Salisbury contrived to supersede him. The case was later referred by Holland to the pope, who gave a decision in his favour (1349). In 1360 Holland died and next year Joan became the wife of the Black Prince. Five years later she gave birth to Richard II. In 1381 she was exposed to the insults of the insurgents, who took possession of the Tower, whither she had fled for refuge, but her life was preserved.

Joan of Arc. [HENRY VI; HUNDRED YEARS' WAR.]

Joan, OF NAVARRE, QUEEN (d. 1437), was the daughter of Charles the Bad, of Navarre, and was married first to John IV, Duke of Brittany, and secondly (1402) to Henry IV. In 1419 she was accused of conspiring against her stepson Henry V, and for a time she was deprived of all her revenues and committed to the custody of the governor of Pevensey Castle. She was reinstated in 1422 and passed the rest of her life in peaceful retirement.

Joan (OF THE TOWER), fourth and youngest child of Edward II (1321-62), was promised in marriage to David Bruce of Scotland, by the Treaty of Northampton (1328), and married in July the same year. On the successful invasion of Edward Baliol, the young king and queen went to France, where they were kindly received by King Philip (1334), and whence they did not return to Scotland till 1341. After her husband's capture at Neville's Cross (1346), she visited him in his captivity (1348). On his release in 1357, she accompanied him to Scotland, but soon after, being insulted by David's preference for his mistress, Katherine Mortimer, she returned to Edward III's court, and refused to return to her husband even when her rival was murdered in 1360.

John, KING (b. December 24, 1166, s. April 8, 1199, d. October 19, 1216), was the youngest son of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine. He was Henry's favourite son, and destined to receive as his share of his father's empire the lordship of Ireland. But his petulant and arrogant behaviour to the Irish chiefs when, in 1185, he was sent on a visit to Ireland compelled Henry to give up his scheme. Before long John joined his brother Richard in his last revolt against his father, in circumstances of peculiar treachery. Henry's schemes to win for John a rich marriage had proved no less unsuccessful than his Irish plan. But soon after Richard I's accession John's marriage with the heiress of the great Gloucester earldom gave him revenue and position. During Richard's absence on crusade John joined the popular movement for deposing Longchamp, the foreign justiciar, and, in close alliance with

Philip of France, rose in revolt on the news of Richard's captivity. But the administrative system was too strong to be shaken by John's turbulence. The rising was suppressed, and its author very leniently treated by his brother, who did his best to secure his succession in preference to the heir of his elder brother, Geoffrey. In 1199 John became king. His reign marks the collapse of the great power which Henry II had founded; but also shows the beginning of the national English state which emerged from its ruins. The loss of Normandy, the quarrel with Innocent III, and the struggle with the baronage which produced Magna Carta, are the great events of his reign. Philip Augustus promptly deserted his old friend when he became king, and posed as the champion of Arthur of Brittany, whom John was generally believed to have murdered, and as protector of the injured Count of La Marche, whose betrothed wife, Isabella of Angoulême, John had recently married, having divorced his first wife. After a solemn trial John was adjudged to have forfeited his French fiefs. In 1204 Philip conquered Normandy, John making little or no attempt to protect his dominions. Anjou, Maine, and the greater part of the southern fiefs which Eleanor had brought to Henry II, were speedily annexed also. Not until it was too late did John make a vigorous effort to regain them. By that time other difficulties prevented his attempts being successful. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Hubert Walter, had been a great influence for good on John. His death, in 1205, was thus a great loss in itself. But the quarrel of the king and the Canterbury monks, and the imposition of a papal nominee whom neither would accept, led to John's famous contest with Innocent III; the interdict of 1208; the deposition of 1211, and the abject submission of the king when Philip, as executor of the papal decrees, was preparing to invade England. John surrendered his kingdom to Pandulf, the papal representative, and consented to receive it back as a fief of the papacy. Henceforth he was Innocent's ally; but his innumerable tyrannies had raised up enemies in the nation against whom papal support was of little value. The death of the faithful justiciar, Fitz-Peter, in 1213, broke up the civil administration. The last check on John's tyranny was now removed; but with unwonted energy he planned a great expedition for the recovery of Poitou, in conjunction with an alliance with the princes of Lower Germany, who supported his nephew, Otto IV, against Philip. The defeat of Otto at Bouvines, and the want of co-operation of the Poitevins, made both schemes abortive. The refusal of the northern barons of England to serve abroad began the series of events which led to the Great Charter. The papal archbishop, Langton, took up an unexpectedly patriotic attitude. He held up the charter of Henry I to the barons as a good basis for their demands. A great meeting of the nobles at Bury St. Edmunds declared itself against the king. The clergy, the Londoners, the ministerial prelates, in turn deserted John. Abandoned by all but hirelings and foreigners, he was constrained, in 1215 (June 15), to set his seal to Magna Carta. But the support of Innocent III could still be relied upon. Langton was summoned to Rome. The pope annulled the charter. John, with his mercenaries, spread desolation throughout the country. Nothing was left for the barons but to appeal to Philip of France. In 1216 the landing of Louis, the French king's son, with a French army, reduced John to despair. His death at Newark (October 19, 1216) only prevented his deposition.

John was one of the worst of English kings, tyrannical, treacherous, petulant, passionate, infamous in all his private relations, careless of all his public duties. But he was of no mean ability; and had he possessed more persistent energy and stability of purpose, he might have reigned as successfully as his father. As it was, he failed in everything he undertook. The system of government which Henry II had established had survived the neglect of Richard, but broke up under the active tyranny of John. Yet its dissolution left the nation free to work out its own development. The loss of Normandy made the baronage finally English. It was no small benefit to the nation that John's tyranny compelled barons and people, and, despite the pope, the better elements in the Church, to make common cause against John. Magna Carta, although primarily a feudal document, was the result of the first corporate action of the English nation, and proved the foundation of the mediæval constitution. Even the submission to Rome helped on in the next generation the national reaction which John's reign had done so much to stimulate.

Johnston, ARCHIBALD, LORD WARRISTON (1611-63), was a leader of the Covenanters, whose demands he is said to have formulated. He was one of the commissioners at the Pacification of Berwick (1639), and at the Treaty of Ripon (1640) (q.v.). The following year he became a lord of session, and is credited with having suggested the Act of Classes in 1649. Having acted as chairman of Richard Cromwell's Committee of Public Safety, he was condemned in his absence in 1661, and hanged at Edinburgh in July 1663.

Johore. [MALAYA, BRITISH.]

Judge. [JUSTICE.]

Judicature Acts, THE (1873 and 1875) were designed to simplify the British system of judicature. They consolidated into one supreme court of justice the courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, Probate and Divorce and Admiralty, and the Court of Chancery; and divided the supreme court into two parts—the High Court of Justice and the Court of Appeal. All actions henceforth could be heard in the High Court of Justice. The three common-law divisions of the High Court were consolidated in 1880, and the court now consists of a common-law division (called the King's Bench division) and Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty divisions. The Appeal Court consists of the lord chancellor, certain peers who have held high judicial office, and certain lords of appeal in ordinary created under the act of 1873. A Judicature Act of identical character was passed for Ireland in 1877.

Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, King of the West Franks, in 856 was married at the age of thirteen to King Ethelwulf. She is said to have sat by her husband's side on the royal throne, but this apparently means nothing more than that she was recognized as queen, a title which had belonged to no wife of a West Saxon king since the days of Edburga, who was credited with the poisoning of her husband Bertric (802). After Ethelwulf's death she married her stepson Ethelbald (858), and on his decease, in 860, she went back to her father's court, and subsequently took for her third husband Baldwin (Iron-Arm), first Count of Flanders. Her descendant Matilda of Flanders married William the Conqueror and became the ancestress of the kings of mediæval England.

Jumièges, ROBERT OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1051-2), was a Norman who came over to England in the train of Edward the Confessor. He was made Bishop of London early in the reign, and at once came forward as the leader of the French party. His influence over the king was very great. "So high did he stand in the king's estimation, that if he had said a black crow was a white one, the king would sooner have believed the bishop's word than his own eyes." And this influence was exerted to fill every office with Normans, and destroy the national party of which Godwin was the head. The success of Robert's scheme was seen in 1051, when Edward appointed him archbishop, in opposition to the chapter of Canterbury, who had elected one of their own number, Elfric, to the post. The triumph of the Normans seemed secured in that same year by the banishment of Godwin and his sons; but in 1052 they returned, were received with the greatest enthusiasm, and for the time destroyed the influence of their rival. Archbishop Robert was one of the first to flee before the storm, and, in company with the Bishop of Dorchester, he made his way in a crazy fishing-boat to Normandy. The witenagemot, which met almost immediately, deprived Robert of his archbishopric, and outlawed him, and the interposition of the pope in his favour was disregarded. He had to retire to the monastery of Jumièges, where he remained till his death.

Jung Bahadur, SIR (d. 1877), chief minister of Nepal, assisted in the murder of Malabar Singh (1845) and usurped his office in Nepal. He came to the aid of the British during the Indian Mutiny, and was present at the siege of Delhi (1858).

Junius, THE LETTERS OF. The first letter bearing the signature of "Junius" made its appearance in the Public Advertiser for November 21, 1768. But we have the author's own assurance that he had been writing under different names for at least two years previously. It was not, however, till January 21, 1769, that the regular series of political attacks under the title of Junius began with an assault on the characters of the Duke of Grafton and Lord North, in a letter addressed to the former. With reference to the duke we are told that "the finances of a nation sinking under its debts have been committed to a young nobleman already ruined by play"; while Lord North was characterized as "an object of derision to his enemies, and of melancholy pity to his friends." The vacillation and inconsistency of the government were pointed out, and hardly any name mentioned escaped irony or abuse excepting that of Grenville. The military part of this attack drew a reply from Sir William Draper, in which he called upon Junius to ask pardon of "Lord Granby and the whole kingdom for his abominable scandal." Letter followed letter between the two combatants, till on March 18 Junius once more turned his batteries directly against the Duke of Grafton for having pardoned a certain Edward MacQuirk, who had been found guilty of murder. This question is made the prelude to a fierce condemnation of the duke's whole conduct as regards the Wilkes and Luttrell question, his private morals and his political capacity. The prime minister was told, "There is something which distinguishes you not only from all other ministers but from all other men. It is not that you do wrong by design, but that you should never do right by mistake." By the end of May the Duke of Bedford was incidentally brought upon the scene to share in the prime minister's abuse, and towards the end of July Blackstone was directly attacked for his reflections on Grenville. Towards the middle of September Junius addressed his first letter to the Duke of Bedford, the inheritor of a name "glorious till it was yours": and once more Sir W. Draper came forward for the defence. On December 19, 1769, appeared the famous letter to the king, for which the printers and publishers were tried (1770), on which occasion the jury brought in a verdict of "Guilty of publishing only." The conduct of Lord Mansfield on this occasion laid him open to the attacks of the anonymous writer. Indeed, in the first letter to this great lawyer (November 1770), Junius attacked him with peculiar bitterness: "no learned man, even among your own tribe, thinks you qualified to preside in a court of Common Law." In the preceding August (1770) Junius had published his first letter to Lord North, whom he reproached for appointing Colonel Luttrell adjutant-general of the army in Ireland. With the opening of 1771 foreign politics attracted the pen of Junius, but by the middle of the year he had once more directed his attention to the Duke of Grafton, who, says the author, "is the pillow upon which I am determined to rest all my resentments." Then followed the discussion with Horne (July to August 1771). Later in the same year, Lord Mansfield was again attacked for having bailed John Eyre, a Scotsman, and on January 21, 1772, Junius published a letter in proof of his assertion that on this occasion Lord Mansfield had done "that which by law he was not warranted to do." The same paper contained Junius's appeal to Lord Camden, "in the name of the English nation to stand forth in defence of the laws of his country," lest it "should be said that for some months past he had kept too much company with the Duke of Grafton." This letter winds up with the words, "I do not scruple to affirm that in my judgment he (Lord Mansfield) is the very worst and most dangerous man in the kingdom. Thus far I have done my duty in endeavouring to bring him to punishment. But mine is an inferior ministerial office in the temple of justice. I have bound the victim and dragged him to the altar." The last letter to H. S. Woodfall is dated May 10, 1772.

The question of the authorship of these letters is one which has severely taxed the critical ingenuity of the last hundred years. Hardly a single prominent statesman of the time who was not himself directly attacked by Junius has lacked champions to assert his claim to their production. Lord George Sackville, Barré, Grattan, Burke, Lord Loughborough, Gibbon, Lord Chatham, William Mason, Lord Temple, and many others, have all had their supporters; but none of their pretensions can be considered as valid. The weight of inferential evidence seems to point towards Sir Philip Francis (q.v.), and it is certain that he was not unwilling to be considered as Junius, though he never admitted the claim in words. The test of handwriting seems to tend in the same direction. But if he were the author, it must be allowed that however much this distinction may add to his intellectual reputation, it takes away from his moral character; for he seems to have been receiving favours from, and living on intimate terms with, many of those whom he assailed most fiercely. The most, however, that can be said in favour of the view that he was the writer is that he is the least unlikely of the most prominent candidates.

Junius's "Letters" have been frequently republished. For the controversy on their authorship Jury, THE, in modern English juridical usage, is a body of laymen, generally twelve in number, chosen by lot to ascertain, with the assistance and guidance of the judge, questions of fact only, proved before them by evidence. They are bound by oath (hence their name) to discharge their duties properly. Unanimity is generally required of them. Juries are used both in criminal and civil cases. In the former the Grand Jury presents offenders against whom there is a prima facie case, to be tried before the judge and the Petty Jury. In the latter a distinction is drawn between the Special Jury and the Common Jury, the property qualification of the special juror being higher. There is also a Coroner's Jury, on whose finding persons may be brought to trial at the assizes.

Of the origin of juries every conceivable theory has been held. It was once almost an article of constitutional faith that they were invented by King Alfred, Welsh antiquaries adding at the suggestion of Asser, who had experienced the benefits of the system in Wales. Many have stoutly maintained the exclusively English origin of this typical English institution. Northern archaeologists have argued that it was brought ready-made by the Danes to England; others that it came over with William the Conqueror. The canon law, the Roman law, the customs of the early Slavs copied by their Saxon neighbours, have also had the jury fastened upon them. Even wilder is the hypothesis of its Eastern origin, and introduction into Europe by the Crusaders. The truth seems to be that the jury is a specialized development under favourable conditions of a tendency common to all the Teutonic peoples, if not to many other Aryan tribes as well. In its modern form it is hardly older than the reign of Henry II, and in many important features not so old as that. But in its broader aspect the jury simply carries on the popular judicial courts of the old German polity. It is the latest survival of the time when the law courts were the courts of the people, when the mass of the suitors were judges, witnesses, and jurors in one. It is in this sense only that the twelve assessors of the presiding officer in the shire and hundred-moot (the rachimburgi, or scabini, of the Franks), or the twelve compurgators whose testimony, added to that of their principal, was regarded as conclusive, or the sworn witnesses who represented, as it were, common fame, can be regarded as progenitors of the jury system; in strictness they were not. They shared with the jury a common representative character. Like them they were bound by oath, and were commonly of the sacred number of twelve. But the specific function of judging on matters of fact was not yet differentiated from the other elements of judicial proceedings. Only in one of the laws of Ethelred II—which refers to a committee of twelve thegns in the shire-moot, who take oath to accuse no man falsely—do we find any real analogy to the later jury; and this remarkable anticipation of the “jury of presentment” stands so much by itself that it is unsafe to generalize from such scanty data. Thus we can find no real juries among the English before the Conquest. Still less can the analogous Nämd of Sweden, or the other Scandinavian tribunals of the same sort, be regarded as parents of an institution which has only collateral affinity to them. But soon after the Norman Conquest the system of inquest by sworn recognitors, representative of the popular courts, was introduced into England by the invaders. This system may have been borrowed from the Theodosian Code by the Carolingian emperors. The Frankish Capitularies contain numerous instructions to the royal Missi to inquire into various fiscal and judicial rights of the Crown by the oath of the trustworthy men of the neighbourhood, whose evidence was regarded as the embodiment of the witness of the community, which in early times was the ultimate evidence of rights. This system survived the fall of the Carolings, and was still frequently used, both in France generally and Normandy in particular, at the time of the Conquest. There was every reason why William I and his ministers should introduce this practice into England. Anxious to rule according to ancient precedent, and ignorant of the old customs of the country, they found these Inquisitiones of unique value in giving them trustworthy information. The immense mass of antiquarian knowledge collected in the Domesday Survey was obtained by inquests of the royal officials before representatives of the popular courts. It was a slight step in advance to allow the means so useful in ascertaining the rights of the Crown to be employed in ascertaining the rights of the subject. Both for royal and private purposes, mostly for fiscal, but also for judicial objects, Henry I developed the system still further. But it was Henry II who gave to the system a political and judicial importance it never had before. He made it part of the ordinary judicial machinery. He applied it to all sorts of civil and criminal suits. So far as great institutions can be the work of individuals, he is the founder of the English system of trial by jury.

The Conquest had made trial by battle the ordinary means of settling disputes about freeholds. Henry II, in the Grand Assize (q.v.), gave suitors, as an alternative, the use of the inquest. A jury of twelve knights of the county, chosen by four knights electors, were summoned by the sheriff to appear before the king or his judges to give evidence. Again, the Constitutions of Clarendon (q.v.) enjoined cases of dispute as to lay or clerical tenure to be settled by the recognition by twelve sworn men; and the three assizes of Mort d'Ancestor, Novel Disseisin, and Darrein Presentment (q.v.) were accomplished by the same means. In criminal cases the precedents of the law of Ethelred, of the “juratores” of the shire mentioned in Henry I's Pipe Roll, and of the criminal jury of the sixth article of the Constitutions of Clarendon, were developed into the system of trial prescribed by the assizes of Clarendon and Northampton. By the former measure inquiry was ordered to be made through every shire and hundred by twelve lawful men of each hundred, and four of each township, upon oath, for all suspected criminals. When the royal justices came round on their journeys the above-mentioned jury was to present the suspected offenders to them in the county court, where they were to be tried by the ordeal. But the development of juridical science led, first, to the minimizing of the ordeal, so that the presentment became the important thing, and, next, to its abolition by the Lateran Council of 1215. Even before this an alternative to the ordeal was sometimes found in a second jury, empanelled to investigate further the truth of the presentment. After 1215 this became the universal method of procedure. The Grand Jury presented criminals. The trial, strictly speaking, was before the Petty Jury, as this second jury was soon called. This is still the case, though the establishment of elaborate magisterial investigations has tended to reverse the original importance of the two bodies.

Juries thus established were almost peculiar to England. The Frankish inquest was never developed to further consequences in its own home. The imperfect juries of the mediæval continent were almost entirely the result of the reflex action of the English juries. The modern continental jury is avowedly borrowed. Thus, Freeman could claim with reason that the jury is a native English growth, despite its filial relation to the Frankish inquest.

The juries of the thirteenth century differed in many important respects from modern juries. They were still largely witnesses. The jury of the Grand Assize, for example, was chosen from those practically cognizant of the facts of the particular case. Even when it was found impossible to summon only witnesses as jurors, it was long before the advancement of juridical science limited their functions to deciding on evidence laid before them. It was long before the jury was free from judicial censure if its verdict was disliked by the judge. Not before the Revolution of 1688 could the jury have in a political case be said to have acquired full freedom. Not before Fox's Libel Act did it acquire real power of deciding on the whole facts of one important branch of trials. The political importance of trial by jury is very considerable in English history. Though a mere administrative expedient in its origin, the fact that the county jury was a systematic representation of the shire community, selected to treat with the king or his representative, was a step of the greatest importance in the development of our representative institutions. [PARLIAMENT.] The great principle of trial by peers was embodied in Magna Carta; and, in time, the jury system came to be regarded as the greatest safeguard against arbitrary imprisonment, and the greatest guarantee of a fair trial, and of the personal liberty of the subject. A venal or time-serving judge—dependent for his position on royal favour—could only be checked by some such means. In political trials, even of the eighteenth century, without trial by jury it would have fared badly with an enemy of the government. Even now that the impartiality of the judges is thoroughly established, the jury system, though shorn of its original importance, and limited in its operation by the tendencies of legal reform, still keeps its own function in our judicial system.

Justice, or Judge. In the old English popular courts the whole body of suitors acted as judges. The sheriff, or hundreds-caldor, was simply their chairman, or moderator; and the judicial committee of twelve thegns were the assessors of the sheriff. The feudal jurisdiction of the landric, the supreme jurisdiction of the king, invested lords of soken and monarchs with some of the attributes of the later judge. But the real differentiation of the office of judge took place subsequently to the Norman Conquest, and was due to the development of the study of jurisprudence, the increasing specialization of the whole system of government, the organization on an extended basis of the royal jurisdiction and its connexion with the headless popular judicature, through the jury, by the Norman and Angevin kings. These circumstances necessitated the employment of a large judicial staff, which, if not strictly confined, after the precedents of later times, to its juridical business, and if equally employed by the king on fiscal and administrative duties, was sufficiently occupied with legal work to obtain from it its most common appellation. During the eleventh century the word justitia began to be used in a sense which included the persons charged with the administration of the law, as well as to indicate the abstract principles on which the law was based. The justice, or judge, received his name from the justice which he declared. The so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor speak of the sheriffs as justices; John of Salisbury gives them the same title, and the Assize of Clarendon couples them with the justices in the stricter sense. But it is possible that this title belonged specially to the sheriffs as transacting special business under the king's writ. In Henry I's Charter and Laws, and in some other instances, the term seems to include all landlords possessing courts of their own, or all suitors qualified to act as "judices" in the shire-moot. But the title became gradually further limited, until it was ultimately used to indicate (1) the president, or chief officer of the Curia Regis, (2) all the members of the same court.

The chief minister of the Norman and Angevin kings was styled the justitia, or sometimes the justitiarius, or capitalis, or summus justitia. His office, obscure in origin, and perhaps developed from the Norman seneschalship through the regents of William I during his absences on the continent, acquired great importance under Ranulf Flambard, who assumed the name, if not the functions, of the later justiciar. Under Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, the great minister of Henry I, and the practical founder of his administrative system, both the name and functions of the office became more strictly defined. Until the middle of the reign of Henry III a long and scarcely interrupted series of chief justiciars acted as permanent prime ministers, as representatives of the monarch in all relations of state, as regents during the king's absence, as royal deputies even in his presence, as presidents of the judicial system which centred in the Curia Regis, and as presidents of the fiscal system which centred in the exchequer. A similar need produced analogous offices in half the kingdoms of Europe. In Aragon and Naples the correspondence extended even to the name of justitia. So long as the feudal spirit remained strong, the holders of the office were bishops, unable to found a legal family; but the triumph of Henry II over the feudal separatists rendered it safe to appoint baronial justiciars. The development of the power of the chancellor, the break-up of the bureaucratic system of the Angevins and the development of a constitution in which a permanent prime minister found no place, led to a gradual change in the functions of the justiciar during the thirteenth century. His political functions gradually disappeared, while the increasing specialization of our legal system gave to his functions as president of the chief court of justice a new importance. Hubert de Burgh was the last great political justiciar. His successor, Stephen Segrave (q.v.), was simply a good lawyer. He began the process of change which was completed before the end of the century. The capitalis justitia of Henry II becomes the lord chief justice of Edward I.

The title of justice was, however, never confined to the justiciar. Even during the administration of Roger of Salisbury the title is frequently conferred on other members of the Curia Regis. In the "Dialogus de Scaccario" (q.v.) it is their official designation, although the same individuals sat in the exchequer with the title of barons. Henry II made his grandfather's system of judicial visitations a permanent part of the legal system of the country. As representatives of the sovereign, the justices of the Curia Regis systematically perambulated the country and tried the offenders presented to them by the grand juries elected by the shire-moot, held inquiries into freehold suits under the Grand Assize, transacted proceedings under the three assizes of Mort d'Ancestor, Darrein Presentment, and Novel Disseisin (q.v.), besides acting as fiscal and executive officers of the Crown. But the judicial aspect of the justice gradually became more important. In 1178 the court of King's Bench was cut off from the Curia Regis in its larger aspect, and the clause of Magna Carta that Common Pleas should no longer follow the Crown, but be held in some fixed place, led to the further differentiation of the court of Common Pleas, which sat constantly at Westminster, from the court of King's Bench, now entirely devoted to judicial business. Meanwhile the old financial system which had centred in the Exchequer became obsolete, and the barons of the Exchequer, deprived of most of their fiscal business, became almost as much simple judges as the justices of the King's Bench or Common Pleas. The process of differentiation had already gone so far that each of the three courts had a separate staff of officials. As has been shown, the justiciar became Chief Justice, and, as he retained a special relation to the King's Bench, a similar official of less dignity presided over the Common Pleas. Meanwhile Edward I defined and completed what Henry II had established. The justices itinerant of Henry II became the justices of assize of Edward I. The various commissions under which they sat at Westminster or went on circuits were systematized and enlarged. Instead of the separate Iters for different purposes, the justices were sent out at regular intervals on a fivefold mission—as Justices of the Peace, of Oyer and Terminer, of Jail Delivery, of Assize, and of Nisi Prius (q.v.). Their functions and positions were hardly changed until recent legislation consolidated the three courts, and superseded by justices the barons of the Exchequer. The title of Justice is given by recent Judicature Acts to all judges of the Supreme Court. In the High Court of Justice, into which the three old courts have been merged, they are called "Mr. Justice," and their head is the "Lord Chief Justice of England," the titles of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and Lord Chief Baron having been abolished. In the Court of Appeal the judges are styled "Lord Justice." The title of Lord Justice had in previous times been often given to persons invested with extraordinary judicial commissions, such as, for example, the government of Ireland during the absence or vacancy of the lord-lieutenant, or the commissions of regency that sometimes governed the country during the absences of William III and the Hanoverian monarchs on the continent. Besides the justices of the English courts, there were special justices for Durham, Chester, the Isle of Ely, and similar Palatine jurisdictions.

In a lower sphere the title of "justice" has long been given to the inferior magistrates of the first instance. The "custodes pacis," or "conservatores pacis," which it became usual for the king to nominate during the thirteenth century (e.g., Henry III's writ in 1233, and Edward I's Statute of Winchester), received, by an act of Edward III, both power to try felonies, and the more honourable designation of justice of the peace. "The whole Christian world hath not the like office as justice of the peace, if duly executed," was the opinion of Lord Coke, and despite the obvious objections to lay tribunals, drawn from a limited class, the system still remains, except in a few populous places where stipendiary magistrates with legal training have been appointed. The justices of the peace are appointed by a special commission under the great seal to keep the peace within the limits of the county in which they are appointed to act. The property qualification for the office is £100 a year in land. They exercise jurisdiction either individually or in petty sessions of the justices of a limited district, or in quarter sessions of the justices of the whole county. The latter body still combines with its judicial work administrative and fiscal business in a way that recalls the justices of the reign of Henry I.

Justus, SAINT, Archbishop of Canterbury (624-7), was one of the monks who were sent by Gregory, in 601, to join the mission at Canterbury. In 604 he was made Bishop of Rochester. On the death of Ethelbert, and the relapse of Kent into idolatry, fearing persecution, he fled to France (617), but soon returned and resumed the charge of his see. In 624 he became Archbishop of Canterbury in succession to Mellitus. The great event of his short occupancy of this see was the extension of the Kentish mission to Northumbria.

Jutes, THE. There are three questions of interest connected with this tribe, which is generally considered to have been the first people of Teutonic blood to settle in Britain after the withdrawal of the Roman legions, viz., the date of their arrival, the place of their origin, and the area of their settlement. The date to which their arrival is traditionally assigned is that given by the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" and by Florence of Worcester, viz., 449-50. Both of these authorities probably based their computation upon the words of Bæda ("Hist. Eccles." i, 15), but both clearly misread his meaning. He merely states that the invasion occurred during the joint rule of the Emperors Marcianus and Valentinian, i.e. between 449 and 455. Such testimony as is afforded by the Celtic chroniclers Gildas and Nennius seems to point in the same direction as that of the Teutonic authorities, and to confirm the view that it was about the middle of the fifth century that the transition from plundering raids to conquest for purposes of settlement took place. The next question that arises is as to the original seat and the race of the Jutish invaders. Bæda speaks of them as coming originally from a district lying north of the country of the Angles. The passage has generally been interpreted as locating the Jutes in Jutland, which, it is held, still preserves the old root in its modern name. In recent years, however, there has been much critical examination of the literary sources for the Anglo-Saxon conquest in the light of philological and archaeological research; and in regard to the origin of the Jutes neither philology nor archaeology gives any support to Bæda. The Kentish dialects have been shown to bear a closer relationship to Frisian than to any other of their continental relatives; while archaeologists have demonstrated the remarkable affinities which exist between the culture of the Kentish settlers, as revealed by their early burials, and the culture of the Frankish cemeteries of the lower Rhine valley. Those, therefore, who are reluctant to reject entirely any statement made by Bæda have been forced to conclude either that the Jutes reached Kent only after a preliminary sojourn in the Rhine district, or that the invaders were a composite body consisting of Jutes from Jutland with a considerable admixture of Ripuarian Franks. Lastly we have to consider the area of the Jutish settlements in Britain. Here the various sources of information are in agreement; and archaeological evidence bears out the statement of Bæda that the Jutes originally occupied not only Kent, but the Isle of Wight and a part of the mainland opposite. These outlying settlements were subsequently conquered and absorbed by Wessex. [HENGEST; HORSIA; ENGLISH CONQUEST; KENT.]

Jutland, BATTLE OF (May 31, 1916), was fought in the North Sea during the Great War, between the British Grand Fleet under Admiral Jellicoe and the German High Seas Fleet under Admiral Scheer. This was the only battle of the war in which the two fleets met. The British intention was to force an action on the German fleet and destroy it; the intention of the German fleet was to avoid an action altogether until certain of success. The forces engaged were (a) British—37 capital ships, 34 cruisers, and 80 destroyers; (b) German—27 capital ships, 11 cruisers, and 63 destroyers.

Of these the British lost 14 vessels and 6,274 men, and the Germans 11 vessels and 2,545 men. Scheer's plan was to entice the British fleet into open sea by means of Von Hipper's scouting forces, and to dispatch it by a submarine attack. On news of this reaching the British Naval Intelligence Department on May 30, the Grand Fleet was ordered to sea. The battle began with a cruiser action between Von Hipper and the Rosyth force under Beatty. Seeing that Beatty's intention was to cut off his retreat, Hipper steamed south-eastwards to lure the British on towards the High Seas Fleet, which was at last sighted at 4.43 p.m. Beatty hereupon warned Jellicoe by wireless, and turned northwards to entice the German Fleet towards the British Grand Fleet. The fleets met and the main action began at 5.40 p.m. The British, deploying in the form of a letter L, threatened to envelop the whole of the High Seas Fleet in a trap from which it could not escape. Scheer therefore contrived to retreat under cover of a smoke screen (6.35 p.m.). Jellicoe had turned south-east to cut him off from the German coast, when he suddenly reappeared out of the mist and ran full into the Grand Fleet once more, having miscalculated his distance. He had hoped to pass astern of the British and make off eastwards. Thus the main fleets engaged a second time, until Scheer repeated his tactics and retired behind a smoke screen and a terrific destroyer attack (7.20 p.m.). By now darkness was gathering fast, as he headed north for the Horn Reefs, one of his three possible lines of retreat. The rest of the battle consisted in sudden encounters whenever rival vessels sighted one another. Jellicoe, misled by the conflicting information telegraphed by the admiralty as to Scheer's direction (picked up from Scheer's own wireless orders) and by Commodore Goodenough, who was actually engaging the enemy elsewhere, did not concentrate his forces towards the Horn Reefs, nor indeed turn north until 2.39 a.m., shortly before dawn. The German Fleet escaped back to port, where, save for one excursion in August 1916, it remained until its surrender at the close of the War.

Juxon, WILLIAM (1582–1663), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Chichester and educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford. He succeeded Laud, in 1621, as master of St. John's. In 1632 he became also, by Laud's recommendation, clerk of the king's closet, and, in the following year, dean of the Chapel Royal, Bishop of Hereford, and, by his translation before being consecrated to that see, Bishop of London. By the same influence he was appointed in 1635 lord high treasurer, which office he held till 1641. When the king sought advice from several of the bishops whether to consent to the bill for Strafford's attainder or not, Juxon honestly advised him that he ought not to consent if he were not personally satisfied of Strafford's guilt. Again, in 1648, he advised the king on the questions of conscience which arose with reference to the Treaty of Newport (q.v.) and in the following January attended him during his trial. During the Commonwealth the bishop lived in retirement in Gloucestershire, occupied in study and hunting. At the Restoration his attendance on the king's last moments marked him out for promotion to the archbishopric of Canterbury (September 1660). But his age and his health prevented him from taking an important part either in the Savoy Conference or in the memorable meeting of convocation which followed.

Kabul. [AFGHAN WARS.]

Kafir Wars, THE, were spasmodic attempts on the part of the Colonial government to adjust the north-eastern boundaries of Cape Colony against the inevitable encroachment of the Kafirs caused by the movement of the Bantu races southwards and the British expansion northwards. The only natural boundaries were rivers which, in South Africa, were not sufficient to prevent actual friction. The border Kafirs had to be absorbed within either the British or the native frontiers. The first of the five Kafir Wars broke out in 1811 and ended with 20,000 Kosas being expelled beyond the Great Fish River. After the war of 1818-19 this boundary was extended to the Keiskamma River, but without hope of a permanent settlement owing to the loose political bonds of allegiance held by Gaika, with whom the agreement had been made. In 1834 Makoma and Tyali organized a surprise raid which Sir Harry Smith repulsed. Kafraria was invaded in its turn and Durban annexed right up to the Kei River, transplanting 17,000 Fingoes to the land between the Fish and the Keiskamma Rivers. European officers were to act as native advisers, and missionary enterprise was encouraged. In 1835, however, Glenelg reversed his predecessor's policy and retired to the Keiskamma, while the territory between that and the Fish River were reserves for Kafirs, and separate treaties were made with the chiefs. In 1846 Krel's invasion was repelled and Sir H. Smith annexed Kafraria right up to the Keiskamma River, while the land between that and the Kei River was made into a separate Crown Colony known as British Kafraria. From 1850 to 1853 war was waged against Sandilli and Krel, and Cathcart initiated a Roman frontier policy of making the frontier natives settlers. In 1854 Grey attempted to make the chiefs responsible for internal order by making them justices of the peace. In 1857 the natives were roused by a seer who promised victory, and the Galekas virtually committed suicide by destroying their own corn and cattle. Peace, however, was preserved and their self-depopulation relieved the pressure in British Kafraria, which was annexed to the Cape in 1865. In 1878 Sir Bartle Frere (q.v.) annexed the territory of Krel, who had risen unsuccessfully.

Kaiser Wilhelmland was the original name of what is now the mandated territory of New Guinea (q.v.), administered by the Commonwealth of Australia.

Kalat (1), in the Ghilzai country of Afghanistan, was taken possession of by Shere Ali in 1865. In 1878 it was captured, during the second Afghan War, by Sir Donald Stewart. It was evacuated, and restored to Abdur Rahman, the Amir of Afghanistan, in 1880. (2) Capital of Baluchistan; its khan has been subordinate to England since 1854.

Kalpy, THE SIEGE OF (1858), occurred during the Indian Mutiny. On May 19, 1858, Sir Hugh Rose laid siege to the town from the north. On the 20th the rebel army made a spirited sally, but was driven back; and again on the 22nd. On the morning of the 23rd Sir Hugh Rose's troops advanced to assault the town in two columns. But they encountered no resistance, for the enemy had fled, and the whole rebel arsenal, including 50 guns, fell into the hands of the British.

Kalunga, THE SIEGE OF (October 1814). On the outbreak of the Gurkha War in 1814, General Gillespie advanced into the Dhoon valley, and coming upon the fortified position of Kalunga, summoned the Gurkha chief, Bulbuddur Singh, to surrender, and stormed the fort on his refusal. His men were staggered by a murderous fire, and Gillespie shot through the heart. A retreat was immediately sounded; but not before twenty officers and 240 men were killed and wounded. A month was lost in waiting for heavy ordnance from Delhi. On November 27 the breach was reported practicable, and a second unsuccessful assault was made. But after three days' incessant shelling, the Gurkhas sallied forth and escaped. [GURKHA WAR.]

Kandy Wars, THE. Whilst Ceylon was under the rule of the Portuguese and Dutch the Kandyan territories in the interior of the island had remained unconquered, although a kind of desultory warfare between the natives and the Europeans was kept up. In 1799 and 1800 Frederick North (later 5th Earl of Guilford), the governor of Ceylon, endeavoured to induce the King of Kandy to put himself under British protection. These negotiations, however, failed, and in 1803 North, having received an accession of power by the separation of the government of Ceylon from that of Madras, at once invaded the Kandyan territories at the head of a force of 3,000 men. The British authority was formally established in 1815.

Kars, THE SIEGE OF (1855). At the outbreak of the Crimean War, Colonel Fenwick Williams was sent to Asiatic Turkey to organize the Turkish army against the Russian invaders. On the approach of the Russians under Mouraviev, he hastened to Kars, which he provisioned for four months, and prepared to defend to the last. Mouraviev arrived before Kars in August, with an army of 50,000 men, a portion of which was detached to watch Erzerum. In order to get rid of as many useless mouths as possible, Williams directed the Turkish cavalry to cut their way through the Russian army, a feat which they performed, though with some loss. On the morning of September 29 the Russians made a grand attack, but were met with such a stubborn resistance that they were forced to retire, with a loss of 5,000 men. Williams did his best while provisions lasted, but there was no possible hope of relief or assistance, and on November 24 he sent Captain Teesdale with a flag of truce to Mouraviev. The Russians displayed great generosity, and granted terms which could be accepted without loss of honour (November 28).

Katharine of Aragon, QUEEN, first wife of Henry VIII (1485-1536), was the youngest of the four daughters of Ferdinand, King of Aragon, and Isabella, Queen of Castile. The foreign policy of Henry VII was based on a renewal and development of the traditional mediæval alliance between England and the Spanish kingdoms. Hence, as early as 1488 a treaty was made between the two monarchs to cement their friendship by intermarriage. In 1498 Arthur, the eldest son of Henry VII, was contracted to Katharine by proxy, and in 1501, when Arthur was fifteen years old, Katharine was sent to England. The marriage was then celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral; but five months afterwards Arthur died. It was agreed that Katharine should be married to Henry, Arthur's younger brother. A papal dispensation was obtained to legalize such a marriage, and a contract of marriage was made. When Henry VIII ascended the throne in 1509 his first act was to marry Katharine. He was then eighteen years old, and she was twenty-four. Katharine was not handsome, but she was lively, of an amiable disposition, well-informed, and devoted to her husband. Her married life was at first happy. But of her several children all died in infancy except Mary. She ceased to bear children, and showed the effects of advancing years much more than did Henry VIII. She had lost Henry's affections, but still retained his esteem, when Anne Boleyn appeared upon the scene. With the growth of the king's attachment to Anne scruples about the validity of his marriage with Katharine arose in his mind.

In 1527 these scruples went so far that he consulted with Cardinal Wolsey how to obtain a divorce. Throughout the complicated negotiations for that purpose Katharine, alone and friendless as she was, preserved a firm and dignified attitude. She was submissive to Henry's will on all small points, but refused to make any admissions which might facilitate a divorce. She stood upon the justice of her cause, and, though Wolsey and the papal nuncio, Campeggio, plied her in every way, she remained firm. On June 18, 1529, she and the king appeared before the legate at Windsor. Katharine refused to admit the jurisdiction of the court, saying she had appealed to Rome. The pope, Clement VII, being in the power of the Emperor Charles V, who was Katharine's nephew, was driven to receive the appeal and advocate the case to Rome. Wolsey had failed, and his disgrace followed. Still Henry patiently pursued his object of obtaining a divorce from Rome; as this became more improbable, he attempted to intimidate the pope. In 1531 Katharine was ordered to leave Windsor; she retired to Ampthill, and was no longer treated as queen. She still remained firm in her position that she was the king's wife by lawful marriage, and "would so abide till the court of Rome shall have made thereof an end." But Henry VIII made an end his own way. On March 30, 1533, Cranmer was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He cited Katharine to appear before him at Dunstable. Katharine paid no heed to his citation, and was pronounced contumacious. On May 23 Cranmer gave his decision that the marriage was null and void from the beginning, as contracted in defiance of the divine prohibition. From this time Katharine was styled in England the Dowager Princess of Wales. At Easter, 1534, Pope Clement VII pronounced Henry's marriage with Katharine to be lawful, and ordered the king to take back his legitimate wife. Henry VIII replied by an act of parliament declaring the marriage unlawful, and making it treason to question the lawfulness of his marriage with Anne Boleyn. Katharine lived in retirement in one of the royal manors. Henry VIII did not cease to endeavour to procure from her submission to his will, but she constantly asserted the lawfulness of her marriage. She died at Kimbolton in January 1536, and on her death-bed wrote Henry a letter assuring him of her forgiveness, and commending to his care their daughter Mary. By Henry's orders she was buried with becoming pomp in the abbey church of Peterborough, which was soon after erected into a cathedral.

Keane, JOHN, 1ST LORD (1781-1844), entered the army in 1793, and served in Egypt, the Mediterranean, and Martinique, down to the year 1809. Having reached the rank of lieutenant-colonel, he commanded a brigade in the third division from 1813 until the end of the Peninsular War. In 1814 he was made major-general, and served through the American War. He passed eight years in Jamaica as commander-in-chief, from 1823 to 1830, and for a year and a half of the time he administered the civil government also. In 1833 he went to India as commander-in-chief at Bombay. Five years later (1838), he received orders from the government of India to organize and lead a force intended to co-operate with the Sind army, on the north-west frontier, at the outbreak of the Afghan War; and in December he assumed the command of the combined forces. The British troops entered Ghazni and restored Shah Shuja to the throne of Afghanistan, while Dost Mohammed fled across the Oxus. For his services in this expedition Keane was raised to the peerage (1839).

Kells, THE COUNCIL OF, was held in 1152 by Eugenius III's legate, Cardinal Paparo, who brought with him the pallia for the archbishops of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam. The influence of St. Malachy was prominent at this synod, and, anticipating the action of the synod at Cashel, it condemned the marriage of the clergy, and perhaps even imposed tithes. It marked a stage in the triumph in Ireland of the Hildebrandine and Cluniac reform movement.

Kemp, JOHN (1380 ?-1454), Archbishop of Canterbury, was descended from a good Kentish family, and, after holding various minor preferments, was in 1419 appointed Bishop of Rochester, from which see he was soon translated first to Chichester, and then, after a few months, to London (1421). He was one of the council of regency during Henry VI's minority, and in 1426 was made chancellor, and in the same year raised to the archbishopric of York. He was a supporter of Cardinal Beaufort against Gloucester, and in 1432 had to resign the great seal. After this he seems for some years to have taken no very prominent part in English politics, although he retained his place on the council and was much occupied with diplomatic business; but in 1450 he was again appointed chancellor, and continued to hold the seal till his death. Two years later he was raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury, and in the same year was made cardinal-bishop, having already been created cardinal-priest in 1439. He displayed great firmness and prudence in dealing with Jack Cade and his followers, and by his wisdom and moderation kept the rivalry between the Dukes of York and Somerset within bounds during his lifetime.

Ken, THOMAS (1637-1711), Bishop of Bath and Wells, was born at Berkhamstead and educated at Winchester and Oxford. About the year 1679 he became chaplain to the Princess Mary, wife of William II of Orange, and afterwards to Lord Dartmouth, at Tangier. Later he was appointed chaplain to Charles II, whom he attended on his death-bed, and who seems to have admired the spirit of a man who dared to refuse Eleanor Gwyn permission to lodge in his prebend's house at Winchester. He was appointed Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1685. After the western rebellion he visited Monmouth in prison, and was the protector of the unhappy victims of that commotion. Ken was one of the "Seven Bishops" tried for petitioning against the Declaration of Indulgence in 1688. Despite his conduct on this occasion he refused to take the oaths to William and Mary, and consequently lost his bishopric in 1691. Queen Anne in 1702 vainly offered to restore him. He died of paralysis in 1711.

Kendal, ERMENGARD MELUSINA VON DER SCHULENBERG, DUCHESS OF (1667-1743). [SCHULENBERG.]

Kenilworth Castle, four miles from Warwick, was granted by Henry III to Simon de Montfort, and on his rebellion was retaken in 1266, after a siege of six months, at which time the famous "Dictum de Kenilworth" was drawn up under its walls. In 1327 it was the scene of the imprisonment of Edward II at the time of his deposition, and subsequently came into the hands of John of Gaunt. It was granted by Elizabeth to Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, who gave there a magnificent entertainment to the queen in 1575.

Kenilworth, DICTUM DE, THE (1266), embodied the terms offered by Henry III to the remnant of the baronial party, who after the battle of Evesham shut themselves up in Kenilworth Castle, where, after a siege of several months, they capitulated (December 1266). The document, which received the approval of a parliament summoned to Northampton, declared the plenitude of the king's authority, and annulled the acts of de Montfort. It provided that the liberties of the Church and the charters should be maintained; that all persons, with the exception of the de Montforts and a few others, might compound for their offences and redeem their lands with a fine; and that all who submitted within forty days should be pardoned. At the same time all persons were forbidden to circulate vain and foolish stories of miracles regarding Simon de Montfort, or to repute him a saint and a martyr. The Dictum was accepted by the barons, except a few who held out in the Isle of Ely; and even these, when they submitted in 1267, were allowed the same terms as those who had yielded in the preceding year.

Kennedy, JAMES, Bishop of St. Andrews (1406 ?-65), a relative of James II of Scotland, took a leading part in Scottish politics during the minority of the king, and acted as mediator between the various noble factions. During the first part of the minority of James III, Kennedy was the virtual governor of the kingdom, of which he proved himself an able and conscientious guardian. He was the first ecclesiastic who held high political power in Scotland, and so to some extent marks the dawn of a new era.

Kenneth I, THE HARDY (d. 860), was the son of Alpin, King of the Scots, whom he succeeded (probably only in Galloway) in 834. He does not seem to have obtained Dalriada proper till some years later. In 841 he expelled the Danish pirates from Pictish territory, and in 846 finally established himself on the Pictish throne, thus being the first to incorporate the two kingdoms. In 851 Kenneth built a church at Dunkeld, which he endowed richly, and to which he removed part of the relics of St. Columba. He transferred the chief seat of his government from Dalriada to Seone. He was a man of warlike character, and six times invaded Lothian, burning Dunbar and Melrose. His family consisted of two sons—Constantine and Aedh—and three daughters, married respectively to Run, King of the Britons of Strathclyde, to Olaf, King of Dublin, and to Aedh Finliath, King of Ireland.

Kenneth II, the son of Malcolm, obtained the crown of Alban, in succession to Colin, 971. His first act was to invade Strathclyde, and to fortify the fords of the Forth against the Britons; his next to invade Northumbria, whose earl he appears to have carried off captive. The events of this reign are exceedingly obscure; it is probable, however, that Kenneth gained a great victory over the Danes at Luncarty, near Perth, and that he was slain at Fettercairn, in Kincardineshire (995), by Fenvella, daughter of the mormaer of Angus, in revenge for the murder of her son by the king. The story of the English chroniclers that King Edgar ceded Lothian to Kenneth to be held as a fief of the English crown is without adequate foundation.

Kenneth III, THE GRIM, son of Duff, succeeded Constantine IV as King of Alban, 997. In 1000 he was engaged in warfare with Ethelred of England. He was killed in battle in Strathearn, 1005 (?), perhaps by his cousin Malcolm, who succeeded him as Malcolm II.

Kent, PEERAGE OF. Bishop Odo of Bayeux is usually regarded as the 1st Earl of Kent (1067–88) and is described by Ordericus Vitalis as “palatinus Cantiae consul”; but the precise nature of his jurisdiction is doubtful. He had no successor, for the attempt of his nephew, William of Mortain, to claim the earldom at his death was unsuccessful. It is sometimes asserted that William of Ypres received a grant of the earldom from Stephen in 1141, but the statement is without foundation. Hubert de Burgh was created Earl of Kent in 1227, but does not appear to have transmitted the title to his heir. In 1321 King Edward I granted the earldom to his younger son, Edmund of Woodstock, who, however, was attainted in 1330. In the following year the title was restored to his son Edmund, who died, as did his younger brother, childless. The earldom was then inherited by their sister Joan (the “Fair Maid of Kent”), who married Sir Thomas Holland, with whose descendants the earldom remained. His grandson, Thomas, was created Duke of Surrey (1397). In spite of the latter’s execution as a traitor in 1400, his son Edmund received his lands, and sat in parliament as Earl of Kent. On his death without issue (1408) the title became extinct. It seems to have been revived in favour of William Neville, Lord Fauconberg, about 1461; but he also died childless, and the earldom was granted in 1465 to Edmund Grey, 4th Baron de Ruthin, in whose family it remained until 1740. Henry, the 12th and last earl of this creation, was raised to a marquise of the same style in 1706 and to a dukedom in 1710. The title of Duke of Kent was revived for Edward, fourth son of George III (and father of Queen Victoria), who died without male issue in 1820.

Kent, KINGDOM OF, took its name from the Celtic tribe of the Cantii—whom Cæsar found inhabiting this part of our island. Tradition has recorded that in the year 449 “Hengest and Horsa, invited by Vortigern, King of the Britons, sought Britain.” After the battle of Crayford, in 457, we read that “the Britons then forsook Kent, and fled in terror to London.” Kent was, then, the first Teutonic kingdom to be established in England, and it appears to have been settled wholly or mainly by the Jutes, who also gained possession of the Isle of Wight. It has been suggested that there were two Jutish kingdoms founded in Kent, the memory of which was in later times preserved by the division of the realm into two sees, with Canterbury and Rochester respectively as seats for the “bishop’s stool.” For some hundred and fifty years we hear little or nothing of the kingdom of Kent, till towards the close of the sixth century, when Augustine on landing in this island found Ethelbert King of Kent. Ethelbert, who appears to have ascended the throne at an early age, had in the course of a long reign largely extended the bounds of his kingdom. He pushed his way up the Thames valley, till in 568 he was defeated at Wibbandun (?Wimbledon) by the West Saxon king. But despite this disaster Ethelbert’s reign was one of great success for the Kentish kingdom. Some ten years before the end of the century his authority was more or less paramount as far north as the Humber, and the kings of Essex, East Anglia, and Mercia were dependent upon him. His fame had even extended as far as the continent; and his wife was Bertha, the daughter of the Frankish king, Charibert. The supremacy of Kent at the time of the first conversion may be considered as the main cause of the metropolitan see's being fixed at Canterbury. On Ethelbert's death in 616, his son Eadbald seems to have relapsed temporarily into paganism; and on the rise of the Northumbrian power we read that Edwin was overlord of every English kingdom except Kent, and Kent, too, was closely knit to Northumbria by the marriage of Eadbald's daughter Ethelburga to Edwin. It was this marriage that led to the first conversion of Northumbria and the mission of Paulinus to the north of England. But by this time the days of Kentish supremacy were over; and the chief interest in the later history of this kingdom is the fact that its sovereigns were the first to issue a code of laws, or to reduce their laws to writing. The codes of Ethelbert, of Lothaire and Eadric (673-86), and of Wihtraed (694-725) are still extant. Despite the importance attaching to Kent as the seat of the archbishopric, it seems henceforward to have held its own among the rival kingdoms with difficulty. We read how in 686 it was ravaged by Ceadwalla of Wessex, and how next year its folk burnt Ceadwalla's brother Mull—an offence which led to a second invasion by the West Saxon king. Ine, King of Wessex, exacted blood-money to the extent of 3,750 pounds of gold for the slaughter of Mull. In the meantime Kent had relapsed into anarchy, and it was not until 694 that order was restored under Wihtraed. As the power of Mercia increased it is probable that the country came more and more under the influence of the kings of that province (more especially when the royal Kentish house died out), and later under that of Wessex. As an example of the way in which Kent swayed backwards and forwards between Wessex and Mercia we may take the last few years of its separate existence. Offa of Mercia reduced Kent to subjection in 774 as a result of the battle of Otford. In 784 Ealhmund, the father of Ecgbert, and a descendant of Cerdic the West Saxon, is found reigning over this kingdom in association with Alric, and it seems probable that Ecgbert himself ruled as sub-king for a short time prior to his expulsion from England by Offa in 796. Their rule does not, however, seem to imply the substitution of a West Saxon for the Mercian overlordship. In 796 Edbert Præn raised a revolt against the Mercian authority, but two years later he was defeated and captured by Coenwulf of Mercia, who made his brother Cuthred king. On Cuthred's death, a certain Baldred succeeded him, and it was he who in 825 was driven out by Ecgbert, now established as King of Wessex. Henceforward the overlordship of Kent belonged to Wessex and not to Mercia. But even now Kent was hardly an integral part of the West Saxon realm. Ecgbert made it into a separate kingdom, subject to his suzerainty, for his eldest son Ethelwulf; and when Ethelwulf succeeded to his father's throne Kent was given, with Sussex, Surrey, and Essex, to his brother Athelstan. In 858, on Ethelwulf's death, Ethelbert became king of the Kentish people in subjection to his brother Athelstan; but there does not seem to be any reason for supposing that Kent continued separate from the rest of the kingdom after the accession of Ethelbert to the throne of Wessex in 860. Under Edward the Confessor Kent formed part of Godwin's earldom of Wessex; but its distinct character as compared with the rest of southern England may be traced in its being towards the latter part of the same reign separated from that province, and given, together with Essex, into the hands of Godwin's son Leofwine. After the Conquest it was made into an earldom with palatinate status for the Conqueror's half-brother Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, but this phase in its history was of short duration. Odo was exiled in 1088 for his share in the rising against William II, and he had no successor. [GAVEL-KIND.]

Kent, EDMUND GREY, EARL OF. (d. 1489) [GREY.]

Kentigern, St., or St. MUNGO (d. 603), was a contemporary of St. Columba, and the apostle of Strathclyde. He is said to have founded the see of Glasgow, where he seems to have long lived in quiet, till the disorders of the age drove him from that district into Wales. There he founded a monastery and bishopric in the vale of Clwyd, which received its name from his disciple Asaph. When Rydderch Hael established his rule in Strathclyde, and, after the battle of Ardderyd (573), Christianity could once more revive in those parts, Kentigern was recalled to his old diocese, with Hoddam, in Dumfriesshire, for his headquarters, till he once more removed to Glasgow. Thence he seems to have proceeded on his missionary labours to Galloway and the more northern parts of Scotland. An old legend tells how St. Kentigern and St. Columba met before their death, and passed several days together in spiritual conversation.

Kentish Petition, THE (May 8, 1701), was an expression of public opinion against the peace policy shown by the Tories in their delay in voting supplies and in seconding the measures taken by William III for the security of Europe against the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV. It was drawn up by William Colepeper (d. 1726), chairman of the quarter sessions at Maidstone, and signed by the deputy lieutenants, about twenty justices of the peace, and a large number of freeholders. It deprecated "the least distrust of his most sacred majesty" on the part of the Commons, and implored the House "that its royal addresses might be turned into Bills of Supply." It was sent up to London in the hands of William Colepeper, and with him went four gentlemen of the county to present it. The House of Commons was indignant at the idea of one county setting itself in opposition to the united wisdom of the country, and perhaps still more so at the indirect way in which it was first brought under its notice. The petitioners could only get their document presented at all on condition that they would avow their deed. Seymour and Howe violently denounced them. The petition was voted "scandalous, insolent, seditious"; and the five gentlemen were removed in the custody of the serjeant-at-arms. But public opinion was unanimous in their favour, being chiefly influenced by the "Legion Memorial" (q.v.), drawn up by Daniel Defoe, and at the close of the session the petitioners were set free.

Kenyon, LLOYD, 1ST LORD (1732-1802), was called to the bar in 1756. In 1781 he made a great reputation by his skill in conducting the defence of Lord George Gordon. [GORDON RIOTS.] Next year he was made attorney-general, and in 1784 became master of the rolls. In 1788 he succeeded Lord Mansfield as chief justice of the King's Bench.

Keppel, ARNOLD JOOST VAN, 1ST EARL OF ALBEMARLE (1669-1718), accompanied William of Orange to England. He was the confidential friend of the king, and acted as his chamberlain. He was raised to the peerage in 1696. After the death of William, Albemarle was chosen by the States-General to command their cavalry, and fought in the War of the Spanish Succession. He was taken prisoner at Denain in 1712.

Keppel, AUGUSTUS, VISCOUNT (1725-86), entered the navy under Lord Anson. In 1749 he was sent to the Mediterranean, and two years later displayed some judgment in negotiations with the Court of Algiers. On the outbreak of the French war in 1757 Keppel served with distinction under Hawke, and next year captured Goree in difficult circumstances. In 1759 he took part in the fight in Quiberon Bay, and in 1761 and 1762 he conducted the naval part of the operations in the capture of Belle Isle and commanded at Havannah. In 1765 he became a lord of the admiralty under Rockingham. For some years he remained in England unemployed, and in 1778 was appointed to the command of the Grand Fleet. On July 23, after being reinforced, Keppel encountered the French fleet off Ushant. He failed to bring them to a decisive action, and tamely allowed them to escape in the night (July 27). Thereupon ensued a series of mutual recriminations between Keppel and Sir Hugh Palliser, his second in command. A court-martial ensued, which, after sitting for a month, declared the charges against Keppel to be unfounded. Keppel's case became a party question, and the Whigs made it a vital point to gain an acquittal. He had the good fortune to have the popular voice on his side, as well as the advocacy of Erskine, and he escaped amid the loud acclamations of the nation generally, and of the Whigs in particular. In March 1782 he was appointed first lord of the admiralty, and raised to the peerage in April; he resigned from the admiralty on the formation of the coalition ministry, only to resume the post, however, in four months under the same government. On Pitt's accession to office he again resigned, and took no further part in politics till his death in 1786. As a naval commander Keppel showed no talent, nor even the most commonplace enterprise, and owes his position in history entirely to his own blunders and the accident of his family connexion with the Whigs.

Keppel, GEORGE, 3RD EARL OF ALBEMARLE (1724-72), the son of William Anne, 2nd earl, served, as aide-de-camp to the Duke of Cumberland, at Fontenoy and Culloden. In 1746 he was elected member for Chichester, which place he continued to represent till 1754, when he succeeded to the earldom. In 1761 he was appointed governor of Jersey. In March 1762 he embarked as commander-in-chief of the land forces destined for the reduction of Havannah, and captured Fort Moro after a stubborn resistance. Still the Spaniards declined to surrender; but after enduring a cannonade for six hours Havannah capitulated with eleven men-of-war and one million and a half of money, and about the same amount in merchandise. In parliament the earl took an active part in most of the Whig measures of his time, especially making himself conspicuous by his opposition to the Royal Marriage Act, and by joining with forty-seven other peers, in 1770, in a solemn pledge against any further infringement of the rights of the people at elections.

Ker, SIR THOMAS, OF FERNIEHURST (d. 1586), was the son-in-law of Kirkcaldy of Grange, who made him provost of Edinburgh, in Queen Mary's interest, 1571. On the capture of Edinburgh he took refuge in England from the resentment of Morton. He was a bold soldier, and as warden of the Scottish Marches became embroiled with the English (1585) in a disturbance in which it was said that Arran was implicated. A demand from the English court for his surrender and trial was rendered futile by his death.

Kern (CEITHEARN) is the name given all through the Middle Ages to the light-armed Irish foot-soldiers. It is used in a collective sense as well as of individuals. In the practice of billeting kern and exacting prices for their maintenance, we may probably discern the germ of the customs of Coyne and Livery (q.v.), against which so much legislation was directed.

Ket, ROBERT (d. 1549), a tanner of Wymondham, Norfolk, was a leader in the Norfolk agrarian insurrection of 1549. Having collected 16,000 men he encamped on Mousehold Heath, near Norwich, and assumed the title of King of Norfolk and Suffolk, holding a daily court, and trying all captured landlords. On August 1 Ket took Norwich, and subsequently drove out the Marquis of Northampton. But the Earl of Warwick cut off his provisions and forced him to a battle, in which he was defeated and taken prisoner, being soon afterwards hanged in chains at Norwich Castle (December 7, 1549).

Russell, "Kett's Rebellion in Norfolk," gives original documents; J. Clayton, "Ket and the Norfolk Rising," 1913.

Khonds, THE, are inhabitants of the part of Orissa lying south of the Mahanuddy. They are a very primitive community, retaining their old patriarchal government, habits, and superstitions. Among other customs they were long addicted to the sacrifice of human beings to the earth goddess, for the purpose of increasing the fertility of their fields, by hacking the living victim to pieces and burying them in the respective plots of ground. The exertions of Major Macpherson, Sir John Grant, and Colonel Campbell were successful in destroying this custom by disproving its efficiency (1837-49).

Kidd, CAPTAIN WILLIAM (d. 1701), was a noted pirate living in retirement in New York, when in 1695 he was selected by the Earl of Bellamont, governor of New York and Massachusetts, to suppress piracy on the American coast and elsewhere. As the admiralty objected to fit out a man-of-war for this purpose, a ship called the Adventure was equipped, chiefly by the subscriptions of the Whig ministers. Kidd was put in command, and took with him a commission under the great seal, empowering him to seize pirates. The king's right to the goods found in possession of these malefactors was granted by letters patent to the supporters of the expedition, his majesty reserving only one-tenth of the spoil to himself. In May 1696 Kidd sailed from the Hudson, and finding that plundering merchant vessels was more profitable than attacking gangs of desperate men, he soon "threw off the character of a privateer and became a pirate." It was in 1697 that this was made known in London, and Kidd was arrested at New York, to which town he had returned. He was taken to England, and there hanged with three of his companions (May 23, 1701).

Kildare, EARLS OF. This family traced its descent through Maurice Fitzgerald to William Fitz Other, the castellan of Windsor. Maurice's second son, Gerald, secured the barony of Offaley in right of his wife, Eva de Bermingham. John, the 5th Lord Offaley, challenged to single combat William de Vesey—till then Lord of Kildare—by whom he had been accused of treason. De Vesey, being defeated, fled the country and his lands were bestowed upon his rival, who was in 1316 created Earl of Kildare. The 4th earl, Maurice, was justiciar of Ireland, and died in 1390. Thomas, the 7th earl, was lord deputy till his death in 1477, and from this time the Earls of Kildare became the most powerful nobles in all Ireland, opposed, but as a rule unsuccessfully, by the Butlers. [For the further fortunes of this family see separate articles, and the FITZGERALDS.] The ducal family of Leinster at present represents this ancient house.

Kilkenny, THE CONVENTION AT (1341). Alarmed at the attitude of the Anglo-Irish lords, Edward III in 1341 sent instructions to his justiciar, Sir John D'Arcy, bidding him exclude those who were possessed of great Irish estates from the high offices of state, and replace them by Englishmen whose estates lay at home. For the purpose of carrying out this measure, the deputy, Sir John Morice, called a parliament to Dublin, in October, which the Earl of Desmond and the other members of the Irish party refused to attend. The latter called a rival meeting of those who sympathized with him; and this convention, meeting at Kilkenny in November 1341, addressed a petition to Edward III pointing out that English misgovernment had led to the loss of nearly all Leinster, appealing to Magna Carta, and stating their fears as to the threatened resumption of grants of land and liberties and as to the contemplated supplanting of the English by blood by English by birth. Edward, in need of Irish aid for the war with France, received the petition graciously, and in April 1343 revoked the offending ordinance. The petition has been called "the first Remonstrance of Anglo-Ireland against domination from England."

E. Curtis, "History of Medieval Ireland," 1923.

Kilkenny, THE STATUTE OF (1366), was passed in a parliament held in the town of this name, when Lionel, Duke of Clarence, was king's lieutenant. This statute was intended to check the degeneration of the Anglo-Irish in the "English" or "obedient" land. Its chief provisions were—the prohibition of intermarriages between the English and the natives; of gorsipred and fostering and of the use of Brehon or March law by the English. No man of English race was henceforth to be allowed to assume an Irish name, dress, language, or customs; while no Irish were for the future to be allowed to pasture their cattle on English ground, or to be admitted to any religious house or benefice. The English were forbidden to break peace legally made between English and Irish. The breach of these provisions entailed the penalties of high treason. In addition to the above enactments, it was also provided that no Irish were to be called in as minstrels, rimers or story-tellers. Coyne and livery (q.v.) were strictly forbidden; and the practice of archery was enjoined upon the Anglo-Irish. The purpose of the statute was not to declare war on the Irish as such, but to preserve, in a limited area, the purity of the English tradition. The "English" land was considered to include the counties and liberties of Louth, Meath, Trim, Dublin, Kildare, Carlow, Kilkenny, Wexford, Waterford, and Tipperary. All Irishmen living within that area were to be forced to conform to English speech and custom. Outside they retained their freedom.

Kilkenny, THE SYNOD AT, consisting of all the Irish bishops and delegates from the clergy, met in May 1642, and decided that no distinction was to be made between the old Irish and the new, or Anglo-Irish. A common oath of association was agreed on, its object being to rehabilitate Roman Catholicism in Ireland; the aid of foreign powers was to be solicited, and any repetition of the Ulster outrages, which the synod condemned, was to bring down excommunication on the authors. A central council was established, and commanders were appointed for the different provinces—Owen Roe O'Neill for Ulster; Preston for Leinster; Barry for Munster; and Colonel John Burke for Connaught. In 1643 a papal legate, Scarampi, joined them; and it was under his guidance that the council opposed the Cessation (q.v.). First Lord Mountgarret, and then Rinuccini (q.v.) occupied the place of president of the council. In 1647, after the failure of Glamorgan's treaty (q.v.), they concluded peace with Ormonde; but it was only in 1649, after Rinuccini had fled, that they were really in earnest.

Killala, FRENCH ATTEMPT AT. On August 22, 1798, General Humbert landed at Killala, in Mayo, with about 1,100 men, and was joined by some Irish insurgents. He kept excellent discipline, and prevented the Protestants (among them the Bishop of Killala) from being molested by the rebels. General Lake's troops fled before the invaders; but on the destruction of the reinforcements that were coming by sea to his help, General Humbert found himself forced to surrender to Lord Cornwallis.

Killiecrankie, THE BATTLE OF (1689), was fought in the Grampians between John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee (q.v.), and General Mackay. The battle was one of the shortest in history, and is important in that it involved the death of Dundee though his Scots were victorious. The Jacobite cause gained nothing by the victory.

Killigrew, SIR HENRY (d. 1603), was sent on an embassy to Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1566, and in 1569 was employed in negotiating for the opening of fresh ports on the Baltic to English commerce. Three years later he was sent by Elizabeth to try to bring about the delivery of Mary Stuart to the Scots, and her execution; and was subsequently employed in some of the queen's most confidential missions.

Killigrew, THOMAS (1612–83), after having been a page in the court of Charles I, joined Charles II in his exile, and was sent on an embassy to Venice, where his profligate conduct did much harm to his master's cause. On the Restoration he was made master of the revels, a post for which he seems to have been well fitted. He had considerable influence over the king, and seems to have used it not infrequently for good. Many anecdotes are told which show him as the candid friend of the king, whom he endeavoured to divert from his insatiable pursuit of pleasure. Killigrew was the author of many plays, none of which, however, is of any striking merit.

"Killing no Murder : briefly discussed in three questions, by William Allen," was the title of a pamphlet published in May 1657 to justify the assassination of Cromwell. It upheld the recent attempt of Sundercombe, whom it compared to Brutus. The authorship of the pamphlet is generally attributed to Edward Sexby, the Leveller, then engaged in promoting an alliance between Levellers, Royalists, and Spaniards. It was claimed, after the death of Sexby, by Silas Titus.

"Kilmainham Treaty, THE," is the name given to the verbal agreement with Gladstone on which Charles Stewart Parnell (q.v.) was released in May 1882 from Kilmainham Jail, where he had been imprisoned since October 1881. The understanding on which he was released was that, in return for a bill dealing with Irish tenant farmers unable to pay their arrears of rent, he should strive to end the prevailing violence and anarchy in Ireland. Parnell himself had never encouraged violence. His "boycott" campaign was ex-

Kilmansegge, CHARLOTTE SOPHIA, COUNTESS OF DARLINGTON (d. 1730), was one of the mistresses of George I. In 1721 she was created Countess of Leinster, and in the following year Countess of Darlington. We find her, with her sister-in-law, Madame de Platen (in opposition to the rival mistress, the Duchess of Kendal), supporting Carteret in his struggle for power with Townshend and Walpole. "She was," said Lord Stanhope, "younger and more handsome than her rival; but, like her, unwieldy in person and rapacious in character. From her great size she was called 'the Elephant.'"

Kilmarnock, WILLIAM BOYD, 4TH EARL OF (1704-46). [BOYD.]

Kilsyth, THE BATTLE OF (August 15, 1645), fought during the Civil War, resulted in a victory for Montrose and the Cavaliers over the Covenanters, who were commanded by William Baillie. Kilsyth is midway between Stirling and Glasgow.

Kilwardby, ROBERT, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1279), was provincial of the Dominicans in England (1261). On the death of Boniface of Savoy, in 1270, a dispute as to his successor took place between the king and the monks of Canterbury, which resulted in an appeal to the pope, who nominated Kilwardby to the vacant see (1272). He proved himself worthy of the office, and adopted a conciliatory policy, at the same time introducing many valuable reforms. Archbishop Kilwardby crowned Edward I and his wife, Eleanor of Castile, in 1274. He was also present at the great council of Lyons, where the deputies of the Eastern emperor, Michael Palæologus, expressed their desire for a union of the Eastern and Western Churches. The same year he seems to have attempted to instil something of his own spirit into the course of study at Oxford. He was a great patron of learning, and a prolific author. In 1278 he was made a cardinal, whereupon he vacated his archbishopric and retired to Rome, where he died.

King. The early Germans described by Tacitus were more frequently ruled over by elective principes in peace, or temporary duces in war, than by kings; but there is clear evidence that kingship was a familiar institution among the peoples who invaded Britain in the fifth century A.D. One result of the migration into Britain was, perhaps, to make monarchy for the first time universal among the old English. The earliest kings were probably only chief magistrates, or permanent duces; but by degrees a halo of sanctity surrounded the royal house. Descent from Woden marked it out for special reverence; and though the royal dignity remained strictly elective, it was very exceptional for the choice of the witan to fall on any but a member of the traditional royal race. As the representative and personification of the unity of the state, as the chief magistrate in peace, as the leader of the host in war, the king acquired a position which ability and energy could always make imposing, despite the constitutional check of the wise men and the difficulties inherent in the exercise of power in a primitive and disorderly state of society. The consolidation of the smaller states into greater ones was invariably attended by a great increase in the royal power. "As the kingdom increased in extension," says Stubbs, "the royal power increased in intensification." The conception of the sphere and functions of kingship was enlarged. The development of the comitatus gave the monarch a faithful band of followers, who became the nucleus of a new nobility. The blessing of the Church gave the Christian prince new attributes of dignity and sanctity. The traditions of Imperial Rome transferred to the overlord of all Britain the prestige of the emperor within the island which was his empire. Thus throughout the Anglo-Saxon period the theory of kingship was constantly developing; but its old basis remained the same. Edgar was as much the king of the race, the personal monarch of a free people, as the smallest "heptarchic" sovereign. But the growth of a feudalism of native origin side by side as yet with the old Teutonic polity gradually modified both the theory and practice of kingship. In the earliest tables of vergilds the value of the king's life differs only in degree from the value of the life of a subject. But in the days of Alfred a rudimentary conception of treason had come into existence. The king became lord of the people, and was gradually becoming lord of the soil as well. Though still national monarch of the race, his position had become in part at least affected by the territorializing influences that attended the development of the Anglo-Saxon constitution. But what the king gained on the one hand he lost on the other. Whatever fresh prerogatives were in theory assigned to him, he was compelled to delegate them to feudal vassals, who, if nominally holding their powers from the Crown, were, for all real purposes, more independent of him than the national ministers of the earlier stages of kingship. The absence of any developed official organization—the merely personal character of old English kingship—makes the transition from an Edgar to an Ethelred explicable. Even a Harold could hardly have held his own against the feudalizing tendencies of the time. In fact, the election of the greatest of the earls to the seat of the house of Cerdic was as great a triumph of the feudal principle as the election of the leader of the national party was a triumph of the national policy.

The Norman Conquest had remarkable effects upon the development of English kingship. Though necessarily introducing a large feudal element into the constitution, William I did his best to counteract the disruptive tendencies of the feudal party by emphasizing as strongly as he could the continuity of the Old English kingship, and by assigning to it fresh prerogatives such as were claimed by continental sovereigns. He still professed to be the national king of the people as well as the feudal lord of the land. He did his best to use fully the powers which theoretically belonged even to the feudal king, however little practically they were in most countries exercised. As the custodian of law and order, as the protector of the people against the anarchy and disruption of the feudal party, the Norman king was in a real sense the leader of his people. Thus the general effect of the Conquest on kingship was a great development of the royal power on the old lines. The constitutional checks were removed. The elective element became merely nominal. The establishment of a strong bureaucratic system, and an elaborate mechanism of organization and administration, carried the royal power to the highest point ever known in England. Henry II completed what Henry I had begun. The feudal reaction suppressed, the way was clear for the consolidation of a great despotism. It is hard to realize that the monarchy of the Angevins was a gradual evolution from the monarchy of the old West Saxon kings. But though the struggle with the Church had led to the growth of the opposition theory of the divine origin of kingship, and the results of the revived study of Roman Law doubtless entered into the idea of kingship as realized by Henry II, yet the inferiority of his own power in Normandy sufficiently indicates that the English monarchy had mainly developed from internal causes. Feudal Gaul had not much to teach the country of Edgar and Dunstan. The analogy of the Carolings was too remote to give more than the impulse to the growth of Henry II's despotism. But the very administrative system which gave permanence to the power of the Angevin monarchy, even when the carelessness of a Richard or the tyranny of a John had done its best to degrade the lustre of the crown, contained in itself the elements of the constitution which was to set limits to the prerogatives of future monarchs. The pure despotism of the Conqueror and his sons became a despotism tempered by precedent when the administrative system had worked long enough to establish a bureaucratic circle of administrative families and a well-defined administrative tradition. A baronage which, in ceasing to be feudal, had become national, led the people to a struggle which in less than two generations from Magna Carta had established the mediæval constitution of England.

The reign of Henry III marks the transition, that of Edward I the completion of the new theory of English kingship. The legislative and taxative powers were now reposed in the hands of the national representatives, whose power of presenting grievances was an indication of that national feeling in accordance with which a wise king would govern. Practical efficacy was given to the old Teutonic maxim, Lex fit consensu populi et constitutione regis. But the whole executive power remained with the king. He still had in his hands the destinies of the whole state. He took the initiative in everything. He governed the country, made war or peace, was the fountain of justice and honour, appointed all ministers, negotiated all treaties, and, through his council, even exercised concurrent legislative and taxative powers with those of parliament. So long as the nation trusted him, he could do almost anything; but he was the rex politicus, who ruled by law, and the law, so far as not fixed by tradition, could only be altered by parliament.

During the fourteenth century, though the basis of kingship was hardly altered from the position of Edward I, there grew up, in proportion as the popular claims of a parliamentary party, conscious of its strength, were advanced, an antagonistic series of royal assumptions. "For every assertion of national right," says Stubbs, "there is a counter-assertion of royal autocracy. Royalty becomes in theory more absolute, as in practice it is limited more and more by the national will." Edward III was certainly less able to get his own way than Edward I, yet Edward III's claims to override parliament were far in excess of Edward I's. The reign of Richard II was a period of parliamentary growth; but Richard was the most strenuous asserter of the divine right and indefeasible prerogatives of monarchy of any mediæval sovereign. His great attempt at despotism speedily led, however, to a new adjustment of the position of the monarchy by the Revolution of 1399. Both the practice of the Lancastrian monarchs and the theorizing of Sir John Fortescue illustrate very strongly the highest development of mediæval constitutionalism. "The origin of politic kingship," says Fortescue, "is the will of the people. The limitations of the royal power are the glory rather than the shame of regality," as the prosperity of constitutional England and the misery of despotic France sufficiently indicate. The nomination of the council in parliament almost anticipates the modern ministry, and shows that, even within his executive functions, Henry IV was under the control of parliament. But constitutionalism was too weak a form of government for the fifteenth century. The Wars of the Roses demonstrated its futility, and the "new monarchy," which the Yorkist Edward IV began, and the Lancastrian Henry VII established, shows that a new development of kingship could alone cope with the turbulence of an age of revolution.

It is a mistake to regard the monarchy of the Tudors as in any formal sense a break in the continuity of the English constitution. But practically it was little less. The power of nobles and clergy alike was broken, and parliament became the willing tool of the monarchy—adaptable if not subservient. The absence of a standing army shows that Henry VIII could rely on his people's support, and that the monarchy was strong because national and popular. The king was careful not to do illegal acts without sufficient reason for them. Even the lex regia of English history, which gave the king's proclamations the force of law, and the sanguinary attainder of fallen statesmen, show that parliament was on the king's side. The assertion of the royal supremacy over the Church was the chief new contribution of the Tudor period to the theory of the monarchy. The claim of imperial self-sufficiency for the English king was hardly new; but there was the less need to theorize when the practical power was secure. Yet now that the mediæval feudal checks were removed, the proprietary theory of sovereignty, which was a result of feudalism, and regarded the nation as the estate of the king—as much his private property as the land of his nobles—directly prepared the way for the divine-right theories of the Stuarts.

As a rule, the political writers of the sixteenth century spoke of "the regiment of England as no mere monarchy, but a rule mixed by oligarchy and democracy" (Aylmer); but Raleigh regards the English and French monarchies as similar in power, and the language of Sir Thomas Smith is much less emphatic than that of Fortescue. The troubles of an age of revolution had resulted in a theory that, in addition to the ordinary constitutional and limited prerogatives of the Crown, the supreme necessity of saving the state involved in the very conception of kingship a dictatorial and paramount sovereignty, which was generally called the king's "absolute power." This perhaps necessary conception was now combined with the high monarchical theorizings of James I, and the doctrine of the rising Arminian party that the origin of government was to be found in that patriarchal society whose monarchical constitution was the precedent for all time, that an indefeasible divine right entitled the next heir by hereditary succession to the monarchy, that all constitutional checks on the Crown are of favour and not of right, and that passive obedience was in all cases to be paid to the established monarch. This was supplemented by lawyers zealous for the dignity of the fountain of justice, and by reformers who could see in the royal prerogative the only way to progress and improvement; but the antagonistic claims of parliament soon reduced these theories into unreality. The Civil War practically decided the struggle. However Hobbes might theorize on the absolutism of the sovereign state, or Filmer on the patriarchal basis of divine rights; however parliament might record their approval of the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance, the government under Charles II was practically in the hands of two political parties, of which one might indeed be more personally favourable to the monarch, but the Tories' adulation of the royal power was turned into open rebellion when James II took them at their word, and lost his throne. The Revolution of 1681 was the triumph of the Whig theory of monarchy, which Locke's political treatises had developed against Filmer. The sovereign owed his position to the "original contract" between king and people. The violation of this led to an ipso facto abdication; for the people had transferred their power to the king under a contract, which was annulled by his failure to perform his part. But not only was the power of the sovereign thus limited in theory, not only was the ultimately elective character of the monarchy reasserted, and all the old checks recapitulated and enlarged, but the distinction between the Crown and the king, between the royal office and the royal person, which the Long Parliament had used to justify their rebellion, became now an essential part of that unwritten constitutional usage which, in practice, soon superseded the old legal and theoretical constitution of the country. The influence and power of the Crown went on increasing, while the king's real power became less and less. Nothing but the fiction of jurists regards the nominal head of the modern English state, who "reigns but does not govern," as the real wielder of the ever-increasing executive power which is carried on in his name. The cabinet (q.v.), an informal committee of parliament, and ultimately of the House of Commons, is the real king in the mediæval sense. The old distinction of the legislative and executive power upon which the old constitution rested has been broken down. Many theoretical powers of the sovereign, such as the royal veto on bills, are practically obsolete.

Indirect influence, rather than acts of authority, now makes the monarch a still important factor in English politics. George III, for a time, restored the old royal right of naming ministers, but his ultimate success rested on a harmony of royal and popular wishes which, possible under the "Venetian oligarchy" of the eighteenth century, becomes increasingly difficult when a series of Reform bills has brought into full power the English democracy, and made the "Patriot King" almost impossible. The continuity of English kingship, so long as it remained a reality, is very remarkable, despite the change of its forms and the fluctuations of its power.

A general view of the growth of kingship can be obtained from the "Constitutional Histories" of Stubbs, Hallam, and May, although these now require to be supplemented by more recent authorities. An admirable survey of the development of the theory of monarchy is afforded by J. N. Figgis's "Divine Right of Kings." The primitive kingship of Germany is to be studied in Tacitus's "Germania." Some parts of the "Dialogus de Sacro" illustrate the Angevin monarchy, and the formal treatises of mediæval political philosophers, such as Thomas Aquinas, put mediæval monarchy on its broadest basis. Freeman's writings, while fully illustrating early English kingship, over-emphasize its continuity. Allen's "On the Prerogative" is sometimes useful. Fortescue's book, "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," is the only full original statement of the constitutional position of the mediæval monarchy. The preambles to some of Henry VIII's reforming statutes illustrate clearly the position claimed by that monarch. Aylmer's answer to Knox's "Blast against the Regiment of Women"; Harrison, "Description of England," prefixed to Holinshed's "Chronicle"; Sir T. Smith, "On the Commonwealth"; and some of Raleigh's political writings, show the position of the monarchy under Elizabeth. James I's "True Law of Free Monarchies" gives the theoretical, Bacon's political treatises the practical basis; and Overall's "Convocation Book," and Gowell's "Interpreter," the ecclesiastical and legal justifications of the Stuart claims. Filmer's "Patriarcha" is a more elaborate statement of the divine-right position; Hobbes's "Leviathan," a strong declaration of the autocracy of the State, which, in practice, led to a despotism of the Cromwell or Richelieu type. Locke's "Treatises of Government" is the text-book of eighteenth-century Whiggism, and, in a sense, aimed against both Filmer and Hobbes. Bolingbroke's "Patriot King" marks the revival of the Tory monarchical party, which ultimately carried George III into power. Bagehot's "English Constitution" gives a good account of the position of the monarchy in the "Palmerstonian" era, and Anson's "Law of the Constitution" gives a comprehensive view of its present position. King-maker, THE. [NEVILLE, RICHARD, EARL OF WARWICK (1428-71).]

King of the Commons, THE, was the title assumed by John Litster (q.v.), the leader of the Norfolk insurgents at the time of the Peasants' Revolt (q.v.) in 1381. James V of Scotland was also called King of the Commons.

King's Bench, THE COURT OF, was an offshoot from the Curia Regis. Its origin has been attributed by Stubbs to the arrangements made by Henry II in 1178, by which five judges in the Curia sat constantly to hear the complaints of the people; but it was not till upwards of a century after the court of Common Pleas had become a distinct court that the Court of King's Bench attained that position. Being held literally "coram rege," it followed the king in his peregrinations, hearing cases which concerned him or great persons privileged to be brought to justice only before the king himself. It was only gradually that it was separated from the person of the king, and from the royal council. Shortly before the end of the reign of Henry III the office of justiciar became extinct, and the King's Bench received a staff of judges of its own under a chief justice appointed "ad placita coram rege tenenda." There was a regular succession of chief justices of the King's Bench from the beginning of Edward I's reign. Under this king it gradually ceased to be ambulatory, and in the course of the fourteenth century its evolution was completed as a result of its emancipation from conciliar control. It had now become simply a Common Law court. We find a constant tendency in this court, as well as in the others, to enlarge its jurisdiction. Thus the King's Bench, having cognizance of all personal actions where the defendant was already under custody of the court, used a legal fiction by which persons not actually in custody of the marshal of the court were assumed to be so, in order that the lawyers in that court might have more practice. This custom, which tended to confuse the system of judicature, was frequently legislated against, but without success, until the statutes 2 Will. IV, c. 39, and 2 Vict. c. 110, established one form of process, the writ of summons, for all the courts. The justices of the King's Bench sat with the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, and the justices of Common Pleas, in the court of Exchequer Chamber, which was created by statute 31 Edw. III, c. 12, to determine errors from the common-law side of the court of Exchequer. A second court of Exchequer, composed of the justices of Common Pleas and the barons of the court of Exchequer, was created by 27 Eliz. c. 8, to determine writs of error from the King's Bench. Both these courts were abolished, and a new "Court of Exchequer Chamber" established by 11 Geo. IV, and 1 Will. IV, c. 70. The jurisdiction of this court was, however, merged in that of the new court of Appeal by the Judicature Act of 1873, by which great act also the court of Queen's (or King's) Bench became once more a part of one supreme court of judicature, called the High Court of Justice, of which the judges of the Queen's Bench formed the first division. King's Evil is the name formerly given to scrofula, which was supposed to be cured by the king's touch. Edward the Confessor is said to have been the first king who touched for the king's evil, which he did in 1058. The custom reached its height under the Stuarts, and Charles I is said to have touched over 10,000 persons. It was continued under Anne, but was finally dropped by George I. The Young Pretender exercised it as a prerogative of royalty in 1745. The touching was accompanied by a religious service.

"King's Friends" was the name given to the secret counsellors and supporters of George III in his attempt to restore the royal authority to its old power, and to govern without exclusive reliance on either of the two great parties of the state. This movement, in its practical issue, was a revolt against the oligarchy of the great Whig families which had in the main guided the destinies of the country since the Revolution; and the germs of the principles which it afterwards developed are to be traced in the writings of Bolingbroke, who "strongly urged the necessity of disregarding the old party distinctions, and building up the royal authority on their decay." But as a matter of fact, the "King's Friends," though drawn from both the great parties of the state, were in the main recruited from the ranks of the Tories. George III, however, did not accept his new supporters as being members of either party; his one object was to create a body of men faithful to himself, and detached from either of the great sections of political life. This body was to be his constant adviser, and to carry out his will. Of its leaders he took counsel in private, and followed its advice rather than that of his nominal ministers. It is this state of affairs that is so bitterly sketched in Burke's "Thoughts on the Causes of the Present Discontents." It has been sometimes thought that the picture drawn by the great statesman is a little highly coloured; but of the general truth of his assertions there can be no question. It was due to a knowledge of his secret power in the background that Lord Rockingham, in 1765, would only accept office on condition that "some of the particular friends of the Earl of Bute should not, either publicly or privately, directly or indirectly, have any concern or interest in public affairs." For the Earl of Bute was recognized as the centre of this undue influence. But even after this protest the same condition of things continued. It was by means of this undue pressure that George III opposed the repeal of the Stamp Act while pretending to support his ministers, and Lord Rockingham had to obtain his written consent to the passing of his measure of repeal. At last, in 1766, the king succeeded in getting rid of the Whigs, and in forming a government under the Duke of Grafton and Lord Chatham that should be free from party connexions. On Lord North's accession to power (1770) the king consented to identify his own policy with that of his minister, and would admit none to power except those who would carry out his wishes to the utmost. When Pitt came into power (1784) this great minister was content to "make common cause with the Crown," and the royal influence through the new premier was greater than it had been before. As a rule, their views were identical; but when they differed the king was ready to make use of his old tactics. So, on the Catholic question of 1801, George III is reported to have said that he should reckon any man his personal enemy who should propose any such measure. On Pitt's return to office in 1804 Addington, the late prime minister, took up the position of leader of the "King's Friends," a party which then reckoned some sixty or seventy members in its ranks. The sentiments of the Portland and Liverpool ministers were so well in accord with those of the Crown that the party of the "King's Friends," though still existing, had no cause to separate itself from the ostensible government.

Kingston, SIR ANTHONY (1519-56), was sent to Cornwall as provost marshal after the rebellion of 1549, and is said to have behaved with great cruelty on this occasion. He was present at the execution of Bishop Hooper in 1555, for whom he had developed a great admiration, and in the following year was implicated in the plot to marry the Princess Elizabeth to the Earl of Devon, and to proclaim her queen. On the discovery of the conspiracy he died, probably by his own hands.

Kingsweston, THE BATTLE OF (August 1549), was fought between a party of the western rebels under one Coffin and the royal troops. The latter were completely victorious.

Kinsale, THE SIEGE OF (1601). Five thousand Spaniards, commanded by Don Juan dell' Aguila, landed in the harbour of Kinsale in September 1601, having been dispatched to support Hugh O'Neill's rebellion. They took possession of the castle of Kincorain, but soon lost it to Lord Mountjoy. That nobleman, being shortly afterwards joined by the Earl of Thomond (Conor O'Brien) and some 1,000 men, defeated O'Neill's attempt to raise the siege (December 24). Don Juan, tired of Irish warfare, thereupon surrendered Kinsale, Castlehaven, and the other towns in his possession in return for permission to sail for Corunna with all his forces.

Kirk o' Field was an old and roofless church just without the walls of Edinburgh: close by was a building which had formerly belonged to the Dominican order. It was here that Darnley was murdered on the night of February 9-10, 1567.

Biographies of Mary, Queen of Scots.

Kirkcaldy, SIR WILLIAM, OF GRANGE (d. 1573), was one of the murderers of Cardinal Beaton (1546). He was a leader of the confederacy against Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1567, and to him it was that she surrendered after the battle of Carberry Hill. Appointed governor of Edinburgh Castle in the same year, he fought for Moray at Langside in 1568; but shortly afterwards joined the queen's party, and held the castle and town of Edinburgh against the Regent Morton. In 1573 he was compelled to surrender the place. Morton caused him to be hanged as a traitor in Edinburgh, August 3, 1573.

Kirke, COLONEL PÉRCY (1646-91), was a soldier who had served for some years at Tangier (1680), and was put in command of some troops at the battle of Sedgemoor. After the defeat of Monmouth, Kirke and his troops, who were known as "Kirke's Lambs," committed fearful atrocities in the west of England against the followers of Monmouth. Kirke was one of the first to join William in 1688, and was subsequently put in command of some troops in Ireland. He raised the siege of Derry in 1689.

Kirkee, THE BATTLE OF (November 5, 1817), was fought between the British and the Mahratta troops of the Peshwa Baji Rao. It resulted in the defeat of the latter.

Kitchener, HORATIO HERBERT, EARL (1850-1916), entered the Royal Engineers in 1871, and saw service in the Sudan in 1883-5. In the latter year he was made commissioner for the delimitation of the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar. He was governor-general of the Red Sea Littoral from 1886 to 1888, and of the Sudan in 1899. In 1888 he was severely wounded in an engagement at Haddoub. From that date until 1892 he was adjutant-general of the Egyptian army, and sirdar from 1892 to 1899. He effected the conquest of the Sudan, breaking the power of the Khalifa at the battle of Omdurman. On the outbreak of the South African war he was made chief of the staff, and was commander-in-chief in South Africa from 1900 to 1902, from the retirement of Lord Roberts until the end of the war. From 1902 to 1909 he was commander-in-chief in India. He was raised to the peerage in 1898, and created a viscount in 1902, field-marshal in 1909, and an earl in 1914. On the outbreak of the Great War he took over the seals of the war office, planned to have 70 army divisions in the field by 1916 (to the amazement of his colleagues and the derision of the Germans), and organized the Kitchener Army, which by 1916 numbered 67 divisions in active existence. He adopted the continental theory of warfare and would allow no "limited liability" for the British in France. His length of vision made him an invaluable councillor at the war office, though it is undoubtedly true that he was of a different age from those with whom he had to plan and prosecute the war. He was drowned in the Hampshire on June 5, 1916, on his way to Archangel to give military advice to Russian head-quarters.

Kit-Kat Club, THE, was a Whig club, instituted in 1703 to promote the principles of the Revolution and the Protestant succession. It took its name from a confectioner named Christopher Kat, of Shire Lane, near Temple Bar, at whose house the members used to dine. It numbered 48 members, including Marlborough, Halifax, Somers, Walpole, Steele, and Addison. It was dissolved about 1720.

Kloster-Zeven, THE CONVENTION OF (1757), was one of the incidents of the Seven Years' War (q.v.). In July the British commander, the Duke of Cumberland, was defeated at Hastenbeck by the French. Hameln, Göttingen, Hanover, Bremen, and Verben were occupied by the French. Cumberland retired upon the fortress of Stade, but his communications with the Elbe were soon cut off. He therefore accepted the mediation of the King of Denmark, and on September 8 signed a convention with the Duke of Richelieu. The terms were that the assailing troops, such as those of Hesse and Brunswick, should be sent home, and that the Hanoverians under Cumberland should pass the Elbe, and be dispersed into different quarters of cantonments, leaving only a garrison at Stade. The convention was violently denounced in Prussia, and in Great Britain it was generally looked upon as extremely disgraceful. But perhaps Cumberland took the wisest course in the circumstances. The French were in vastly superior force, and his own army was ill-disciplined and not to be depended on. The convention was not rigidly kept on either side, and was subsequently repudiated by the British at the suggestion of Pitt, and the Hanoverian army was equipped afresh.

Knight, WILLIAM (1476-1547), Bishop of Bath and Wells, was often an ambassador under Henry VIII. He was employed in 1527 at Rome to forward the negotiations for the king's divorce from Katharine of Aragon. Knight obtained more than one opportunity of seeing Clement in Henry's interest; and when the pope escaped to Orvieto he at once followed him thither, and obtained his signature to two documents granting respectively a commission to Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio for hearing and determining the cause in England, and a dispensation for the king to marry another wife. But, while affixing his signature to the documents, Clement had been careful to render them useless to Henry VIII. Knight was subsequently employed to negotiate a commercial agreement with the Emperor Charles V in 1532, and became Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1541.

Knight Service, TENURE BY, is usually regarded as the characteristic feudal tenure. Even before 1066 military service was becoming in this country, as on the continent, increasingly territorialized. The land, at all events in the south and west, had been plotted out into five-hide units, each of which was bound to produce its "miles" for service in the host; and further, the great lords, both lay and ecclesiastical, were beginning to be held responsible to the king for the service due from all the lands over which they exercised a seignory. The old national militia was assuming some of the features of the feudal levy; the thegn some of the characteristics of the feudal baron. Nevertheless it remains true that military tenure as it existed in England throughout the Middle Ages was the creation of the Normans, and that, despite the superficial resemblances between the old order and the new, the one was not a direct outgrowth from the other. As Dr. J. H. Round's researches have shown, William the Conqueror distributed the conquered English lands among his Norman followers, or restored them to their former owners on the plan followed in the duchy—i.e., in return for the service of a specified number of fully armed knights; and he defined the number not in relation to the five-hide rule of his Anglo-Saxon predecessors, but more probably to the constabularia or unit of the Norman feudal host. Lay and ecclesiastical tenants-in-chief alike were assessed in multiples or fractions of ten, with little apparent regard to the value or extent of the holdings, the total "servitia debita" amounting, it has been estimated, to roughly 5,000 knights.

The assessment of the Crown vassals was, however, only the first stage in the establishment of the feudal military system. Every great estate was a replica in miniature of the kingdom. The tenants-in-chief in their turn parcelled out their holdings among their personal followers in order to secure the wherewithal to discharge their obligations to the Crown. As a result England was in the early Norman period plotted out into "knights' fees," each representing not a fixed acreage, but merely that area of land considered adequate for the maintenance of a "miles" and his household. Since the process of subfeudation depended on the caprice or convenience of individual lords, it was entirely lacking in uniformity, some enfeoffing the exact number of knights they owed the king, some more than their "servitium debitum," others fewer. The final result, however, was the creation of between 6,000 and 7,000 fees, as against the 5,000 from which service was actually due to the Crown.

The system thus established under the Conqueror did not long preserve its pristine vigour. With the passage of time the lesser tenants-in-chief and sub-tenants displayed an increasing disinclination for the performance of their military duties. This reluctance probably explains in some measure the rapid development of the institution of scutage (q.v.) under Henry II, and in the thirteenth century it had even more far-reaching consequences. Both Henry II and Richard I were obliged on occasion to resort to the expedient of summoning for service a mere fraction of the feudal host. Under John, in consequence of the growing cost of equipment and of a widespread distaste for foreign service, what had been an occasional expedient became gradually a regular practice. By the end of Henry III's reign this fractional service was all that was recognized by the greater lay and clerical tenants, and an entirely new "servitium debitum" had in effect been created. In place of the 5,000 knights of the Norman host the king had now only some few hundreds of men upon whose service he could rely. As for the sub-tenants, their service was almost entirely converted into the duty of paying scutage to their lords at the rate fixed by royal decree, whenever such scutage was put in charge by the Crown. The decline of the feudal military organization was now in full progress, and Edward I began, in connexion with his Welsh expeditions, to lay the foundations of that paid professional force which under Edward III completely superseded the obsolete feudal array. By the middle of the fourteenth century tenure by knight service had ceased to furnish the Crown with either men or their money equivalent.

In proportion as the original meaning of military tenure was lost sight of the importance attached to its incidental profits increased. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries we hear little of knight service, but much of reliefs and aids, escheats and forfeitures, wardship and marriage. In particular the Crown jealously guarded its interests as supreme landowner, and exploited to the full the advantages it possessed in virtue of its prerogative. Under the Tudors the Court of Wards and Liveries (q.v.) was established to control and administer the profits arising from the feudal incidents, which, now that their raison d'être had disappeared, were felt by the Crown vassals to be increasingly burdensome. In the early seventeenth century attempts began to be made to secure the abolition of the whole obsolescent system. The Great Contract scheme of 1610 proved abortive, and it was not until the Commonwealth period that its central idea was carried into execution. After the Restoration the ordinance of 1645 and the act of 1656 were confirmed and amplified by the famous statute of 1660, which abolished both knight service and scutage together with the burdensome incidents of military tenure, and converted all tenures into free and common socage. Knighthood. The word knight is derived from the Anglo-Saxon cnicht, which, originally meaning boy or youth, was, even before the Conquest, occasionally used as equivalent to "miles." It is necessary to distinguish between the personal distinction of knighthood and the legal system of knights' fees. In its wider sense, knighthood may be taken as nearly equivalent to chivalry or to feudalism, and will be found treated under those heads. The actual ceremony of conferring knighthood does not seem to have been known in England before the Conquest, and the first instance of it we have on satisfactory evidence is the dubbing of the Conqueror's son Henry (afterwards Henry I) by his father. After the Conquest the extent of land held by a knight, or the feodum militis, was the unit of the system of feudal military tenure. The Conqueror parcelled out the confiscated English lands among his Norman followers in return for the service of a specified number of knights, at the same time imposing similar services upon most of the ecclesiastical foundations which retained their territorial endowments. These in their turn enfeoffed sub-tenants until virtually the whole of England had been parcelled out into knights' fees. What the exact value and extent of a knight's fee were is hardly ascertained. It has been suggested that the five hides of land which were associated with thegnhood before the Conquest formed one of the knight's qualifications after it, but the available evidence does not support the theory. It is more probable that the common quantity was expressed in the twenty pounds' worth of annual value, the qualification for knighthood in the thirteenth century and later. It has been said (on the authority of Ordericus Vitalis) that after the Conquest England was divided into 60,000 knights' fees. This, however, is entirely untrue. The number has been estimated by modern authorities at between 6,000 and 7,000. On the decline of the feudal military system knighthood was made compulsory on all freeholders possessing an estate of £20, and was frequently enforced; as, for instance, by proclamation to the sheriffs in 19 Henry III and by Edward I in 1278. Writs for distraint of knighthood were issued to enforce this law, and continued to be issued down to the time of Charles I, the only difference being that the estate for which knighthood was compulsory was raised from £20 to £40 per annum. Elizabeth and James I issued these writs, apparently, only on one occasion in each reign; but the practice was revived and rigidly enforced by Charles I in 1629. It was finally abolished, with all feudal tenures and customs, in 1661. Knights in the Middle Ages, from the time of Edward I (and probably before), were either knights banneret, who were entitled to display the square banneret, and were supposed to command a larger force in the field; or knights bachelors, who carried the tailed pennon, and were of inferior rank. In England, as elsewhere, knighthood was purely a personal distinction, and was never hereditary. Knights banneret had disappeared by the sixteenth century, and were not subsequently created. In England there are now ten orders of knight-hood: the Garter (founded in the fourteenth century), the Thistle (founded in 1687), St. Patrick (1788), the Bath (1725), St. Michael and St. George (1818), Star of India (1861), Indian Empire (1876), Royal Victorian Order (1896), Order of the British Empire (1917), Companion of Honour (1917). Knolles, SIR ROBERT (d. 1407), was originally a leader of one of the Free Companies which devastated France in the fourteenth century. But having subsequently obtained a regular command in the English army, he greatly distinguished himself by his bravery and military skill. In 1359 he captured the great French soldier, Bertrand du Guesclin; and he served with the Black Prince in Spain (1367). When the Peasants' Rebellion broke out, in 1381, he was instrumental in protecting Richard II and the Londoners from the insurgents.

Knollys, SIR FRANCIS (1514-96), "the sternest Puritan of his day," was known during the reign of Edward VI as one of the most zealous advocates of the Reformation. The religious persecution of Mary's reign forced him to seek an asylum in Germany; but on the accession of Elizabeth, of whom he was a cousin by marriage, he returned to England, imbued with the spirit of Puritanism. Made vice-chamberlain of the royal household, he was subsequently advanced to the office of lord treasurer, whilst immediately after his arrival in England he was appointed a privy councillor. In 1566 he was sent to Ireland, where he recommended the council in England to approve of the campaign proposed by Sidney. Two years later he was appointed the custodian of Mary, Queen of Scots, whose charms his "keen, hard sense" was supposed to despise. It was he who suggested the plan of marrying Mary to George Carey, son of Lord Hunsdon, for, "so matched, Elizabeth need have no fear of her." Knollys, like the rest of Elizabeth's ministers, was liable to have his course of action repudiated by his mistress if she found it convenient; and in his dealings with Mary Stuart he found himself repeatedly forced to act upon his own responsibility, with the danger of a subsequent disavowal of his proceedings. Notwithstanding the occasional bad treatment he received at the queen's hands, Sir Francis remained till his death one of her most faithful ministers, though on one occasion he exclaimed that he doubted whether she were any longer fit to rule.

Knox, JOHN (1505-72), was a native of Haddington, and educated at Haddington grammar school and at Glasgow. He seems to have taken orders as a secular priest in 1530, and to have had some connexion with one of the religious establishments at Haddington for some years afterwards. In 1546 he became converted to the reformed faith, and placed himself under the protection of some of the Protestant gentry of St. Andrews. In June 1547 the French captured St. Andrews, and Knox was carried prisoner to France and sent to the galleys. He obtained his release in the beginning of 1549, and came to England, where he remained till the death of Edward VI. For two years he was minister of Berwick, where he put in practice, two years before it was authorized by Edward VI's Second Prayer Book, the substitution of common bread for wafers at the Communion, and allowed sitting instead of kneeling. He is credited with the "Black Rubric" of the Second Prayer Book. He was appointed one of Edward's chaplains, and was consulted on the composition of Cranmer's Forty-five Articles. On the accession of Mary he retired to France, and subsequently to Geneva, where he remained till 1559, with a short interval (1555-6) in Scotland, and wrote several controversial and other works, including his "Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women" (1558), which gave great offence to Queen Elizabeth. In 1559 he returned to Scotland, and immediately joined the party of the lords of the congregation. In July of this year he was chosen minister of Edinburgh. He took a large share in the proceedings of the Protestant leaders henceforth, and was mainly instrumental in drawing up the "Confession of Faith," accepted by parliament in 1560. On her arrival in Scotland, Mary held several conferences with Knox, and at length, in December 1562, ordered him to be tried for treason before the council. He was, however, acquitted. After the marriage of Mary and Darnley in 1565, he preached a sermon which gave great offence to the royal couple. He was called before the council, and inhibited from preaching. He preached the coronation sermon when the infant James VI was crowned, in July 1567. After the death of Moray (January 1570), Knox, who had incurred the enmity of Kirkcaldy of Grange, left Edinburgh and retired to St. Andrews. He returned to Edinburgh in August 1572, preached twice more (once when the news of the St. Bartholomew Massacre arrived), and died November 24, 1572. Knox was twice married, first to Marjory Bowes in 1555, and secondly to Margaret Stewart, daughter of Lord Ochiltree. Besides numerous epistles, discourses, and polemical tracts, Knox wrote a "Historie of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland," which is of considerable historical value.

Kolis, THE, are an aboriginal tribe of Western Bengal. Having come under the operation of laws which they did not understand, they were excited by the systematic encroachment of Bengal settlers and zemindars. In 1832 they rose in arms, and the insurrection was not put down without much bloodshed. On the suppression of the rebellion the new regulations were withdrawn, and the Kolis were placed under a special commissioner. Since then they have made considerable advances in civilization and prosperity.

Korigaum, THE BATTLE OF (January 1, 1818), was fought during Lord Hastings's war against Holkar and the Peshwa. Captain

Francis Staunton, who had been summoned to Poona with his division, encountered the Mahratta army of the Peshwa Baji Rao (q.v.), 25,000 strong, near the village of Korigaum. The Mahrattas immediately crossed the river to attack the British troops. Captain Staunton's sepoys fought with desperate valour till they were sinking with exhaustion and frantic with thirst. The approach of General Smith, who was in hot pursuit, so alarmed the Peshwa, that he retreated in the night, and thus abandoned the contest.

Kotah, THE SIEGE OF (March 22, 1858), occurred during the Indian Mutiny. Kotah was a strongly fortified town on the Chambal. Its raja was friendly to the British, but had been coerced into rebellion by his followers. General Roberts, therefore, found there were two parties in Kotah, and was immediately joined by the raja, who was in possession of the citadel and palace. The rebels, about 5,000 in number, held the rest of the town. Reinforcements were sent to the citadel, and on the 30th the place was easily carried by assault.

Kumasi, the capital of King Koffee Calcali, Ashanti, was entered by the British troops, under Sir Garnet Wolesey, February 5, 1874; and again by Sir F. Scott's force, January 18, 1896. In 1900 a rebellion broke out, but was suppressed by an expedition under Sir James Willcocks. [ASHANTI, WARS IN.]

Kurdlah Campaign, THE (1795).

When the temporizing policy of Sir John Shore left the Mahrattas free to attack the Nizam in order to enforce their claims for choute or tribute, the whole Mahratta Confederacy assembled for the last time under the banner of the Peshwa, commanded by Hurry Punt. The Nizam, deserted by the British, had thrown himself into the hands of a French officer named Raymond, who had organized for him a disciplined army of 18,000 men, commanded and trained by European officers. The Nizam advanced to Bidar, and the two armies met at Kurdlah (March 11, 1795). The Nizam's cavalry drove the entire centre division of the Mahrattas from the field, and Raymond's infantry stood their ground gallantly against Sindhia's disciplined battalions. The Nizam, however, was persuaded by his favourite sultana to retire from the field, and the whole army followed him in headlong rout. Soon afterwards he was shut up in Kurdlah and captured. To secure his liberty he had to make territorial cessions to the value of thirty-five lacs of rupees a year, besides surrendering his chief minister Mushir-ul-Mulk, who was by far the ablest man at his court, and a warm partisan of the British.

Kut el Amara, THE SIEGE OF (December 8, 1915—April 29, 1916), occurred in Mesopotamia during the Great War. General Townshend retired on Kut when his Baghdad offensive failed, and by December 8 was completely hemmed in by the Ottoman forces under Von der Goltz. Several attempts at relief failed, and lack of provisions forced the garrison to capitulate.

Labour, MINISTRY OF, was established in 1916 to relieve the board of trade of some of its administrative work and to administer the national health insurance scheme. It watches over the interests of wage-earners, including unemployment insurance and industrial disputes in its sphere of operation.

Labour Party, THE, was founded and organized in response to the working-class vote created by the Reform Act of 1884. The Independent Labour Party was formed at Bradford by J. Keir Hardie in 1893 from among the members of the Social Democratic Federation (founded in 1881) to propagate a Socialist programme by means of returning independent members to parliament. By 1906 it had succeeded in returning 30 members. Meanwhile a parallel step had been taken by the Trade Union Congress in 1900, when a resolution had been passed to "establish a distinct Labour group in parliament, who shall . . . agree on their own policy, which must embrace a readiness to co-operate with any party which for the time being may be engaged in promoting legislation in the direct interests of Labour." In 1908 the members returned by the T.U.C., together with those of the Miners' Federation, were united with those of the Independent Labour Party to form the Labour party in parliament, whose numbers at the election of 1910 reached 40. Its freedom of action was hampered by its being pledged to Home Rule and so compelled to keep the Liberal party in office, and by the rise of Syndicalist and other schools of Socialist theory which weakened and discredited the Labour party until the repeal of the Osborne judgment in 1913. At the outbreak of the Great War the party hesitated before endorsing the policy of the government, but it joined the Coalition governments of May 1915 and December 1916, and did not resume its independence until November 1918, though it strove for peace throughout. In 1919 its strength was 57; in November 1922, when it became the official opposition, it numbered 142. The first Labour government was formed under Ramsay MacDonald (q.v.) in January 1924, and lived until the following October 8. It concentrated on unemployment, housing, reparations, and the improvement of Anglo-Russian relations. In foreign affairs its outstanding achievement was the Geneva Protocol (q.v.). Resuming its place as the opposition in October 1924, the party suffered during the next two years as the result of its policy during the General Strike of May 1926 and the Chinese crisis of 1926-7.

Labourers, THE STATUTES OF, had their beginning in the Ordinance of Labourers which was published in June 1349. This was an emergency measure taken by the council at a time when parliament could not be called together owing to the desperate ravages of the Black Death, and was prompted by the difficulties of employers whose villains and servants were taking advantage of the scarcity of labour to resist the reimposition of obsolete services or to exact more favourable conditions. Unemployed persons under sixty were to accept work when required to do so. All those in receipt of wages had to accept what had been usually paid before 1347, and the four previous years. Employers who offered wages above the standard rate were penalized. Retailers of food were required to charge reasonable prices. The ordinance was re-enacted in statutory form in February 1351, and modifications and additions appeared frequently within the next hundred years. The broad principles of this series of measures were (a) that unoccupied persons of the employed classes must work when able to do so; (b) their payment must conform to a reasonable rate, which it was at first attempted to fix. The prices of necessities must also be regulated to balance the justice of the wage legislation; (c) it was an offence to refuse to work for the regulated wage. By the act of 1351 a fine could be imposed, but a statute of 1361 extended the powers of the justices from imprisonment to branding; (d) vagabondage was regarded as a crime, and the soliciting of alms as an occupation only for the impotent poor. The early labour statutes are of considerable interest not only by reason of their immediate effect in contributing to the discontent which led to the Peasants' Revolt (q.v.) in 1381, but as the first steps in a two-fold national policy in the regulation of poor relief and the wage-contract. In the legislation of Tudor times we recognize the working out of these two policies as distinct processes culminating in the Statute of Artificers of 1563 and the late Elizabethan Poor Law.

Labrador was first discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1496, and probably visited by him again in 1513. It was explored by Frobisher in 1576, but seems to have been lost sight of till it was rediscovered by Hudson in 1610.

No regular settlements were made till some Moravian colonies were formed about 1750. In 1763 it was annexed by proclamation, together with Madalens and Anticosti, to the island of Newfoundland, but in 1774 was reannexed to Canada, only to be restored with Anticosti to Newfoundland, as a dependency, by the 1809 act of parliament which abolished the fishing administration. Its western boundary in the province of Quebec was not defined until 1927, when a dispute between Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada, largely due to the new industry of wood pulping for paper-making, was settled by reference to the judicial committee of the privy council.

Lackland (or, SANSTERRE) was the name by which King John was commonly known, from his not receiving any great fief from his father as his brothers had done.

Lack-learning (or, UNLEARNED) Parliament, THE, was the name given to the parliament which met at Coventry in October 1404. It acquired its name from the fact that the king, following a precedent established by Edward III in 1372, directed that in the writs of summons no lawyers should be returned as members. This parliament is chiefly remarkable for the proposal that the lands of the clergy should for one year be taken into the king's hands for the purposes of the war with France.

Læt. The læt of the earliest English laws is generally associated with the litus of the capitularies of Charles the Great, and the Lex Saxonum, and with the lazzi or lassi of the continental Saxons in the eighth century. They were tributary dependents of alien blood, possibly descendants of the defeated British. The læt is not to be considered as a mere slave. He was valued for the werigild, summoned to the placitum, taxed for the Church, allowed the right of purgation, and choice in marriage. He was free to everyone but his lord, and simply unfree in cultivating land of which he was not the owner. The læt served his lord for hire or for land, though not reduced so low in the scale as the theow or wealh.

Lagos. [WEST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Lagos, THE BATTLE OF (August 1759), was one of the naval victories gained by the British during the Seven Years' War (q.v.). The French ships had been blockaded in their ports during the year; but in August the Toulon fleet attempted to join the Brest squadron. It was pursued by Admiral Boscawen from Gibraltar, and attacked off Lagos in Algarve, when of its largest ships two were captured and two others run ashore. The Portuguese reasonably complained that the neutrality of their coast had been violated.

La Hogue, THE BATTLE OF (May 19, 1692), checked a threatened invasion of England. Louis XIV, in support of James II, had collected an army in Normandy. Two French fleets, amounting together to about 80 ships, were collected at Brest and Toulon, under Tourville and D'Estrées. James, misled by the intrigues of Admiral Russell believed that there was great disaffection in the English fleet. Meanwhile, the combined English and Dutch fleet of 90 ships swept the Channel. Tourville had with him only his own squadron, consisting of 44 ships of the line. Believing in the treachery of the English officers, he thought that he had only the Dutch to deal with. But the ill-judged declaration whereby James exempted whole classes of Englishmen from pardon, and a stirring dispatch on the other hand from Mary, had thoroughly roused the temper of the English fleet. Russell visited all his ships and exhorted his crews. The battle lasted till four in the afternoon. At first the wind was in favour of the French, and only half the allied fleet could be brought into action. But just as the French had resolved to retire the wind changed. Their retreat became a flight. Twelve of the largest ships took refuge in the bay of La Hogue, under the eyes of James. There they were attacked and destroyed, as they lay in the shallow water, during two successive days, by a flotilla of boats under Sir George Rooke.

Lahore, in the Punjab, was the capital of the independent kingdom of Ranjit Singh (q.v.) from 1799. It was occupied by the British under Sir Hugh Gough in February 1846, and the treaty of peace between the British and Dhuleep Singh was signed there (March 1846).

Lake, GERARD, 1ST VISCOUNT (1744-1808), entered the army at an early age, and served during the Seven Years' War in Germany. He went through the American War under Cornwallis, and earned great distinction. In 1793 he served during the campaign in Flanders, and here also greatly distinguished himself. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the army in India. In this capacity he bore a chief share in the Mahratta War of 1803, and enhanced his reputation as a brilliant soldier. He defeated Sindhia at Laswari (q.v.) (November 1803), and captured Delhi. He received a peerage in 1804. He returned to England in 1807, and was appointed governor of Portsmouth.

Lamb, WILLIAM, 2ND VISCOUNT MELBOURNE (1779-1848), was the second son of Peniston, 1st Viscount Melbourne. In 1806 he entered the House of Commons as Whig member for Leominster, and joined the opposition under Fox. When Canning was commissioned to form a cabinet, Lamb accepted the office of chief secretary for Ireland. Later, he accepted office under Lord Goderich and under the Duke of Wellington. In 1828 he succeeded his father in the House of Lords. He took office under Lord Grey, in 1830, as home secretary. In 1834 Grey found his position untenable, and the king sent for Melbourne, who contrived to construct a cabinet, which lasted till the end of the year. The death of Earl Spencer caused the fall of the ministry. The king called upon Melbourne to retire, and summoned Sir Robert Peel from Italy to assume the premiership. The new government did not last over the year. A new parliament decided against it, and Melbourne formed a mixed government, which lasted from April 1835 to August 1841. At the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign the prime minister's position was one that required address and tact, and by universal acknowledgment Lord Melbourne filled it with success, and in such a way as to earn the queen's gratitude. Several important acts were added to the statute book by the ministry, including the new Poor Law. In 1839 Melbourne, after practical defeat on the Jamaica question, resigned. Peel, however, declined to form a ministry on account of the disputes about the royal household, known as the "Bedchamber question" (q.v.), and Melbourne returned. The general election of 1841 resulted in a Conservative majority, and the government resigned. After his resignation Melbourne took little active part in public affairs.

Lambert, JOHN (1619-83), born in Yorkshire, served in the Parliamentary army during the Civil War and distinguished himself at Hull (1643), Nantwich and Marston Moor (1644), and Pontefract (1645). He was the spokesman of the army in its quarrel with parliament in 1647, and joint victor of Preston (August 1648). In 1650 he accompanied Cromwell to Scotland, where he led the attack at Dunbar. His horse was shot from under him at Worcester. In January 1652 he was appointed lord deputy for Ireland, and in 1653 he became a member of the first council of state, remaining a staunch supporter of Cromwell until 1657. During this period he served as major-general in the north, advocated war with Spain, and favoured religious toleration. He broke with Cromwell, however, over the question of kingship, and retired into private life during the closing years of the protectorate. Under Richard Cromwell he resumed his commands, was elected to the Committee of Safety and council of state (May 1659), and subdued the rising of George Booth (August). In the following October, cashiered by the Parliament on account of a petition from his officers that he should be appointed major-general, he marched to Westminster and barred out the members. The army made him major-general, and he went north to obstruct Monck's advance on London. His army dissolved away, however, and parliament deprived him of his commands and committed him to the Tower (March 1660). After his escape and abortive rising in April he was exempted from the Act of Indemnity, tried for treason (June 1662) and sentenced; But Charles II reprieved him and had him sent to live in private in Guernsey, under supervision. He died in 1683. [A. C. F. B.]

Lambeth Articles, THE (1595), were drawn up by Archbishop Whitgift, assisted by Fletcher, Bishop of London; Vaughan, Bishop of Bangor; and Tindal, Dean of Ely. They consisted of nine articles, embracing all the most pronounced doctrines of Calvinism, and were sent to Cambridge, where Calvinistic ideas were rife, with permission from the archbishop that they should be adopted. They were, however, disapproved by the queen and Lord Burghley, and as they were not accepted by parliament they had no binding force. They were again brought forward and rejected at the Hampton Court Conference (1604) (q.v.).

Lambeth, TREATY OF, was made after the Fair of Lincoln by William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, acting for Henry III, and the French prince, Louis (September 11, 1217). By this treaty it was agreed that Louis should at once evacuate England, that the prisoners on each side should be released, and that a general amnesty should be granted. Also a sum of money, amounting to 10,000 marks, was paid to Louis as the price of his departure.

Lambton, JOHN GEORGE, 1ST EARL OF DURHAM (1792-1840), descended from one of the oldest families in England, was the son of William Henry Lambton. After serving for a short time in a regiment of hussars (1809-11), he was returned to parliament (1813) for the county of Durham, for which he sat until 1828, and soon distinguished himself as a very advanced and energetic reformer. In 1821 he brought forward a plan of his own for parliamentary reform. In 1828 he was raised to the peerage with the title of Baron Durham. When the ministry of Lord Grey was formed in November 1830 Lord Durham became lord privy seal and assistant in the preparation of the first Reform Bill. During the difficulties which arose out of the Belgian question he was sent to St. Petersburg (1832) on a special mission as successor to Lord Heytesbury. The object of his journey was to persuade the Russian cabinet to give immediate instructions to the Russian plenipotentiaries in the London Conference to co-operate, on behalf of the Tsar, cordially and effectively, on whatever measures might appear to be best calculated to effect the early execution of the treaty. Russia, however, was as yet unwilling to join the western powers in measures of coercion towards Holland, and hence the mission was a failure. In 1833 he was created Earl of Durham in reward for his services of the previous year when sent on the special mission to Russia, a court to which he was accredited ambassador from 1835 to 1837. In 1838 he was sent to Canada as high-commissioner and governor-general of all the British Provinces in North America to report on the constitutional deadlock caused by intense faction and national feeling embittered by religious differences. His firmness and arbitrariness, though they saved Canada, excited great opposition [GRANT], which was increased by his lavish display, and when his Canadian policy was attacked by Brougham the ministry threw him over. Lord Durham's report on the affairs of North America was issued in 1839 with the help of Charles Buller, who was responsible for much in it; it was a landmark in British colonial policy. He found "two nations warring within the bosom of a single state," and advocated as an ultimate solution the anglicization and self-government of Canada. The greatness of Canada is his justification. He was recalled and returned to England, where he died soon after at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, in July 1840.

Lancaster was a Roman station founded by Agricola, A.D. 79. It was bestowed by William the Conqueror on Roger of Poitou, who built the castle. It was burnt by the Scots in 1322 and 1389. In the Civil War the castle was taken by the Parliamentarians, February 1643, and the Royalists failed to recapture it when they took the town in March. The town was occupied by the Scots in 1648 under Hamilton. It was occupied by the Jacobite insurgents for two days, November 7 and 9, 1715, and by Charles Edward, November 24, 1745.

Lancaster, THE DUCHY AND COUNTY PALATINE OF, grew out of the honour of Lancaster, mentioned in Magna Carta, which, having reverted to the Crown on the death of William of Blois, brother of King Stephen, had been granted to the Earls of Chester, and, on their extinction in 1232, to William de Ferrers. After the second rebellion of Robert de Ferrers, Henry III erected the honour into an earldom in favour of his son Edmund, afterwards called Crouchback. The duchy was created by Edward III in 1351 in favour of Henry, Edmund's grandson, and in his patent of creation the dignity of an earl palatine was conferred upon him. The latter title was also given in 1377 to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who had married Henry of Lancaster's heiress. Henry IV, his heir, being conscious of the weakness of his title to the throne, prevented the union of the duchy with the Crown, by procuring an act of parliament, soon after his accession, providing that the title and revenues should remain with him and his heirs for ever. Henry V added to it the estates inherited from his mother, Mary Bohun; but a large part of it had to be put into the hands of trustees for the payment of his debts. On the attainder of Henry VI, after the accession of Edward IV, the duchy was forfeited to the Crown, and was inseparably united to it by act of parliament, the county palatine, which had hitherto been kept separate, being incorporated in the duchy. This settlement was confirmed by an act passed in the reign of Henry VII. The revenues of the duchy are not reckoned among the hereditary revenues, in place of which the civil list was granted to William IV in 1830, but are paid over to the privy purse, an annual account being presented to parliament. Burke, in 1780, reckoned the average returns at £4,000 a year, but they have since greatly increased. The Chancery court of the county palatine sat at Preston; the duchy court being held at Westminster. The court of the duchy exercised concurrent jurisdiction with the Chancery as to matters in equity relating to lands holden of the Crown in right of the duchy, and was chiefly concerned with questions of revenue. In the later nineteenth century the administration of justice was assimilated to that of the rest of England, the court of the county being abolished by the Judicature Act of 1873. The office of chancellor of the duchy is now a political appointment, and is frequently held by a cabinet minister. Its duties are nominal. The chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, if a commoner, takes precedence next after the chancellor of the exchequer.

Lancaster, THE HOUSE OF. The position of the royal house of Lancaster can scarcely be understood without some regard to that earlier family to whose title it succeeded. Edmund, the younger son of Henry III, had been given the honour of Derby and the earldoms of Lancaster and Leicester (1265-7); to these his son Thomas had added, through his marriage, Lincoln and Salisbury. When, therefore, this Thomas took up the position of leader of the baronial opposition to Edward II he was supported by a body of vassals, many of whom—those of Lancaster and Lincoln in particular—were accustomed to war against the Crown. With Thomas of Lancaster we can have no sympathy. He was unscrupulous, yet quite devoid of political ability; selfish in his objects, and retrograde and oligarchical in policy. But his action associated the name of Lancaster with opposition to the king and alliance with the clergy; and his violent death secured for him the reputation of a martyr to the popular cause. His son Henry assisted in the deposition of Edward II, but also in the ruin of Mortimer; and this Henry and his heir—another Henry (made Duke of Lancaster in 1351)—showed themselves faithful servants of Edward III, during the greater part of whose reign there is scant trace of any baronial opposition. But the last Henry's daughter, Blanche, married John of Gaunt, and carried with her the earldoms of her father; and in the circumstances of Edward's latter years there seemed every opportunity for the re-formation of an opposition. Gaunt, however, preferred to act the part of court leader against the bishops and the constitutionalists in the House of Commons, and departed still farther from the old Lancastrian tradition by championing and accepting the aid of Wyclif. It was left for his son, Henry of Derby (who had married one of the co-heiresses of Bohun of Hereford, a name also recalling resistance to the Crown), to take up the position assigned by tradition to the Lancastrian family. In conjunction with Thomas of Gloucester he reorganized the baronial opposition, and though for a time he made peace with the court, and assisted in the ruin of the lords appellant, his banishment and the seizure of the duchy of Lancaster made him again a popular hero; while the reaction against Richard's autocratic measures gave to Henry's accession the character of a triumph of constitutionalism.

But Henry IV knew that the great mass of the people regarded him with indifference, and that the revolution of 1399 had been, as a contemporary says—

Than for the love of Kyng Henry."

The subsequent conduct of the Percys, also, showed with what motives many of the nobles had supported him. The ideas of legitimacy were still deeply rooted in the nation. Henry must have shared in this feeling, and must have felt his own position to be doubtful. It is not difficult to see that a man in his situation might easily become the cold and calculating monarch whom the chroniclers of his reign describe.

Henry V had no such doubts. He believed himself called upon to realize the claims of his predecessors to the French throne, to restore spiritual unity to Christendom by alliance with Sigismund, and even to regain the Holy Land from the infidel. Like his father, he allied himself firmly with the clergy, and supported them in their efforts to put down Lollardy; but this action was due, not to a desire to gain clerical support, but to a sincere orthodoxy. He was possessed by the idea of the unity of the Holy Roman Church, and persecution of heretics was, according to the public opinion of the time, its natural expression. He possessed all the "chivalric" virtues, but he was more than a Richard I or Edward III; he was a hardworking and skilful statesman, and it is scarcely possible to decide as to the feasibility of the great plans which his early death interrupted. In the minority of Henry VI, Bedford, Gloucester, and Beaufort became the chief figures in the drama, Bedford carrying on the work of Henry V in France, Beaufort pursuing at home the constitution policy of the last two kings, and both thwarted by the selfish and thoughtless Gloucester. When he arrived at manhood Henry VI showed himself incapable of ruling with a firm hand either in England or France. Overworked in his boyhood, of weak health, and with a tendency to insanity inherited from his grandfather, Charles VI, he became a mere tool in the hands of opposing factions. The ill-success of the French War, and the peace policy which followed his marriage, gave an opportunity to the house of York to assert its claims; and with the beginning of the Wars of the Roses the great Lancastrian experiment of governing England in concert with a free parliament broke down.

Lancaster, EDMUND, EARL OF, called CROUCHBACK (1245-96), was the second son of Henry III. In 1254 he was offered the kingdom of Sicily and Apulia by the pope, and in 1255 formally invested, but he was never able to enforce his claim. At the conclusion of the Barons' War he received a large share of the confiscated lands, including the earldoms of Leicester and Derby, and in 1267 he was created Earl of Lancaster. In 1268 he took the Cross and in 1271 accompanied his brother Edward I on crusade. He was twice married, his second wife being Blanche of Navarre, who brought him the county of Champagne. He died during the campaign in Gascony in 1296. He was called Crouchback or Crossback from having taken the Cross, though in later times the Lancastrians pretended that he was in reality the eldest son of Henry III, but was set aside as a cripple, and on this extraordinary fiction was partly founded Henry IV's claim to the throne.

Lancaster, THOMAS, EARL OF (1277?-1322), was the son of Edmund, second son of Henry III, and titular king of Sicily, by Blanche, queen-dowager of Navarre. He was therefore cousin to Edward II, and uncle to his queen Isabella. He was Earl of Lancaster, Leicester, and Derby, and his wife the heiress to the earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury. He came forward as the leader of the barons against Piers Gaveston (q.v.) at the beginning of Edward II's reign. He was one of the Ordainers (q.v.) appointed in 1310, and in 1312 was one of those chiefly responsible for the execution of Gaveston. In 1313 he received the royal pardon, and was reconciled with the king, but in the next year he refused to take part in the expedition to Scotland. In 1316 he became practically supreme in England, but his rule was oppressive and disastrous. His wife was carried off from him by Earl Warenne, and private war broke out between the two earls. His popularity declined, and the king, aided by the two Despencers, attempted to govern without him. Once more Lancaster came forward as the leader of the barons, and insisted on the banishment of the favourites, but his power was shortlived. His forces were defeated at Boroughbridge (March 1322), and he was taken prisoner. On the 22nd he was tried at Pontefract, and being found guilty of treason was forthwith beheaded. [LANCASTER, HOUSE OF.]

Lancaster, JOHN, DUKE OF, commonly called JOHN OF GAUNT (1340-99), was the fourth son of Edward III. He was born at Ghent during his father's visit to Flanders; hence his popular appellation of John of Gaunt. In 1359 he married Blanche, the daughter of Henry, Duke of Lancaster, and thus became possessed of the estates of the Lancastrian family. He was created Duke of Lancaster in 1362. In 1367 he served under his brother in Spain, and distinguished himself at Navarette (q.v.). His wife having died, in his absence, of the plague, he married in 1371 Constance, the daughter of Pedro the Cruel, and assumed the title of King of Castile. In 1373-4 he led a futile expedition through France from Calais to Bordeaux. On his return he took a prominent part in English politics, and was at the head of the court or ministerial party, which was opposed by the Good Parliament (q.v.) under the auspices of the Black Prince. The latter's death in June 1376, however, enabled the duke to turn the tables on his assailants, and in 1377 the work of the Good Parliament was undone. At the same time John of Gaunt, as a leader of the anti-clerical party, patronized Wyclif (q.v.) and supported him against the bishop and the Londoners at the Council of London, 1378. In 1381 his palace in the Savoy was burnt by Wat Tyler's mob. In the first years of Richard II's reign his influence over the government was great, although he was not included in the young king's council of regency. He remained generally unpopular, and in 1384 he was accused of treason by Latimer, a Carmelite friar. Next year a serious quarrel broke out between Gaunt and his nephew, and though a reconciliation was later effected the duke's importance in English politics henceforth diminished. He now devoted his attention to asserting his claim through his wife to Castile. He formed an alliance with John I of Portugal (to whom he married his daughter Philippa) and led an army into Castile in 1386. He was compelled to retire to Gascony in the next year. In 1388, having secured peace by marrying his daughter Catherine to Henry of Castile, he returned to England, where he succeeded in effecting a formal reconciliation between the Duke of Gloucester and the king. Henceforth he remained on good terms with Richard, and afforded a valuable counterbalance to the influence of Gloucester and his party. In 1398 his son Hereford fell into disgrace and was exiled; and in February of the next year John of Gaunt died. His estates were at once seized by Richard, and this was one of the causes which led to the return of Henry of Bolingbroke under arms and to Richard's deposition in his favour. On the death of his second wife Lancaster had married, in 1396, his mistress, Catherine Swynford (q.v.), and his children by her, the Beauforts, were legitimized by patent in 1397. From one of these, John Beaufort, Henry VII was descended. [BEAUFORT, FAMILY OF; LANCASTER, HOUSE OF.]

Land Legislation, IRISH. The chief penal laws relating to Ireland are noticed in the articles IRELAND and PENAL CODE. The Irish and English land laws were in other respects practically identical until the Irish potato famine of 1846-8, which marked a turning-point in Irish economic history. The old order had been characterized by a population double that of to-day, by the retention of government in the hands of a wealthy minority, and by a system of land-holding wherein tenure without rights of ownership, and "improvement" without compensation, were general evils. All this was swept away in the half-century following the famine: largely as a result of the triumph of free trade in England, competition from America, and a growth of national introspection which sought a reasoned end to agrarian misery.

Until 1860 the relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland was based on tenure and not on contract, and grave confusion had resulted from the sixty acts passed under George III to modify and define the old feudal tenures. The tenant had no security of tenure, beyond the fact that it would cost his landlord much money to evict him. An act of 1815, passed to meet a situation in which high and impossible rents would result from the post-war drop in agricultural prices, made eviction through the county court easier and less costly. In 1851 the liability was extended to include year-to-year tenants, and conditions became still more favourable to the owner at the expense of the tenant. This process culminated in Deasy's Act of 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. c. 154). By the act the relations between landlord and tenant were founded on contract and no longer on tenure; the landlord was assumed to be sole owner of his land, the occupier merely paying for temporary use of it; and ejectment was made still easier—default of one year's rent exposed the occupier to the risk of eviction, whereupon all the improvements he had made in the management of his holding would fall to the landlord, according to the principle that "whatever attached to the freehold belonged to the freehold." Thus tenants had to develop and improve their holdings, but were liable to lose all the fruits of their industry on eviction. Add to this the fact that free trade and foreign competition made it more profitable for landowners to develop pasture-land than to let out holdings, and the stream of emigration from Ireland in the years following the act of 1860 is easily understandable. But a change came in 1870, in Gladstone's Landlord and Tenant Act, which was of importance in three ways. It reversed the existing policy by (a) giving compensation for "disturbance," limited to certain cases in which "the court shall find" that the tenant had sustained loss (maximum £250) by eviction; (b) giving compensation for "improvements" introduced by the occupier, though with sundry provisos and computations as to how long the occupier had enjoyed his improvements; and (c) legalized the Ulster Tenant Right Custom (q.v.), which had begun in the seventeenth century and was marked by security of tenure (so long as the rent was paid) and the right of the tenant to sell his goodwill. The act failed because of the variety of its exemptions, because the principles of administration tended to reduce the amount of compensation to a minimum, and because the landlord still raised his rents. But a new era had begun in so far as the policy of laissez-faire was shown to have collapsed; and when the raising of rents and the recurrence of bad seasons brought Irish agriculture into a state bordering on ruin, there was set up the Bessborough Committee, whose recommendations gave rise to the Three F's Act of 1881, giving to the tenant (a) the right of free sale of his interests in his holding, (b) fixity of tenure, and (c) a fair rent assessed by an independent tribunal. A Land Commission was set up to administer the new act, and worked well. The act was amended in 1891 and 1896. It shows clearly the new principle in Irish land legislation—to adjust the relation between landlord and tenant to actual facts, and to make the parties co-owners.

The problem, however, was not yet solved. The fixing of rents tended to produce a reduction of rents; wherefore the landlord began to abolish the dual relationship by selling the land to the occupying tenant with state aid. Several stages in this process can be discerned: (1) The "Bright Clauses" of the act of 1870 provided that two-thirds of the purchase price should be offered by the board of works; (2) the Land Commission of 1881 was empowered to make advances to the tenant to enable him to purchase his holding, the term of repayment being 35 years; (3) the "Ashbourne Act" of 1885 advanced £5,000,000 (and another five millions in 1888) to the Land Commission, which advanced henceforward four-fifths of the purchase money to the tenants, repayment being completed in 49 years; (4) the "Balfour Act" of 1891 provided that, the ten millions being by now exhausted, the vendor should be repaid by means of a special Guaranteed Land Stock (at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum for 30 years), the dividends being paid out of a land purchase account established by the commission and kept up to requirements by a charge on a similarly established Guarantee Fund; (5) the "Balfour Act" of 1896 reduced the annuity of repayment every decade; (6) the "Wyndham Act" of 1903 opened a new era by establishing within the Land Commission an Estates Commission to facilitate the sale of entire estates, and by enabling the tenant to purchase on still more easy terms than heretofore, in a term of 68 years. The result of this system was soon apparent in increased improvements, increased thrift on the part of the occupiers, and a rise in the standard of living.

Among later acts may be noted the Evicted Tenants (Birrell's) Act of 1907, which enabled the estates commission to acquire untenanted land wherewith to provide holdings for tenants evicted since 1878; Mr. Birrell's Land Act of 1909, which repaired the defects inherent in its predecessor by making the treasury and not the ratepayers responsible for the excess stock necessary; and the Northern Ireland Land Act of 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V, c. 34), which further amended the law. By the Land Purchase Act of 1924 (15 Geo. V, c. 3), the treasury guaranteed a loan (principal and interest not to exceed £30,000,000) to be raised by the Irish Free State government for the purchase of land in Ireland.

[A. C. F. B.]

Land Tax, THE, was first levied in its present form in 1692 on real estate, offices, and personal property. In the course of time the difficulties of assessment made it a land tax only and as such it came to be known. It varied in the eighteenth century between 1s. and 4s. in the pound. At first at 4s., it yielded £1,922,712, and it brought in about the same return in 1797. In 1798 it was made perpetual and was fixed at 4s. in the pound upon the valuation of 1692, provision being made for its redemption by the payment of a lump sum. This has been taken advantage of by many landowners; but at the present time there is still a large quantity of land on which the tax has not been redeemed and is still levied. Mr. Lloyd George's budget for 1909 provided for the taxation of land values; that is to say, it attempted to take for national purposes some of the unearned increment which accrued to the owners of land which had increased in value, "when it could be shown to be due to the growth and activities of the community." Taxes of various amounts were imposed on this increase when the land was transferred or reverted to the lessor. A very elaborate valuation of the land was made necessary, and the new taxes met with much opposition. Mr. Lloyd George's land taxes were continued until 1920, when the government abandoned them. The highest figure yielded by these taxes was £715,000 in 1914. There is still a duty on mining royalties which was once part of the more ambitious scheme.

Land Tenure. The origin of the peculiarities of land tenure in England is exceedingly obscure. It was supposed at one time that while the so-called higher kinds of tenure, as those of the noble, the knight, the churchman, and the cultivating freeholder, were the necessary subdivisions of feudal estates, so the very various kinds of base tenure, those of villeinage and copyhold, were the result of individual caprice on the part of the superior lord; or at best, relics, mutilated or distorted, of more ancient tenancies. Such was the view of the early writers on English tenancies, as the author of the "Dialogus de Scaccario" (q.v.), Glanvill, Bracton and Fleta (q.v.), Littleton, and his great commentator, Coke. Latterly, however, the subject has been more fully, but not finally, investigated by many inquirers, German and English. A difficulty in exactly determining on the facts arises because nearly all the information which can be obtained is derived from documents the date of which, however early it may be, is long posterior to influences which, as we know, might have modified, and almost certainly did modify, the original tenures to which the documents refer. Thus, after the Roman period, the earliest deeds are those which belonged to monastic and other ecclesiastical foundations. But such foundations were essentially of foreign origin, and were the product of a more or less lengthened process, under which native custom was brought into collision with external practice, and was naturally altered by it. It is probable, too, that many of the peculiarities of what we call the feudal system have appeared at very different times, and in very different countries, not by virtue of any definite law, but solely for the economical reason that the labour of the husbandman always provides more than is necessary for his individual needs, and that, therefore, it becomes possible for a stronger man to extract from such a person part of the produce of his labours, as tax, or rent, or customary due. In return for such a tribute, the superior might covenant to leave the husbandman in peace, or even to guarantee him from the assaults of other oppressors; and thus the levy of blackmail, practised from the days of David and his companions in exile to those of Rob Roy and his tribesmen, becomes the type of those dues and duties which, in theory at least, were always characteristic of the feudal system, and were supposed to be reciprocal between lord and tenant, and, it may be, is their origin.

It is clear that the subjection of classes was characteristic of the times which preceded the Norman Conquest, as well as of those which followed it. There were serfs and slaves, inferior or dependent tenants, and military vassals, on the estate of Earl Godwin, as well as on the estate of Earl Odo. It is probable that the country folk were no better off, and no worse off, under the rule of the descendants of William the Norman than they were under that of the descendants of Alfred the Great. There was a change of masters, of landlords, but no change of system. It is probable that the gradual discontinuance of a system under which fines were levied for offences, with the alternative of slavery, and the gradual establishment of a custom under which outrages were deemed an offence against the king's peace, and punishable by his judges, may have assisted the process by which freemen were degraded from their condition, and forced to accept a lower status, and may even have assisted the counter-process by which the serf gradually achieved the rights of the freeman.

When we are in view of the actual state of things which prevailed in England when documentary evidence is clear and continuous, the following facts are obvious and universal. There was an over-lord in every manor, the manor being generally, but not always, identical in its boundaries with the parish. This over-lord might be the king, or a noble, or an ecclesiastic, or a corporation, or a private individual. The over-lord who was a subject was liable to certain dues to the king, either fixed by custom, or granted on emergency by parliament, and his estate was liable to forfeiture in the event of his committing certain offences, or to escheat in case he died having no heirs to succeed him. It was important that there should be a central authority, and no means were more ready and more certain to effect this result than to inflict the penalties of forfeiture on certain acts of disobedience or outrage. Beneath these lords were free and serf tenants, all of whom had a sufficient amount of arable land joined to their rights in the common pasture, and their use of the wood for fattening their hogs for the purpose of their own maintenance and that of their families. The free tenants had to pay a rent fixed in amount, either in money or kind, sometimes in labour, but the amount of either was unalterable; they were masters of their own actions as soon as this rent was satisfied, or they could transfer their holdings and quit the manor. The serf was sometimes bound to a money rent. But his liabilities were generally in labour, though even this could be commuted for money from a very early period, and constantly was commuted. When his labour was yielded, or its equivalent was paid, he was free to employ himself on his land, or, for the matter of that, on any other tenant's land, or on the lord's land, at ordinary wages. But he could not leave the manor without licence, for which he paid an annual sum; he could not give his daughter in marriage without paying a fine, or send his son to school in view of his becoming a priest, or get him made a monk, without similar payments, and when his occupancy descended to his heirs they paid a fine on admittance, and were brought under his liabilities, while sometimes his best chattel, horse or ox, or article of furniture, was forfeited to the lord under the name of a heriot. His liabilities were not in the aggregate much more heavy than those of the freer tenant; in some particulars they were less, for he was not held to any military service, but his condition was degraded, and he was under social disabilities.

It appears that in early times, and until 1290, the tenants, whether lord or vassal, could not sell or alienate their estates. But they had, it is well known, the right of admitting subtenants to themselves, though probably this right was not exercised, or if exercised was difficult for the inferior tenant. At the date above referred to, every tenant was permitted, by the statute Quia Emptores (q.v.), to alienate his estate to another, under the condition that the newcomer should stand in exactly his position. Still the lord was allowed to admit new tenants to his own domain, serf or free, provided that the new tenant held on the same condition as the old. In effect, however, that which was so characteristic of ancient tenures ceased—the subordination of ranks created at the pleasure of the lord. Whatever distinction existed was traditional, and therefore ceased to be vital. It was certain gradually to decay. But before the change referred to was made by law the lord was permitted to create a new kind of estate, the form of which was exempted from the later alteration. This was the “estate tail,” an institution the significance of which no one foresaw, as it was not employed on a large scale till nearly two centuries after its first establishment.

Such were lay estates. They were all liable to obligations—the higher, that of knight service (q.v.), to military duties; the next, that of a socager, to rent; the third, that of the serf, to labour. There were also cottagers who subsisted by their labour, who had a tenement with its garden or curtilage, and who had to get their livelihood by hiring themselves as farm servants. But vast estates were held by the clergy, either secular, who correspond to the parochial clergy and the dignitaries of the Church, archbishops, bishops, deans, and chapters, who generally held land beyond the tithes with which they had immemorially been endowed, or the monks. It is said that before the Reformation the monasteries held a third of all the land in the kingdom. In theory the clergy were held to satisfy all obligations by their prayers, or by divine service, as it was called, and were said to hold their land by free alms. But in course of time, though not without violent struggles on their part, they were made to contribute by grants to the necessities of the Crown, through parliament. The lands of the Church were thus a fourth kind of tenure; and these four kinds were practically inclusive, for another which is enumerated, that in ancient demesne, and which consisted of land which had been once the estate of the Confessor, or of the Conqueror, was possessed of certain privileges and exemptions only.

But the expression “land tenure” may be also taken to indicate the process by which these lands were occupied and distributed among the several tenants. The lord always had a manor house, in which a local judicature was held, the judge being the lord's steward, and a jury, who presented offenders, the court leet being inhabitants of the manor taken from all ranks, and the homage, of freeholders only, who registered the inhabitants on the court roll. The lord also possessed the best land in the parish, the water meadow—always of great value in a country where there were no winter roots and no artificial grasses—and the most convenient and fertile fields. Each homestead also had its paddocks and curtilages near the house and farmyard. But the principal part of the tenant's holding was in the common arable fields. Here the land was ploughed in strips, generally each a half-acre in dimension, a “balk” or space of unploughed land being left between each one of these sets of strips. In these strips the lord, the parson, the monk, the farmer shared in varying quantities. On such land it was not easy to induce fertility, except by carrying manure to it, for it would not be possible to fold sheep on such plots, and folding sheep was then, as now, the best way in which to restore exhausted land. This kind of cultivation, which Seebohm attempted to trace back to very remote times, remained, and was customary in many parts of England down to very modern experience.

The first great change in the English land tenures were from the consequences of the Black Death (q.v.) in the middle of the fourteenth century. Such was the scarcity of hands that wages rapidly doubled, and even trebled, in amount. The serf's labour had been commuted for money payments, and now the lord found that he was often receiving for labour which had been his due not more than a third of its current market value. After trying the effect of proclamations, laws, and penalties, he attempted and, as the facts prove, simultaneously over England, to reverse the bargain. The serfs resented the action, and the tremendous insurrection of Wat Tyler, which involved two-thirds of the country and all its most prosperous districts, broke out. The insurrection collapsed, but tenure in villenage (q.v.) was rapidly developed into copyhold or customary tenancy.

Within less than a century land which in previous times could not have been held without social degradation was freely purchased by nobles and gentlemen.

The next important change came after the Wars of the Roses. Up to this time entails had been very rare, and only in small estates. Now, however, the landowner, who entered the fray, and belonged to the beaten party, had to incur the risks of forfeiture. But an estate tail was not liable to forfeiture on treason, perhaps not even to a parliamentary attainder. Hence the custom arose of entailing the great estates as a measure of precaution, since no one could forfeit what was not his, and the estate of the descendant would survive the misconduct of his ancestors. Henry VIII, however, framed a statute under which entails were made liable to the penalties of treason.

The same reign saw the vast estates of the monasteries, and not a few of those belonging to the secular clergy, flung upon the market, in amount perhaps not less than two-fifths of the whole land in the kingdom. These estates passed from the Crown by grant or purchase to a new, and generally needy, set of proprietors, and great distress ensued. But there was no modification in the nature of tenures. The old divisions still prevailed—knight service, socage (q.v.), copyhold, and free alms. But what had once been honourable had now become oppressive. The nobles and gentry would have gladly commuted their liabilities to the Crown on fair terms, and strove to make a bargain with James. But the scheme broke down, and the policy of the king, in exacting his extreme rights, doubtless led to the formation of a parliamentary party within the House of Lords, which gave some weight in the struggle between Charles and the House of Commons.

The Civil War between king and parliament developed a new kind of land tenure, which has continued to our own day, and has been the principal instrument by which land has been accumulated into few hands. The Royalist party were, after their defeat, in great danger of ruin. They knew that they had to bear serious and heavy fines, and they feared that a sentence of forfeiture might fall upon them. Hence they employed two lawyers, Palmer and Bridgman, who devised the strict settlement, under which the ancestor (say the father) was made tenant for life, with certain powers, and his descendants (say his sons) were made succeeding tenants in tail. The conveyance, according to Blackstone, was of suspicious validity, and was certainly in contravention of public policy, as it practically created a perpetuity. But after the Restoration the two lawyers became Crown officers, and in their administrative capacity gave validity to the devices which they had invented as conveyancers. During the same period the abolition of the tenures in chivalry took place. The Court of Wards and all feudal incidents were abolished by resolutions of both Houses in February 1646. These resolutions were repeated by an act of parliament in 1656, and confirmed by the act of the Convention Parliament in 1660. The Crown was compensated for the loss of its hereditary revenue from the feudal incidents by the grant of half the excise, a tax established by the Long Parliament two years before the abolition of tenures in chivalry, and, like it, confirmed at the Restoration.

[The most important change in the law of land tenure made since 1660 was that effected by the Law of Property Act of 1922. By this act the distinctions between freehold and copyhold were swept away; the law of real property was assimilated to the law of personal property; and the mode of transfer of land was greatly simplified. The great act of 1922 has been followed by seven supplementary statutes the effect of which has been the entire reconstruction of the English law of land tenure.] [BOCLAND; FOLKLAND; MANOR, THE MEDIEVAL; VILLENAGE.]

Landen, THE BATTLE OF (July 29, 1693), or, as it is sometimes called, the battle of Neerwinden, resulted in the defeat of William III by Marshal Luxemburg. By an adroit feint on Liège the French general drew the king towards him. William might still have retreated, but he resolved to fight. The allies protected their line by a breastwork and a series of entrenchments, and 100 pieces of cannon were placed along it. On the left flank were the village of Rumsdorp and the little stream of Landen, and on the right the village of Neerwinden. The fighting began about eight in the morning. Two desperate assaults on the village were repulsed, in the first of which Berwick, who led the French, was taken prisoner. Luxemburg ordered a last attack to be made by the household troops, which was also unsuccessful. But the centre and left of the allies had been thinned to support the conflict at Neerwinden, and a little after four in the afternoon the whole line gave way. William with the utmost bravery arrested the progress of the enemy, and made the retreat less disastrous. The French were victorious, but they had lost 8,000 of their best men (the allies lost 12,000). Luxemburg did not venture to molest the retreat, and William soon reorganized his forces.

Lane, RICHARD (1584–1650), an eminent lawyer of the reign of Charles I, is chiefly known for his able defence of Strafford in 1641. He joined the king on the outbreak of the Civil War, and in 1645 was made lord keeper. This office he continued nominally to hold under Charles II, whom he followed into exile in 1650.

Lanfranc (1005 ?-89), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a wealthy citizen of Pavia. After studying at various schools in Italy and France he began himself to teach, eventually settling at the cathedral school of Avranches in Normandy. Becoming convinced, however, of the futility of secular learning, he entered about 1040-42 the Benedictine abbey of Bec, of which he was made prior some three years later. Soon afterwards he became involved in the controversy on the Real Presence which Berengar of Tours had started. Brought at first into hostile contact with William of Normandy, owing to the latter's marriage within the prohibited degrees, he subsequently became closely attached to the duke. In 1063 he was made abbot of the new monastery founded by William at Caen and, in 1070, after the conquest of England, he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. During the years of his primacy he worked in close accord with William, with whose help he gradually filled most of the English sees with Normans, and carried through a thorough reform of the entire ecclesiastical system. He defined the relations between York and Canterbury, restored the Church councils to their former importance, reorganized the episcopate, inspired a monastic revival, and enforced the Hildebrandine decrees with regard to simony and the marriage of the clergy; while his influence may also be discerned in the Conqueror's edict separating ecclesiastical from civil jurisdiction. His support of Hildebrand's policy was, however, confined within definite limits. In spite of the decree of 1075 he made no attempt to raise in England the question of lay investiture; and he openly sided with William in his resistance to the papal demand for homage. His independence of spirit and his practicality enabled him to steer a middle course between the conflicting tendencies of the age, and to establish the Norman Church in England upon a firm foundation.

Langdale, Marmaduke, 1st Baron (1598 ?-1661), was a gentleman of Yorkshire who raised troops for Charles I and supported his cause with unwavering fidelity. In February 1645 he successfully relieved Pontefract, and in the summer of the same year he commanded the king's left wing at Naseby. After the battle he collected fresh troops, and attempted, on the king's directions, to relieve Chester. In the attempt he was utterly routed by Colonel Poyntz at Rowton Heath (September 1645). In the second Civil War he took up arms, seized Berwick, and formed a corps of English Cavaliers auxiliary to Hamilton's army. At Preston, where his corps formed the van, he was taken prisoner, but contrived to escape to the continent. Charles II created him a baron, and at the Restoration he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Yorkshire.

Langham, SIMON (d. 1376), Abbot of Westminster, was treasurer of England from 1360 till 1363, when he was promoted to the chancellorship. He is said to have been the first chancellor to address parliament in English. In 1366 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury, and resigned the great seal. During his primacy he did much to correct abuses which had crept into the Church, but in 1368, having been made a cardinal without the royal consent, he was compelled by Edward to resign his archbishopric. He soon regained the royal favour, and was allowed to hold a variety of preferments, but when in 1374 the primacy again fell vacant the king refused to countenance his re-election.

Langport, BATTLE OF (July 10, 1645). After the battle of Naseby (q.v.) Fairfax marched into the west to attack Goring's army. On July 10 Fairfax, advancing from Long Sutton towards Bridgwater, found Goring's forces strongly posted on some hills on the east of Langport. The Royalists were defeated, driven through Langport, and chased by Cromwell and the horse to within two miles of Bridgwater. The victory enabled Fairfax to besiege and capture the Somersetshire fortresses.

Langside, THE BATTLE OF (May 13, 1568), was fought near Glasgow between the forces of Mary, Queen of Scots, who had just escaped from Lochleven Castle, and those of the Regent Moray. Mary, in spite of the superior numbers of her army, was defeated.

Langton, JOHN DE (d. 1337), was chancellor from 1292 to 1302, during which period he seems to have carried on the policy of Robert Burnel. In 1305 he was made Bishop of Chichester, and shortly after the accession of Edward II (1307) was reappointed to the chancellorship, which he held till 1309. He had at first supported the king, but the infatuation of Edward for Gaveston drove Langton to side with the barons, and he was one of the Ordainers (q.v.) appointed in 1310 to regulate the royal household and realm. The rest of his life seems to have been spent in attending to the affairs of his bishopric, and in mediating between the king and the baronial opposition.

Langton, STEPHEN, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228), is sometimes said to have been born at Langton, near Spilsby, but of his parentage and early life nothing certain is known. He studied at the university of Paris, where he made the acquaintance of Lothaire, who, on his election to the papal throne as Innocent III, sent for Langton, whose reputation as a scholar and divine was very great. In 1206 he was created a cardinal. Shortly afterwards Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and a disputed election to the primacy followed. The younger monks chose Reginald, their superior, while the elder, and the suffragan bishops, elected John de Gray, Bishop of Norwich, the king's nominee. On the case being referred to the pope, Innocent rejected the claims of both candidates, and caused Langton to be chosen. The king refused to accept him, and regarded the action of the pope as an unjustifiable interference with the rights of the king and the English Church. For six years (1207-1213), John remained obdurate. Various proposals and offers were made by Innocent; England was placed under an interdict (1208), and the king himself excommunicated (1209), but it required a threat of deposition to induce him to yield (1213). Throughout this period Langton showed a commendable moderation, and consistently endeavoured to mediate between the king and the pope; after his admission to England Langton, though the papal nominee, soon won the gratitude of the English by his opposition to the tyranny of John. It was he who produced the charter of Henry I before the baronial council at St. Paul's as an indication of the claims they ought to make; and all through the struggle for the Charter he was the soul of the baronial party. For a time he forfeited the pope's favour for this opposition to the pope's new vassal; but his great personal influence with Innocent ultimately prevailed, and the accession of Henry III and the acceptance of the Charter by the papal party restored him to full influence. In 1222 he held a Church council at Oseney, "which is to the ecclesiastical history of England what the assembly at Runnimeid in June 1215 is to the secular history." He procured the recall of the papal legate Pandulf (1221) (q.v.), and a promise that during his lifetime no more legates should be sent from Rome. He excommunicated the mercenaries and feudalists, thereby assisting in the restoration of order. His death, in 1228, was soon followed by the quarrel of Hubert de Burgh and the king. He was one of the ablest of the mediæval archbishops.

Lansdown, BATTLE OF (July 5, 1643). After the battle of Stratton, Hopton and the Cornish army were joined by the king's troops under Lord Hertford and Prince Maurice. The Parliamentary troops, defeated at Stratton, were likewise reinforced by the army of Sir William Waller, who took up his head-quarters at Bath. Waller entrenched himself at Lansdown, where he was attacked by Hopton's army on the morning of July 5, and the latter remained masters of the field. But the losses of the conquerors were very great; they included Sir Bevil Grenville, "whose loss would have clouded any victory," and many officers. Hopton himself, wounded in the battle, was nearly killed by an explosion of gunpowder the next day.

Large Declaration, THE, was a narrative of Charles I's conduct towards the Scots, published to justify his policy during the events which led to the war of 1639. It was the work of Walter Balcanquhal, dean of Durham. The Scottish general assembly, which met at Edinburgh in August 1639, demanded that the king should suppress the book, and hand the author over to them for punishment.

Largs, THE BATTLE OF (October 2, 1263), was fought between Hakon of Norway and the army of Alexander III on the coast of Ayrshire. The Norwegians effected a landing, but were driven back to their ships (which had already suffered many losses in a storm) by the Scots.

Laswari, THE BATTLE OF (November 1, 1803), was fought 80 miles south of Delhi, between the British, commanded by General Lake, and fifteen of Dowlat Rao Sindhia's disciplined battalions. The engagement was very severe and protracted. Sindhia's sepoyes were defeated.

Lathe was one of the five (originally six) administrative divisions of the county of Kent, answering to the ridings of Yorkshire. The court of the lathe was superior to that of the hundred. The judicial importance of the lathe distinguishes it from the rape of Sussex, the importance of which was apparently from the outset geographical rather than administrative.

Latimer, HUGH (1485?-1555), Bishop of Worcester, was the son of a prosperous Leicestershire yeoman-farmer. At fourteen years of age he entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he threw himself with conspicuous energy into the special studies affected by the favourers of the New Learning. He attracted the favourable notice of Thomas Cromwell, and on finally quitting Cambridge he was preferred by him to the living of West Kingston, in Wiltshire. By this time Latimer had earned for himself no small amount of fame as an eloquent and telling preacher; but the boldness with which he proclaimed his religious views, and his unsparing denunciations of the existing ecclesiastical abuses, frequently placed him in positions of danger, from which it required all his own native address, backed up by powerful friends at court, to extricate him. In 1535 his favour with Henry VIII, whose chaplain he was, together with the influence of Thomas Cromwell, procured his elevation to the see of Worcester. But after the enactment of the Six Articles (q.v.) he was at once made an example of, and imprisoned for contumacy (1539).

He was released in 1540, and remained in obscurity till 1546, when he was again imprisoned; but on the accession of Edward VI he was immediately set free. He declined, however, to resume the responsibility of an episcopal charge, occupying himself instead with the more congenial work of an itinerant preacher. In this character his popular preaching talents exerted a much wider and more permanent influence in the spread of his opinions than the most vigorous exercise of his episcopal authority could have done; and there is no doubt that his enthusiastic missionary labours contributed very largely to fix the doctrines of the Reformation in the minds of the people. On Edward VI's death he was again imprisoned, in the Tower and at Oxford, where attempts were made to compel him, with Ridley and Cranmer, to a disputation on the Mass. He was martyred with Ridley at Oxford, October 16, 1555.

Laud, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury (1573-1645), the son of a clothier of Reading, was educated at Reading school and St. John's College, Oxford. He was elected a fellow of that college in 1593, ordained in 1601, and became one of the principal opponents of the Puritan party in Oxford. In the year 1605 he caused great scandal by performing the marriage of the Earl of Devonshire to Lady Penelope Devereux, who had been divorced from her husband on account of her adultery with the earl. In spite of this he was elected president of St. John's in 1611, made one of the king's chaplains, and appointed successively archdeacon of Huntingdon and dean of Gloucester. In 1621 he was further promoted to the bishopric of St. David's. King James, it is said, hesitated considerably to entrust a bishopric to so zealous and energetic a churchman. "He hath a restless spirit, which cannot see when things are well, but loves to toss and change, and bring matters to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain." Laud became the friend and spiritual adviser of Buckingham, and it was in order to convince the wavering mind of his patron's mother that he entered into controversy with the Jesuit Fisher on the questions at issue between the English and Roman Churches. With the accession of Charles his influence increased, and he employed it to promote and protect Arminian divines. The Commons remonstrated against his influence in 1628, but the king replied by promoting him to the bishopric of London (July 1628), and promising him the archbishopric of Canterbury. But it was not till his return from accompanying the king in his progress to Scotland that Laud actually attained the archbishopric (August 1633). Therefore his activity during the years 1628-33 was mainly confined to the diocese of London, and to the University of Oxford, of which he was elected chancellor in 1630. But his influence stretched beyond the sphere of his immediate action, and inspired the silencing of controversial preaching, the suppression of the feoffees for impropriations, and other important steps in the king's ecclesiastical policy. After 1633 he was able to work more effectually. "I laboured nothing more," he says, "than that the external public worship of God—too much slighted in most parts of this kingdom—might be preserved, and that with as much decency and uniformity as might be, being still of opinion that unity cannot long continue in the Church where uniformity is shut out at the church door." He began by reviving the custom of metropolitical visitation, and sending officials to inquire into the condition of every diocese in his province. All communion tables were fixed at the east end of the church, every clergyman was obliged to conform to the Prayer Book, a searching inquiry took place into the conduct of the clergy, and uniformity of ritual was generally enforced. In the council he quarrelled with Cottington and Windebank, raised Juxon to the treasury, supported Wentworth against his enemies, and struggled to contend against the influence the queen exercised in favour of the Catholics. The new canons and Prayer Book, which the king endeavoured to force on the Scots, were submitted to and amended by Laud. That the English Prayer Book was imposed on Scotland, rather than the liturgy prepared by the Scottish bishops, was Laud's doing. Throughout the two Scottish wars the archbishop, as a member of the junto for Scottish affairs, supported Strafford in his vigorous policy. Therefore, as soon as the Long Parliament met, he was involved in the same fate, impeached (December 18, 1640), committed to custody, and, after the articles against him had been passed by the unanimous vote of the Commons (February 24, 1641), imprisoned in the Tower. For two and a half years the archbishop was imprisoned without a trial, his revenues sequestered, his goods sold, and his papers seized. The trial began at last in March 1644, the main charges being that he had endeavoured to subvert the laws, and overthrow the Protestant religion. The judges whom the Lords consulted declared that none of the charges made fell within the legal definition of treason. But this did not save him from the hatred of the Presbyterians, and he was condemned to death by an ordinance of both Houses. His execution took place on January 10, 1645. The purity and lofty purpose of his life redeem the intolerance and severity with which he pursued his aim.

of the low-born favourites and ministers of James III, determined to put them to death, the Earl of Angus offering to be the one to "bell the cat." Accordingly Robert Cochrane, Roger Torphichen, Preston, and Leonard were seized, and hanged over the bridge of Lauder, in the presence of James III, who was himself taken to Edinburgh Castle, and placed under restraint. Lauder is in Berwickshire, twenty-six miles from Edinburgh. [DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, 5TH EARL OF ANGUS.]

Lauffeld (LAWFELDT), THE BATTLE OF (July 2, 1747), was one of the most important contests during the War of the Austrian Succession in which British troops were engaged. The Duke of Cumberland took the field in February, while in March the French army, under Marshal Saxe, invaded the Dutch Netherlands. A revolution in that country promptly placed the Prince of Orange as Stadtholder at the head of the army. But he was ignorant of tactics, and jealous of his more experienced but not less overbearing brother, the Duke of Cumberland. The disorganized forces encountered the French at Lauffeld, in front of Maestricht. The Dutch gave way and fled; and the Austrians, on the right, remained within their fortified position. The brunt of the battle fell upon the British on the left. The British horse advanced too far, and were repulsed, their commander, Sir John Ligonier, being taken prisoner. The Duke of Cumberland could not long maintain his ground; his retreat, however, was effected in good order. The British lost four standards, but notwithstanding their repulse they captured six, and retired to a strong position behind the Meuse. The number of killed and wounded on both sides was great, 6,000 to the allies and close on 10,000 to the French.

Lausanne, CONFERENCE OF (November 20, 1922-July 24, 1923), took place between the Turkish government of Angora and the governments of Great Britain (represented by Marquis Curzon), France, Italy, Japan, Greece, Bulgaria, and Yugo-Slavia. The United States government was represented by an observer. The conference met in order to secure peace between the Turks and Greeks, the Angora government having repudiated the peace treaty of Sèvres (imposed on the defunct Constantinople government in August 1920) and having expelled the Greek force which had landed at Smyrna in May 1919. By the Treaty of Lausanne (July 24, 1923) Turkey regained, with the exception of territories already mandated by the League of Nations, the bulk of her territorial possessions of 1914.

Law, ANDREW BONAR (1858-1923), born in Canada, was educated in Glasgow, and entered parliament as Conservative member for the Blackfriars division of Glasgow in 1900. As parliamentary secretary to the board of trade he warmly supported the tariff reform movement of 1903; he fell with the Conservatives in 1906, and was unseated again in 1910 until returned at a by-election. In 1911 he became leader of the opposition in succession to Mr. Balfour. He opposed the Parliament Bill and the Home Rule Bill. In 1915 he joined the Asquith coalition as colonial secretary, and wholeheartedly supported the Lloyd George coalition of 1916, in which he was virtually a partner, holding the chancellorship of the exchequer and a seat in the war cabinet. In 1919 he became lord privy seal. But his health broke down in 1921 as a result of his labours during the war, and he retired until the formation of his own Conservative ministry in October 1922, which carried the Irish Free State Constitution Bill, took part in the Lausanne Conference (q.v.), and saw the beginning of the occupation of the Ruhr by France. He resigned in May 1923 through failing health, and died in the following October.

Law, EDWARD, EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH (1790-1871), was the son of Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, and entered parliament in 1813; but removed to the Upper House on succeeding his father as Baron Ellenborough in 1818. In the Wellington cabinet of 1828-30 he was at first lord privy seal and afterwards president of the board of control. In 1841 he accepted the governor-generalship of India. Under his administration in that country was accomplished the expedition into Afghanistan, under Generals Pollock and Nott, which resulted in the recapture of Ghazni and Kabul. The conquest of Sind by Sir Charles Napier, in 1843, was also undertaken by Lord Ellenborough's government, but his policy did not meet with the approval of the court of directors, and in 1844 he was recalled by that body. The Duke of Wellington, however, defended Ellenborough's policy in parliament, and on his return home he was created an earl.

Lawman was the name of an officer of Danish origin, who is met with in the Five Boroughs of Mercia, and other Danish portions of the country. In the towns of Danish origin there were usually twelve lawmen, whose function it was to expound and enforce the law, and, in some cases, to act as a town council or governing body. In some cases the dignity seems to have been hereditary.

Lawrence (LAURENTIUS), Archbishop of Canterbury (605-19), was one of the companions of St. Augustine, whom he succeeded. Christianity flourished in Kent during the reign of Ethelbert; but on the death of that king, his son and successor, Edbert, threw himself into the hands of the heathen party, and threatened persecution. Justus and Mellitus fled, and it is said that Lawrence was about to follow their example, when he was admonished by St. Peter to remain. He did so. Edbert was reconverted, and Christianity became once more the religion of the Kentish kingdom.

Lawrence, SIR HENRY MONTGOMERY (1806-57), obtained a cadetship in the Bengal army in 1822. He served in the Afghan campaign of 1843; and in 1846, after the first Sikh War, he was appointed British representative at Lahore. In this capacity he extinguished the revolt in Kashmir, under Imammad-din, against the authority of Golab Singh. In 1847 he returned to England to recuperate his health. In 1849, on the annexation of the Punjab, he was appointed one of the commissioners of the board of government, with his brother, John Lawrence, and Charles Mansel. Differing with his brother, he was removed to Rajputana by Lord Dalhousie. He was on the point of proceeding to Europe, for his health, in 1857, when, at the earnest request of Lord Canning, he assumed the chief commissionership of Oudh. He saw the discontent at the new revenue settlement, and he did his best to remove it and restore confidence. He fortified, provisioned, and garrisoned Lucknow as well as he could, as soon as he perceived the danger from the caste question. On May 19 he asked for, and obtained, plenary military and civil power. On the outbreak of the Mutiny, on the 30th, his energetic action repressed it, and expelled the mutinous sepoys. Hearing of the fall of Cawnpore, he marched out and attacked the army of Nana Sahib, but was compelled to retreat. On July 2 the enemy besieged Lucknow, and Sir Henry was struck by a shell and died two days later.

Lawrence, JOHN LAIRD MAIR, LORD LAWRENCE (1811-79), younger brother of Sir Henry Lawrence, was educated at Haileybury, and in 1829 received his nomination as a writer. In 1831 he was appointed assistant to the chief commissioner and resident at Delhi. In 1833 he became an officiating magistrate and collector. In 1836 he received the post of joint magistrate and deputy collector of the southern division of Delhi. In 1848 he was made commissioner of the trans-Sutlej provinces. He also occasionally acted as resident at Lahore. At the end of the second Sikh War he was appointed, with his brother Henry and Charles Mansel, administrator for the Punjab. He abolished the barbarous laws of the Sikhs, and introduced the Indian criminal code. The disarmament of the Punjab was effected mainly through his energy and courage. In 1856 he was made a K.C.B. At the outbreak of the Mutiny he stamped out all signs of revolt in the Punjab, at once diverted every available soldier to Delhi, and raised from the military population of the Punjab troops to oppose the sepoys. For his share in suppressing the Mutiny he was created a baronet and G.C.B.

He then retired to England, and was elected a member of the Indian council. Five years later he undertook the onerous duty of governor-general. On January 12, 1864, he arrived, and found India at peace. He devoted himself to improving the life of British soldiers in India. He provided for their moral and physical condition, for their religious study and improvement, and for sanitary reform. In 1864 war was declared with Bhutan. The campaign was badly conducted, but the result was, on the whole, favourable to the British. In 1865 peace was concluded. In 1866 occurred the great famine in Orissa. The year 1867 was remarkable for the completion of many railways. At the end of the year 1868 Lawrence returned to England, and in 1869 he was raised to the peerage.

League of Nations, THE, was established by the Peace treaties of Versailles (q.v.—1919), St. Germain (1919), Neuilly (1919), and the Trianon (1920), of each of which the Covenant of the League forms the first chapter, and came into being with the ratification of the treaty of Versailles on January 10, 1920. Its original members were twenty-nine signatories of the treaties, together with thirteen states who had been neutral during the war. It now numbers fifty-six members, including all the great powers except the United States and Russia, and most of the smaller countries except Mexico and Turkey. Its objects are "to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security." The organs by which it carries out its work are the Assembly, the Council, and the Secretariat, together with the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Labour Office. The assembly meets annually, in September. Each member-state is represented at the assembly by three delegates, but possesses only one vote. The council meets four times a year, or oftener in case of emergencies, and exercises the authority of the whole League. The council consists of five permanent members, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan, and nine members elected—three every three years—by the assembly (in 1927 Canada, China, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Finland, Holland, Poland, and Rumania). Each member sends one delegate to the council. The secretariat, permanently established at Geneva, is recruited from over thirty nations under a British secretary-general, Sir Eric Drummond. It is the first international civil service.

The members of the League are pledged under the Covenant to submit international disputes to arbitration or to judicial decision by the permanent court or to conciliation by the council of the League; and to refrain from war for at least three months after the award or decision or report by the council. If any member of the League breaks the Covenant and resorts to war, it is deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League. Then the League's council meets at once to recommend what shall be done. In several cases the League's machinery has been used to prevent or stop outbreaks of hostilities. The Permanent Court of International Justice, established at The Hague, deals with international disputes of a legal character and advises the council on legal points in the questions which come before it. The court has delivered nine judgments and fourteen advisory opinions.

As a means of preventing the outbreak of war the nations are also pledged to simultaneous and general reduction and limitation of armaments. This problem has been attacked by the League in conjunction with the cognate problems of security (since the general reduction of armaments includes a reduction on the part of states which are nervous about their security and require it to be guaranteed if they are to begin to disarm) and arbitration, or the peaceful settlement of all international disputes. Since the signature of the Locarno Treaties, and Germany's admission to the League (1926), the League's Commissions have been actively engaged in preparing the ground for a general Disarmament Conference. A convention on the suppression of the traffic in arms has already been adopted, but not ratified, so that it is not yet in force.

The League's work to promote international co-operation covers the following fields: finance and economics, transit and communications, health, intellectual co-operation, humanitarian activities. Its chief activities under these heads have been: Finance and economics, the reconstruction of Austria and Hungary, the refugee settlement schemes in Greece and Bulgaria, the Brussels financial conference; Transit and communications, Barcelona and Geneva conference on international waterways and railroads; Health, anti-epidemic campaigns in Poland and Greece; establishment of epidemiological service with bureaux at Geneva and Singapore; Intellectual co-operation, assistance to countries whose intellectual life is endangered by post-war conditions, promotion of contact between universities, museums, etc.; Humanitarian activities, conventions on the suppression of traffic in opium and in dangerous drugs, on suppression of the traffic in women and children, on suppression of obscene publications, repatriation of prisoners of war from Russia, relief of refugees, Greek, Russian, and Armenian. By practising co-operation in all these fields the members of the League become better able to join in preventing outbreaks of war. Moreover, these activities maintain the interest of states which are far enough removed from Europe and its conflicts to have had no need of the League's machinery for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

Under the Covenant and the peace treaties the League is entrusted with the supervision of the government of backward territories formerly belonging to Germany and Turkey and now administered by different powers under mandate from the League; with the administration of the Saar valley and the Free City of Danzig; and with the protection of populations, in certain European countries, who are of different race, language, or religion from the majority population of the country of which they are subjects.

Parallel with the League is the International Labour Organization, which was established by the peace treaties for the international regulation of labour conditions. It consists of a general conference, a governing body, and an International Labour Office, under the League's financial control. At the general conference which meets annually each state is represented by two government, one employers', and one workers' delegate. The governing body includes eight members representing the governments of the states of chief industrial importance (at present Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Great Britain, India, Italy, and Japan) and four government representatives selected by the government delegates to the conference; six members elected by the employers and six by the workers. The International Labour Organization has held eight conferences and adopted seventeen draft conventions, some of which are already in force in several states. The most important conventions deal with hours of work, child labour, unemployment, workmen's compensations, the right of association of agricultural workers, and conditions of employment at sea.

Leake, SIR JOHN (1656-1720), was a celebrated English admiral. He entered the navy about 1673. At the siege of Londonderry he commanded the little squadron which relieved the town by breaking the boom at the entrance of Lough Foyle, and also distinguished himself at the battle of La Hogue (1692). Soon after the accession of Anne he was made vice-admiral (1703), his Whig politics being greatly in his favour. After the capture of Gibraltar he was left with 18 ships of war for its defence. In 1705 he overtook and defeated Marshal Tessé, who with the French fleet had been besieging the rock. Next year he commanded the fleet off Barcelona, and was superseded by Peterborough, after the relief of the town. Soon afterwards a fleet of merchant vessels fell into his hands. He succeeded in taking the island of Sardinia with little or no resistance; and, in conjunction with General Stanhope, drove the enemy out of Minorca (1708). In the following year he was placed at the head of the board of admiralty. When the Tory ministry came into office Leake, on the resignation of Orford, became first lord. After the accession of George I he ceased to take any part in politics.

Lebanon Question, THE. In 1860 broke out the quarrel between the Druses and the Maronites, two Syrian sects, which led to great atrocities and cruelties on both sides. The Turkish governor of Damascus did not attempt to interfere. Great Britain and France therefore took strong and decisive steps to restore tranquillity in the Lebanon. A convention was drawn up, to which all the great powers of Europe agreed, and which Turkey was forced to accept. Its provisions were that Great Britain and France should restore order; that France should supply the troops in the first instance, and that other requirements should be such as the powers thought fit. Lord Dufferin was sent out as British commissioner, and order was soon restored. The representatives of the great powers assembled in Constantinople then agreed that a Christian governor of the Lebanon should be appointed in subordination to the sultan, and the sultan had to agree. In June 1861 the French troops evacuated Syria.

Leeds, THOMAS OSBORNE, DUKE OF (1631-1712). [OSBORNE.]

Leet. The court leet is a relic of one of the most ancient legal institutions of the realm, viz., the primitive undifferentiated courts of the Anglo-Saxon hundreds, franchises, boroughs, and manors. These courts in the early Middle Ages exercised wide criminal jurisdiction. After the Norman Conquest this jurisdiction was much restricted, and "leet" jurisdiction was the name given to what was left of it after 1215. Leet jurisdiction, in short, was the jurisdiction left by the Great Charter to the sheriff in his tourn, or to any holder of a franchise equivalent to a great hundred court. To courts exercising this jurisdiction the name "court leet" came to be applied by the lawyers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The court leet in sixteenth-century legal theory consisted of all members of the jurisdiction or manor between the ages of twelve and sixty—even women and servants being, according to some authorities, bound to attend; but in practice all the upper classes, from earls, bishops, and barons, to monks and nuns, were by the Statute of Marlborough exempted from attendance. The steward was bound to give from six to fifteen days' notice of the projected meeting (which was to be held once or twice a year within a month of Easter or Michaelmas respectively) to "all manner of persons which are resident or deciners or owe royal suit to this leet." Proclamation having been duly made by the bailiff, excuses or "essoynes" were then made for those who were prevented from attending, and the list called over to ascertain the absentees, who were liable to be fined by the jury, which consisted of at least twelve, but might consist of more persons. If it consisted of a larger number it was sufficient if twelve concurred in any presentment; and the jury of a court leet differed from that of a court baron in that the latter might be comprised of fewer than twelve members. When the former had been sworn, his fellows followed by threes and fours, asserting that they would "present the truth and nothing but the truth." The business of the court was then entered upon, viz., that of presenting culprits. Of culprits there were two classes: (1) Those whose offences might be inquired into here but punishable by the justices of assize at the next jail-delivery; (2) Offences which might be punished as well as presented at the court leet. The first class comprised treasons and felonies, e.g., counterfeiting the king's seal, forging or clipping his coin, mutilation, various forms of murder prepense, manslaughter, arson, dove or pigeon stealing, the abetment of knaves, and theft under the value of twelve pence. The second class included the non-appearance of suitors and deciners (members of a frankpledge); neglect of anyone being above twelve years of age to take his oath of lealty and fealty to the king, or to pay his due manorial services; annoyances caused to the people of the manor by tampering with or polluting roads, ditches, and hedges. The jury might also present and punish notorious scolds, brawlers, and eavesdroppers; those who helped in a rescue or kept houses of ill-fame; vagabonds and common haunters of taverns; those who should adulterate anything they sold, be it ale, bread, lime, or flax, or who should give false measure, or sell goods at above the fair market value. The jury were likewise bound to present the officers who had failed to do their duties—the constable, ale-taster, etc.; to inquire into any abuse of purveyance, into questions of treasure-trove, abuse of commons, and outlawry. The court leet had likewise to see that there was no combination of labourers or tradesmen to exact excessive wages or prices; to insist on the practice of the long-bow, and to prevent the playing of such unlawful games as dicing, carding, tennis, or bowls. The jury of court leet also in many manors chose and swore in the bailiff, constables, ale-conners, and hayward. The steward was to be considered as judge in a court leet, and he had the power to detain a stranger passing by if the full complement of his jury was not made up. He could likewise fine for contempt of court. Such were the powers and constitution of the court leet in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. But the court could not hold its own against the rising power of the justices of the peace, and during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries it vanished except as an antiquarian relic. The court leet was usually associated with the court baron, both courts originally consisting of the same members. The court leet, however, was considered by the lawyers as emphatically one of the king's courts; whereas the court baron, naturally appendant to every manor, had more particular charge of local matters, such as determining services and tenures, admitting new tenants, making new by-laws, etc.
